CAPITALIST DEMOCRACY INDICTED

AMERICA'S COURSE OF EMPIRE

A STUDY IN CRIMINAL AGGRESSION.

"Shall we strut thro' the world and bluster and brag,
With the dollar-mark stamped on the brave old flag."

The crimes of Fascism cannot be overestimated. The criminal violation of the right of the individual, the suppression of freedom of thought and of speech, the destruction of the freedom of the press, barbaric torture and summary execution, are unpardonable outrages against progress and reason, against every instinct of human development. Ere long this barbarous reaction will compel its own destruction. Our horror at the barbarism of reaction is no excuse for supporting the hypocrisy of pseudo-democracy. The present situation of capitalism, the talk of social security, the call for conscription to resist Fascism, the demand for Popular Front Governments, are all so much political falsehood, so much mockery of the economic struggle of the common people in all lands under capitalism. It is the function of democracy to think. To think peace and resist war.

President Roosevelt has issued a peace-call to the nations of the world. It is possible that the call is genuine. President Roosevelt may be haunted by the horrors of war and may wish to see war end. This may be granted. It may be equally true that Mr. Chamberlain, at Munich, wanted peace and aimed at a peaceful settlement of the European problem. We are prepared to believe that so much is true of Roosevelt and Chamberlain. Equally, as an enemy of violence, we are prepared to rejoice at all that is done to preserve the world from war and to welcome all steps that make for the end of glorified murder. We are convinced that war serves no useful purpose and that bloodshed should be outlawed.

Can we say that all this political talk about the democracies is true? The Communist Party, and now the Labour Party, insist that Russia must be part of the democratic alliance. Is the Soviet Union a democracy? Is not the Soviet Bureaucracy a foul, murderous dictatorship? It has assassinated the flower of the Socialist Movement, murdered in an atmosphere of lies and corruption, pioneers of Socialism. If it circulates Roosevelt's peace proposals, it is to serve the diplomatic ends of the Governing Bureaucracy. There is no free speech, no free press, no independent press in the Soviet Union: and the still-subsidised Communist Party, and subsidised press in Britain, dare to call the Soviet Union a democracy. The land of assassination a democracy! What nonsense!

It may be admitted that some democracy exists in Britain and in the United States. This democracy has been secured and is maintained by struggle. It is far from complete and does not necessarily obtain in the British Crown Colonies or in the United States dependencies or dominions. In the main, democracy does exist in Britain and the United States. Even so, property often proves greater than liberty, and in the matter of war, the power to make war and to dictate peace still do not belong to the common people. Finally, it is the function of the British and the American people to be conscripted for war, to be used in war, and to have peace made and concluded by elements over whom they have no control. The democracy is not too unreal and it may exercise some power. But it is not complete and there is no point in concluding that it is final and beyond the right to be questioned.

The present essay does not propose to discuss the history of the British Empire. It restricts itself to the story of the United States of Amer.ca. Italy invaded Abyssinia and Albania. Germany annexed Austria, Czechoslovakia, Memel-land. All this is not democracy. Italy and Germany shamelessly supported the traitor Franco. All this is not democracy. If the United States of America and Britain had not played at non-intervention, if the Soviet Union had not engaged in the same cowardly and disgraceful farce, Franco would not have succeeded, and the Italian and German aggression in Spain would have stopped; there would have been no seizure of Albania, and no Mediterranean question. The world-war menace, the menace of Fascism, has been created by the British and American "democracies," ably assisted by the Soviet Union, by the Conservative Government, seconded by the Communist and Labour Parties. In Germany and in Italy, and also in Britain, Socialist Parliamentarism has paved the way for the triumph of Fascism. To-day, the Communist Party wants us to support Capitalist Governments and to fight in Capitalist wars in defence of democracy. In the first stages of the Russian Revolution, Lenin and his disciples sneered at democracy, at free speech and a free press, as bourgeois illusions. Democracy, free speech, free press, the inalienable right of private judgment do not exist in the Soviet Union any more than they do in Germany or in Italy. We are to ignore this slight omission, to forget Lenin's slogans, and to shout, fight, and die for capitalist democracy, in the diplomatic interests of the Soviet Union, that betrayed, equally with the capitalist democracies, the workers' struggle in Spain.

Roosevelt's appeal for peace merely repeats the last of Wilson's fourteen points, which preceded the terribly dictated peace of Versailles:—

> (14) "A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guarantees of political independence and perpetual integrity to great and small states alike."

Woodrow Wilson got his idea of the League of Nations from the disgraceful Nicarauguan affair of 1916. With this in mind, one must agree that the Fascist dictators are not outwith their rights to sneer at President Roosevelt's gesture.

What is the truth about the United States of America?

Born of a justifiable revolt against the British Government, America's first aggressive war after the Revolution, which made her a nation inspired with a zeal for liberty, was with Mexico. America invaded Mexico without any cause or provocation whatever, and stole half her territory. General Grant, in his personal memoir says:—

> "The occupation and annexation of Texas were, from the inception of the movement to its final culmination, to acquire territory out of which slave states might be formed for the American slave holders. Even if the annexation of Texas could be justified, the manner in which the subsequent war was forced upon Mexico could not."

Abraham Lincoln, in the House of Representatives, voted against and denounced the war with Mexico as a great wrong.

America's next performance was the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands. During Harrison's administration, Mr. Stevens was minister to Hawaii and he asked that some naval vessels be sent there to protect American lives and property. In reality, he had entered into an understanding with a small group of missionaries to bring about a revolution, overthrow the existing government and annex the islands, so that their sugar and their products could come into the United States market free from duty. A naval vessel was ordered to Hawaii and, after it arrived, thirteen conspirators met in a room and decided to overthrow the government.

At night one hundred and fifty of the marines from the American battleship were landed and marched to a point seventy-five yards from and in front of the Government building in Honolulu. The thirteen men, having arrived at the front of the Government building, read their proclamation and were immediately recognised as the government of the Hawaiian Islands, by the American minister.

The Queen of Hawaii had 500 men at the arsenal, well armed with rifles and gatling guns, and she immediately asked the American minister if he had recognised the so-called new government and intended to sustain it. He stated that he had and would sustain it. She answered that she didn't believe that the government at Washington would approve of the transaction. Fifty years before, an English war vessel had landed marines and demanded that the king cede the islands to England and abdicate. The king, having done as requested, the commander of the vessel took possession of the islands, but the British Government repudiated his act and ordered the islands restored to their people. Therefore, the Queen supposed that the United States Government would do likewise. But she appealed in vain. The United States deprived her of sovereignty and took over Hawaii.

The annexation of Hawaii was a violation of the rights of a friendly government. The robbery did not inure to the benefit of the labouring people of the United States, but exclusively to the benefit of the exploiting speculators and plunderers. It was a wanton and inglorious act of piracy.

America's next act of aggression was the Philippines. This has been referred to constantly in American history books as a conquest from Spain. It was nothing of the kind. The full story of the Philippines, as a disgraceful episode in the history of American Imperialism, was given in a speech made at the time, to the U.S. Senate, by Senator R. F. Pettigrew.

NOT WAR, BOYCOTT!

Fascism is an outrage against human right and dignity. The way to destroy Fascism is to create economic conditions of struggle in the Fascist countries. The workers of Britain can do this. The consumers of Britain can do this. Boycott all German goods. Boycott all goods from Germany and what was once Austria, the Sudetenland and Czechoslovakia. Boycott all goods from Spain and Italy. Refuse to purchase goods from these countries. Boycott all traders who stock them. Dockers, refuse to handle traffic from or to these lands. Boycott forces the issue but murders no one.

Before the Spanish war broke, Aguinaldo, the most capable patriot among the Filipinos, and the people of the Philippines had started a revolution against Spain. The Spanish officers had finally proposed to Aguinaldo that they would institute the reforms demanded and, as a guarantee, they gave him and his government 800,000 dollars. Aguinaldo and his counsellors retired to the English colony at Singapore to await the enactment of the reforms by Spain and were there, having the money on deposit, when the United States declared war against Spain.

Aguinaldo immediately communicated with the American consul, stating that Spain had failed to carry out her reforms and that he and his people were ready to join with America in overthrowing Spanish authority. The American consul communicated with Commodore Dewey, whose fleet was in Chinese waters, and Dewey thereupon sent an officer to see Aguinaldo and induce him to return to Manila and organise a revolution. Aguinaldo reached Manila on May 17, 1898, placed himself at the head of an army of 30,000 insurgents, and made wonderful progress. He took 9,000 prisoners, captured the islands of Luzon, Panay, Celu, and Negros, and organised suitable, mild and peaceful governments. He established schools and dispossessed the Spanish from all the islands except the city of Manila. He invested the city by land, and Admiral Dewey by sea. Finally Manila fell. Dewey praised Aguinaldo and embraced him as an ally.

After Manila had fallen, the U.S.A. ordered Aguinaldo to withdraw his troops from the suburbs. He agreed but asked that he might be permitted to retire slowly, as it was difficult to convince his comrades that it was right that they should surrender to the U.S.A. possession of territory which they had won on the field of battle and for which so many comrades had laid down their lives. He also urged that, since his government had conquered the island from, and driven out, the government of Spain, if the U.S.A. made a treaty with Spain, the territory conquered by him should be returned to him. The U.S.A. refused to consider this plea.

In October, Aguinaldo was asked by General Otis to retire his troops even beyond the towns adjoining Manila. Aguinaldo called the attention of Otis to the fact that these towns were not part of Manila. Otis replied:

> "You are right; the territory which I now demand I cannot find as embraced in the city of Manila or its suburbs, but that makes no difference; I insist upon the possession of the territory anyway."

On November 24, Otis again wrote to Aguinaldo, saying that he must retire beyond the village of Santa Mesa, and that if he did not he would attack him. On December 21, the President sent a proclamation to be published in the Philippines, telling the inhabitants that the United States had assumed sovereignty over the islands.

This proclamation was published in the Philippines on January 4, 1899. Aguinaldo declined to recognise the sovereignty of America; and so, on February 4, 1899, American troops attacked Aguinaldo's forces, and fired the first and second shots and killed three Philippinos. The next day Aguinaldo asked that hostilities should cease. The reply was that the fighting having commenced, it must go on to the bitter end. Finally, Dewey seized the ship of the Filipinos and the Philippines became an American possession.

The Republic of Colombia is situated on the north side of South America, and embraces the whole of the Isthmus of Panama. It has a government modelled after that of the United States, and is composed of several independent states, having governors and legislative bodies of their own. The Isthmus of Panama is the State of Panama on the Pacific side of the Isthmus.

In 1903, while Theodore Roosevelt was President, he negotiated with the French for the purchase of what they had done in the way of building a canal across the Isthmus, and approached the Republic of Colombia with a proposition to give them ten million dollars if they would cede to the United States a strip ten miles wide across the Isthmus, for the purpose of building a canal. The session was to grant sovereign rights. This session would cut the state of Panama in two. Colombia was afraid to deal with the U.S.A. for fear that, having obtained a foothold, America would take the whole country. Therefore, she declined to sell and endeavoured to negotiate some other arrangement whereby the canal could be built.

Roosevelt thereupon sent the navy and marines to Colon, which is the port on the gulf side of the Isthmus of Panama, and notified secretly the government of the state of Panama, that if they would set up a republic and revolt from the Republic of Panama, he would give them the ten million dollars for the canal strip, and would also see that Colombia did not send any troops to quell their rebellion. The Governor of Panama agreed to this arrangement, and at the proper time started a rebellion to set up an independent government. The Republic of Colombia sent sufficient troops to overthrow and suppress the rebellion without any difficulty whatever, but Roosevelt had instructed the American marines not to allow Colombia to land any troops in Panama, or to interfere in any way, and compelled them to turn back.

We have before us, as we write, copies of the following telegrams:—

(1) November 2, 1903. Department of State at Washington to the naval authorities at the Isthmus.

(2) November 3, 1903. About 3.40 p.m., Loomis, Acting Secretary of State, to United States Consulate at Panama.

(3) Consul to Loomis.

(4) Same day, 9 p.m., Loomis to Consul.

(5) Same day, 10.30 p.m., same to same.

(6) Same day, Commander of one of the U.S.A. vessels at Colon to the Secretary of the United States Navy, at Washington.

(7) Same day, 10 p.m., Vice-Consul of the U.S.A. at Panama, to the Department of State, at Washington.

(8) Same day, 11.18 p.m., Loomis to the Vice-Consul at Panama.

(9) November 4, 1903. Commander Hubbard, of one of the U.S. war vessels at Colon, to the U.S. Secretary of State for the Navy, at Washington.

(10) Same day, State Department at Washington to American Consul at Panama.

(11) November 6, 1903. Secretary of State at Washington to the Vice-Consul at Panama.

These telegrams, covering a period of four days, make amazing reading.

(1) The U.S. Naval Authorities at the Isthmus are ordered to keep the transit free and uninterrupted: to occupy the railroad line if necessary: to prevent the Government, equally with the insurgents, from landing troops at Colon, Portobello, or any other point: to occupy Ancon Hill and fortify it with artillery if necessary.

(2) Washington informs Consulate:—

"We are informed that there has been an uprising on the Isthmus; keep this Department informed of everything without delay."

(3) Consul replies:—

"The uprising has not occurred yet; it is announced that it will take place this evening. The situation is critical."

Telegrams 4 and 5 instruct that the Captain of the U.S. warship, the Nashville, "must prevent the Government troops, which landed from Cartagena, from continuing on to Panama, or from assuming an attitude which might result in bloodshed."

In other words, Washington knew of the uprising before it occurred, and sent warships to Panama to prevent the Government of Colombia from suppressing a purely mercenary and subsidised rebellion.

Telegram 6 is an answer to telegram 1. It reports that the Colombian Government landed 400 men from Cartagena at the Isthmus. This telegram adds:—

"There is no revolution on the Isthmus, nor any disturbance. It is possible that the movement to proclaim independence may take place in Panama this evening."

Telegram 7 announces:—

"The revolt took place this evening at six; there has been no bloodshed. The government will be organised this evening and will be composed of three consuls and a cabinet. It is believed that a similar movement will take place in Colon."

It should be pointed out that the Colombian General Tovar, had arrived at Colon, with a battalion of sharpshooters, a force more than sufficient to suppress the uprising.

Telegram 8 was a further instruction to the Nashville, at Colon, to prevent the Colombian Government troops from continuing to Panama. The Nashville Commander was ordered to use a special train if necessary, and to: "Act with speed."

Telegram 9 informs Washington that Commander Hubbard of the U.S. Navy has forbidden the troops of the Colombian Government to move in any direction.

In Telegram 10, Washington informs the Consul at Panama—not the Consul Washington note:—

> "We have the honour to inform you for your own knowledge and that of the Government which you represent, that on this very date there has taken place a movement by which the old Department of Panama has separated from the Republic of Colombia, with the object of constituting a new state by the name of the Republic of Panama."

Telegram 11 is a marvellous study in political hypocrisy. Washington advises its Vice-Consul at Panama:—

> "The people of Panama by an apparently unanimous movement, have severed their political bonds with the Republic of Colombia and have resumed their independence. As soon as you are convinced that a de facto government, republican in form and without substantial opposition on the part of its own people, has been established on the Isthmus of Panama, you will enter into relations with it as the responsible government of the territory, and you will address to it a request that it take the measures necessary for the protection of the persons and the property of citizens of the United States, and that it keeps open the transit on the Isthmus in accordance with the obligation of the existing treaties which govern the relations of the United States with that territory."

Here, then, was a rebellion which the "democracy" of America planned, of one of the states of a sister republic, and sent her troops and navy in advance to carry it through. Is there any more glaring chapter of infamous conduct in the treatment of one nation by another than this proceeding on the part of the United States? Has Fascism anything that exceeds in perfidy and infamy the annexation of Texas, the acquisition of Hawaii, the Philippines, and the separation of Panama?

Woodrow Wilson on January 22, 1917, said:—

> "No nation should seek to extend its policy over any other nation or people, but that every people should be left free to determine its own policy, its own way of development, unhindered, unthreatened and unafraid, the little along with the great powers."

This was the prelude to the dismemberment of Austria and Germany.

Central America is a country about four times as large as the state of Ohio, and has a little over five million people, divided into five republics, Guatamala, Honduras, Salvador, Nicaraugua and Costa Rica. During Taft's administration the United States intervened in a difficulty between some of the Central American States, in which Nicaraugua was involved. The United States thereupon said: "Let us have a conference," but the result was that all the states of Central America but Nicaraugua sent delegates to Costa Rica to attend the conference, which was to make perpetual peace in Central America. The President of Nicaraugua refused to send a delegate because the conference had been called by the United States, and he would not recognise the right of the United States to interfere in Central American affairs. Thereupon the United States sent down troops and drove him out of office and put a puppet in his place. Afterwards a meeting was held in Washington of the Central American States, and Nicaraugua participated, because that meeting was called by the Central American States themselves.

At that meeting a League of Nations was formed of the Central American Republics, and it was agreed to arbitrate all their difficulties and end war forever. It was to be an international court with regard to Central America. It was to deal with all questions that arose between Central American States and the outside world. Carnegie hailed the proposition with delight, and furnished a hundred thousand dollars to build a marble court building in Costa Rica. In the meantime, America had set up a puppet in the place of the duly and properly elected president of Nicaraugua, and this puppet who represented but a small fraction of the population, began looting the treasury of Nicaraugua, and was finally forced to borrow money. The United States government thereupon notified their puppet that the New York bankers would let him have all the money he wanted.

In 1912, the people of Nicaraugua rose in revolt against the government set up by the United States of America. In order to support this man, America landed marines in the capital of Nicaraugua. By keeping a puppet government and piling up a state debt, the U.S. has controlled Nicaraugua ever since.

In 1916, Nicaraugua was very hard up, and America said to her: "Your case is practically hopeless. You cannot pay interest on your debt, let alone the principal. The United States may some time want to build a canal up the San Juan River and through Lake Nicaraugua to the Pacific Ocean. Give us San Juan River and the lake, with the privilege that we may build the canal when we get ready, and give us that splendid bay of Fonseca, and a little island for a naval base, and we will loan you the money to pay your interest and put things on a new basis." The result was that Nicaraugua, having a president of America's choice, maintained by American Blue Jackets who had been kept there since 1912, said: "Very good. We will give you the right of way and we will sell you the island, and we will take the funds to pay the interest on the money we owe you."

Costa Rica claimed the right to the San Juan River in connection with Nicaraugua, as it is the boundary between the two nations. Thereupon the United States said: "Here is a case for the Central American Court, the League of Nations."

Another nation now came into the case, San Salvador. The Gulf of Fonseca abuts Nicaraugua and it abuts San Salvador. An island in that bay commands the shores of San Salvador, and San Salvador said, "We object to giving away any naval base in Fonseca Bay, even to the United States, because it threatens our coast." So the case came before the court at Costa Rica, before the American League of Nations, and was thoroughly considered and a decision rendered, which was against Nicaraugua, United States and in favour of San Salvador and Costa Rica. Nicaraugua, backed by the United States, refused to recognise the decision of the court. The League of Nations, formed to produce perpetual peace, vanished in thin air. Woodrow Wilson's administration dismissed the League of Nations for the American continent, but imposed the idea of the League in Europe.

In 1917, the president of Costa Rica was overthrown, and another president took his place. The matter was referred to President Wilson, and he refused to recognise the rebellion which occurred purely over local matters. The question arose over judgment between different parties in the republic, and there can be no question but Timco, the new president, represented the majority of the people. But Wilson said, "I will not recognise him." Thereupon, the Porto Rican congress met and recognised the administration of the new president, but Wilson still refused, although the new president had been recognised by every Latin American country except Panama, Nicaraugua, and Cuba, all three dominated by the President of the United States, all three absolutely his puppets.

In 1919, despite the Wilson theory of democratic self-determination, the American Government purchased the Danish West Indies, which is an island out on the ocean side of the Caribbean Sea. Without asking the consent of the people of the island, it was transferred from Denmark to the United States. The U.S.A. took over Haiti and Domingo, and collected the customs of that country. The finest building in the republic is the American Customs House. Haiti, the other half of the island, which lies between Cuba and Porto Rico, without any declaration of war on the part of the United States Congress was seized by President Wilson and administered in every detail by the United States. America dictated who should be president of Cuba.

The Declaration of Independence says, "All men are created free and equal and endowed by nature with certain inalienable rights, such as life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, and to obtain these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

What is there in all these disgraceful affairs to arouse the enthusiasm or stir the patriotic fire of the young men of America? Why should they enlist for the purpose of re-enacting these acts of piracy? What advantage can come to the two-thirds of the population of the United States who have no property, by these annexations? Why should young men go forward to fight to acquire more territory to be plundered and exploited by American millionaires? Why should they conceive American democracy to be something superior to German Fascism?

The American Red, White and Blue flag has taken its place by the side of the Red, White and Blue flag of England, as a pioneer banner of piracy. Wrote Labouchere, the famous Radical M.P., and editor of Truth, many years ago:

WHERE IS THE FLAG OF ENGLAND?

Let the winds of the world make answer!
North, south, east, west—
Where'er there is wealth to covet
Or land to be possessed;
Where'er are savage nations
To coddle, coerce, or scare,
You may look for the vaunted emblem—
The flag of England is there.

Aye, it waves o'er the blazing hovel
Whence its African victims fly,
To be shot by explosive bullets
Or wretchedly starve and die,
Or where the beachcomber harries
The isles of the southern sea,
From the peak of his hellish vessel
The English flag flies free.

The Maori full oft hath cursed it
With his fleeting, dying breath,
And the Arab hath hissed his curses
As he spat at its folds in death.
The hapless fellah hath feared it
On Tel el Kebir's parched plain,
And the blood of the Zulu hath stained it
With a deep, indelible stain.

It has floated o'er scenes of pillage
And flaunted o'er deeds of shame;
It has waved o'er the fell marauder,
As he ravished with sword and flame;
It has looked on ruthless slaughter
And assassination, dire and grim,
And has heard the shrieks of its victims
Drown even the jingo hymn.

Where is the flag of England?
Seek the land where the natives rot,
And decay and assured extinction
Must soon be the people's lot.
Go to the once fair islands
Where disease and death are rife,
And the greed of a callous commerce
Now battens on human life.

Where is the flag of England?
Go sail where rich galleons come
With their shoddy and loaded cotton
And beer and Bibles and rum.
Seek the land where brute force hath triumphed
And hypocrisy hath its lair,
And your question will thus be answered—
For the flag of England is there.

If anyone doubts whether this can be said of the flag of the United States, let him read the discussions on the Nicarauguan Canal in the United States Senate from the Congressional Record, for January 21 and February 24, 1899. Let him read the speeches of Mr. Pettigrew, pages 910, and pages 2295-6.

THE MURDER RACKET

Astounding figures of the profits made by the aviation companies were given by the Rt. Hon. A. V. Alexander, in the House of Commons, on November 15, 1938.

"The Handley-Page Company," he said, "has issued bonus shares which mean that for every £1 of ordinary shares held in 1935 the shareholder now holds £22."

The 1938 final dividend was 20 per cent., paid on this inflated capital. Describing this as "wicked profiteering," Mr. Alexander explained that the Handley-Page company paid, in 1938, a dividend at the rate of 365 per cent. on the capital of 1935. And the British Aeroplane Company was piling up huge reserves for a capital bonus issue.

Nine days later, in the same House of Commons, Willie Gallacher, as Member for West Fife, seized an opportunity to preach the kind of military-panic-patriotism which the Handley-Page Company moulded into profit. Mr. Lawson, the Miners' M.P. for Chester-le-Street, moved the Second Reading of the Public Health (Coal Mines Refuse) Bill. Lawson made an excellent speech in furtherance of this excellent measure. Another good speech in support was made by Mr. Mathers, the Labour Member for Linlithgow. But Gallacher had to seize on the opportunity to preach war and panic. He said he represented a constituency which possessed the worst slag heap in the world and probably the most dangerous in Great Britain.

Anyone who travelled into Fife on an evening would see a red glow which gave one an impression of Piccadilly Circus.

The illumination sent out by this conical heap could be seen for a long distance and over a very big area.

> "When the war was in progress," continued Gallacher, "the Germans used numerous agents and spent large sums of money trying to get damage done to the Forth Bridge. If the Forth Bridge could be destroyed the greatest possible damage would be done to the defence forces of the country, yet the Forth Bridge is only a mile or two away from this illumination. There is not an airman from any part of the world who could not come on a dark night and drop bombs right on the Forth Bridge."

In addition, there was a great munition dump near-by which might be endangered.

The profiteering members of the Commons listened with approval to this argument, whereas the health argument urged by Lawson and Mathers left them cold. It turned from the class struggle to class collaboration, and pretended that the workers had a country to defend. It raised the right fear, the proper degree of panic that profiteers welcome and applaud with glee. Gallacher's speech was reported at length. He had found a sounding-board. So did Robert Blatchford and Horatio Bottomley during the 1914-1918 war. They also supported the murder-racket, which subsequent Labour Governments left undisturbed.

When we became an Anti-Parliamentarian in 1906, we declared that it was the business of parliamentarism to support the business of armaments. In those days, when the Labour movement was applauding Ramsay MacDonald, we denounced him, not as an individual, but as an expression of what parliamentarism must prove to be inevitably. To-day, the parliamentarians scorn the memory of Ramsay Macdonald, but adopt a more imperialist attitude than Neville Chamberlain, the present leader of the National Government that MacDonald fathered. This fact makes it worth while to enquire what interest the Armament firms have in the propaganda and preparation of murder, and who's who in murder. For war is murder: not glory, but sordid, sadist, callous, mercenary murder.

In 1935, the Labour Research Department, ignorant of the fact that three years later the so-called Socialist movement was to be the movement of war-mongers, published an invaluable pamphlet entitled: "Who's Who In Arms," compiled by W. H. Williams. Thanks to the mass of facts collected in this pamphlet, we are able to expose Vickers, Beardmore, Yarrow, Hadfields, Thornycroft, De Havilland, Handley-Page, Fairey, and Rolls-Royce. These firms are engaged in the armaments business and racket. Every year the chairmen of each of these companies meet their shareholders. Their business is to report progress, which means increasing profit from the manufacture of death. It is then that the armament racket is exposed.

"My Lords, Ladies, and Gentlemen . . " The chairman speaks. Let us hear what this gentleman has to say, of concern to humanity even more than to his shareholders. The reports are taken from the Times, that most accurate official organ of staid British Capitalism, for dates mentioned at the end of each paragraph, unless where special reference is made to some other journal.

Sir Herbert Lawrence addressed the Vickers shareholders from 1927 onwards to 1934.

The armament business is a special trade that must go on because its workers have specialised in war-work and profits must be made. Such is the burden of Sir Herbert's addresses in 1927, 1928, 1930, and 1931.

1927.—"It is no good disguising the fact that we are an armament firm, dependent largely on armament orders. . . . If there is to be a further limitation of armaments . . . the future of the armament business of Vickers, like that of every other large armament concern in the country, may become difficult. . . ."—April 30, 1927.

1928.—"The manufacture of armaments is a specialised trade, requiring special plant and special types of staff and workers, and depending on a limited market determined by the policy of various Governments."—March 30, 1928.

1930.—". . . We cannot turn 'guns into ploughshares' without scrapping the whole of the plant required for the production of guns and substituting, for the workers accustomed to gun-production, other men trained from youth in the production of ploughshares. On that aspect of the question I can speak with authority."—April 1, 1930.

In 1931, Sir Herbert commented on the fusion with Arsmtrong Whitworth & Co., to create Vickers-Armstrong, the largest armament firm in the world. He explained that "disarmament policy" had adversely affected the company's trading results. He returned to this theme in 1932 and complained that the world-wide depression and public opinion had been a malign influence. But in 1931, the company "was fortunately able to secure a satisfactory order from the Portuguese Government in addition to work from other foreign powers."

1933.—"It is true that Vickers-Armstrong, Ltd., relies very largely on armament orders for its existence."—April 4, 1933.

1934.—". . . as an armament firm, we are the subject of opprobrium in certain quarters. . . ."
". . . In addition to work for the Air Ministry our aviation companies succeeded in obtaining orders from foreign countries."—March 27, 1934.

Quite impartial! Quite indifferent as to how the foreign orders are used! Quite proud to have the orders—and the profits from murder.

On December 22, 1927, and October 25, 1928, Lord Invernairn delivered the chairman's address to William Beardmore & Co. He described how the company's works were extended during the war, and how, in deciding to take them over, the Board was influenced by substantial orders, which were then in hand for armament work. Unfortunately, most of this Government work was cancelled following upon the Washington Conference, coupled with the slump in trade which occurred in 1920." And so "the extending manufacturing facilities possessed by the company" became "a heavy financial burden on the company and detrimentally affected earnings."

On October 25, 1926, Lord Invernairn referred even more bluntly to the Washington Conference:

1928.—"We were very expensively equipped for the manufacture of warships, armour-plate, guns and other war material and for the production of steel far in excess of the possibilities of the market to absorb to-day. . . . Then the Washington Treaty further curtailed armament expenditure. . . ."—October 26, 1928.

Lord Invernairn was merely the chief shareholder. In 1931, and subsequent years, the speech was made by Mr. H. A. Reincke, Chairman and Managing Director. In 1931 he spoke of the closing down and sale of the shipyard and locomotive works at Dalmuir, and explained this disaster as being due to "the discontinuance of Admiralty orders as a result of the policy of disarmament."

In 1932 and 1933 his speeches were more optimistic. And he explained the part played by the banks in financing murder, those banks whose directors are religious, and whose religion would not finance a scheme for serving humanity.

1932.—"At Dolwin, the principal item of work has been the machinery for the Flotilla Leader, H.M.S. Duncan. . . . A set of twin-screw machinery for a small special service vessel. . . . H.M.S. Skylark is also in process of manufacture. A number of Vulcan hydraulic couplings have been completed for important Naval and Merchant vessels. . . ."—May 19, 1932.

1933.—"The results at Parkhead for 1932 as compared with 1931 do not show an improvement, but the reason is to be found in the fact that the 1931 Admiralty building programme was postponed, thus seriously affecting the volume of work passing through the shops. This programme having now been embarked upon, and having been followed up closely by the 1932 programme, the volume of Admiralty work passing through both Dalmuir and Parkhead in 1933 is considerably in excess of what it has been during any one of the three preceding years. In addition to the contracts for the machinery for the two cruisers, the Ampion and the Apollo, which, as has been announced in the newspapers, have been secured by Dalmuir. Parkhead is now engaged upon the manufacture of armour, guns and the largest types of forgings and castings as part of the company's participation in the present Admiralty programme. . . .

"It would not have been possible for the company to finance the orders received . . . but for certain loan facilities granted to the company by Lloyds Bank and the two Scottish Banks—the Royal Bank of Scotland and the National Bank of Scotland. Without this measure of confidence, at a moment when for the first time since 1929 the prospect appears on the horizon of securing a volume of work commensurate with the capacity of the company's establishents, we could not have carried on."—July 13, 1933.

The famous firm of Yarrow and Company Ltd. was founded in 1897. The speeches of its chairman, Sir Harold E. Yarrow, were cheerful because of the firm's success in selling war craft to the British, Dutch, Yugo-Slav, Colombian, Japanese, Portuguese, Italian, Peruvian, Finnish, and South African Governments.

1927.—"Reference has been made in the report to the building of H.M.S. Ambuscade. This vessel is one of the two special destroyers ordered by the British navy and represents the most up-to-date and efficient destroyer afloat and the first post-war torpedo-boat destroyer to enter the navy. Since the report was printed, two of the four river gunboats built for the Admiralty have successfully completed their trials and have been handed over to the navy. The remaining two vessels will be finished at an early date. The Dutch Government has decided to lay down two further torpedo-boat destroyers of the Yarrow design, making eight in all." — December 13, 1927.

1928. — The torpedo-boat destroyers built in Holland for the Dutch navy, of the Yarrow design, and under the supervision of the company, have proved highly successful in service."—December 15, 1928.

1929.—"Since the conclusion of the company's year, important contracts have been secured for a large and powerful flotilla leader for the royal Yugo-Slav Navy, three gunboats for the Colombian Government, a shallow river draught gunboat for the British Navy, and other small craft." — December 19, 1929.

"Three gunboats built for the Colombian Government had been delivered and are now in service in Colombia. . . . During the year the firm had undertaken the supply of a boiler of 1,000 lbs. pressure for the Imperial Japanese Navy."

"It was considered necessary to take an interest in a small shipyard in Kralijovica, Yugo-Slavia. . . . At present it is engaged in the completion of a number of ships for the Yugo-Slav Navy, the machinery and boilers for which are under construction in the company's works at Scotstoun. . . . At the present time the company has in hand a gunboat for the British Admiralty; a flotilla leader for the Royal Yugo-Slav Navy, representing the largest and most powerful base of its kind ever built in this country."—December 16, 1930.

1931.—"The flotilla leader Dubrovnik, which the firm is constructing for the Royal Yugo-Slav Navy, was launched on October 12th last by H.R.H. Princess Olga. . . . H.M.S. Falcon, the latest gunboat built for the British Admiralty, has been handed over at Shanghai. . . . With regard to new work, one of the most important orders recently secured by the firm is from the Portuguese Government for four torpedo destroyers. . . . It is satisfactory that, during the last four years, the Dutch, Yugo-Slav, and Portuguese Governments have all selected destroyers of the Yarrow design. Following the success of the latest Italian cruisers equipped with Yarrow boilers designed by the company, an order for Yarrow boiler designs for a new aircraft carrier has been obtained from an Italian firm. . . . The company has sufficient work in hand to remain fairly well occupied until 1933." December 22, 1931.

1932. — "The work on the four Portuguese destroyers is making good progress. . . . The company has received an order for the complete designs of the boilers (in the new cruiser which is being built by the Dutch Government). . . . The plant at the shipyard at Kralijevica, Yugo-Slavia, is being maintained at a high standard."—December 30, 1932.

1933. — "During the year the torpedo-boat destroyers Vonga and Lima were handed over to the Portuguese Government. . . . An order for a fifth destroyer was secured during the year. . . . Orders have been received from places as far apart as South Africa, Peru and Finland."—December 19, 1933.

Addressing the shareholders of Hadfields Ltd., the famous Sheffield steel firm, Sir Robert Hadfield described the salesmanship methods of armaments dealers; the publicity value to his trade of the State-subsidised visits to this country of foreign potentates; and the manner in which the political views of the die-hard materialists follow the commercial interests of the munition mongers.

In 1928 he expressed his pleasure at "the recent various visits of King Amanullah" to Hadfield's yards and works, and added: "In this changing world, it is highly desirable not to relax our efforts, notwithstanding all the talks about League of Nations and peace propaganda which are still very well in their way . . . ."

Sir Robert attacked the Geneva Conference and added: "When naval matters are being discussed we do not want any weak-kneed individuals." He then eulogised the Hadfield gun: "In the Hadfield armour piercing projectile, we have the monster 16-in. weighing over a ton, which would satisfactorily perforate, and emerge unbroken after performing the ordeal of perforating, the best and latest quality of hard-faced armour of some 14-in. thickness not merely at normal impact but under specially difficult conditions of extremely oblique impacts."

In March, 1930, he spoke of Sheffield always having "been to the fore in the supply of naval requirements" and complained of works being "closed down and skilled men walking the streets in unemployment."

In 1931, he said: "I think it is possible to go too far with the policy of naval limitation."

In 1933, he stressed the need for battleships in place of light cruisers.

The firm of John I. Thornycroft & Co., Ltd., has built up a reputation throughout the world as builders of torpedo-boats. Sir John E. Thornycroft, K.B.E., told his shareholders, in March, 1927, that the trials of the experimental destroyer, Amazon, which had been built for the British Admiralty, "proved her to be the most economical and fastest post-war destroyer in the British Navy." As a result of her successful trials, Thornycroft's "had received from the Chilean Government" an order "for six destroyers." He added, gleefully, that this was "the first important order for foreign warships placed in this country since the war" and it had been "secured in the face of severe international competition."

In November, 1930, Sir John Thornycroft stated that the six destroyers had been delivered to the Chilean Navy, and the company had delivered also three motor torpedo-boats to the Siamese Navy. The company was "engaged upon the Acheron, the special experimental destroyer for the British navy, and the Saguenay and Skeena, for the Canadian navy.

On April 29, 1935, in a Jubilee Supplement to the Daily Telegraph, Captain C. De Havilland claimed that the British exports of aircraft material from 1924 to 1934 exceeded those of any other country in the world. Captain De Havilland is connected with the aircraft company of that name. The buoyant tone of its chairman's speeches, Mr. A. S. Butler, indicates the interests of its shareholders in developing this most damnable side of the armament racket.

In December, 1930, Mr. Butler told the shareholders that the branch in India was progressing, and business was increasing throughout the South African Union from the Johannesburg branch. They had a complete chain of associated companies throughout the four great dominions, and were arranging sales and branches in the wealthy countries of South America.

A year later, Mr. Butler rejoiced in the substantial orders received for "moths" from China, Iraq, Egypt, Brazil, and the Royal Air Force at home.

Exactly another year later, he announced further orders from the army and navy of Brazil for training purposes, "although we encountered the very fiercest foreign competition." More "moths" had been supplied to China and Iraq. "No fewer than nine different countries" had been supplied by the De Havilland company, "with Tiger Moths for training purposes."

"Twelve Puss Moths have been ordered from Japan. . . . Persia ordered a large quantity of Tiger Moths, with additional engines, and spares to be used for training purposes."

In December, 1933, the chairman reported further progress. "Dragons" of a military type, with machine-guns and bomb-gear, had "been purchased by the Iraq Government." Quantities of this machine had been supplied to Britain, Africa, Algiers, Australia, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, France, India, Iraq, Persia, and Spain.

Handley-Page Ltd. also record an impartial story of supplying the means of murder to the governments of Britain, Canada, the United States, France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Sweden, and Spain. Mr. F. Handley-Page told his shareholders in July, 1927, that the British Air Ministry had "decided to adopt and fit the slot and aileron control"—a Handley-Page patent—"on the British fighter aircraft," a type that was "one of the most widely used by the R.A.F."

In April, 1928, Mr. Page was able to say: "The slotted-wing is adopted throughout the British Air Force . . . Licences have been granted in France, the United States, and Germany . . . negotiations are proceeding in . . . Japan, Italy, Belgium, Sweden and Spain."

In April, 1929, he repeats this story and adds: "Four of the squadrons of the R.A.F. are equipped with our twin-engined type of bomber as standard."

In April, 1930, Mr. Handley-Page reviewed his orders from the Air Ministry—"the production of our large twin-engine bomber, known as the "Hinaidi"—and "Clive" machines "equipped with troop-carriers . . . delivered for use in India."

In May, 1931, Mr. F. Handley-Page waxed lyrical: "Considering the times of intense depression which exist in the world to-day, I think we may congratulate ourselves upon the strong position which our company has achieved."

And so, inspired with the knowledge that the murder trade flourished even under depression, Mr. Page invited his shareholders to "look forward with some measure of confidence towards the future."

Not a future for humanity but for the armament-dividend-hunters.

Fourteen months later, Mr. Page said that his company primarily depended "upon orders from the Government" and: "If it were decided, materially, to reduce the Air Force," the company would have to consider its position seriously.

Mr. Page lamented that "the whole aircraft position" was overshadowed "to a very large extent, by the Conferences now proceeding at Geneva and Lausanne."

A similar cheering tale is told by the chairman at Fairey Aviation meetings.

On December 29, 1930, Mr. C. R. Fairey said:

"Our turnover has always shown a marked increase. . . . Within the last few months the company has obtained important contracts in Belgium and Greece. . . . Foreign contracts will form a considerable proportion of our turnover for next year. The aircraft industry is one of the very few showing an increase in export business at the present time. . . . I am pleased to say that our excellent relations with the British Air Ministry are being maintained."

On December 29, 1933, Mr. Fairey reported:

"Our foreign business has continued very satisfactorily, and has reached our record figure, our best successes being in Belgium and South America. . . . The company are also engaged on another important activity with a view to strengthening our business, with the knowledge and approval of the Air Ministry. . . If it is decided to complete or enlarge the original programme, the result should reflect on this company's prospects."

Dividends from fear! This intriguing optimism was received by the shareholders in murder from the sky with applause.

The Stock Exchange Gazette, reviewing the company's 1933 reports, declared that it had "had the benefit of a large order from the Belgium Government for military aeroplanes . . . . the trading profit of the company has increased from £174,165 to £185,640 . . . . The success of the company may be attributed to sound organisation.

"Incidentally, of course, Fairey's have to keep an eye on Geneva, but disarmament seems a long way off, and I cannot imagine such a handling of matters at the Conference as would damage the prospects of this company."

"Sound organisation" means propaganda and intrigue against peace. It means failure for all peace conferences and approaches under Capitalism.

Many workers identify the name of Rolls-Royce with the famous plutocratic car. They do not realise that a more sinister activity of this firm is the manufacture of aero-engines for war aeroplanes. The speeches at the Rolls-Royce Limited annual meetings reflect not merely the idle wealth-loving instincts of the ruling class, but also chauvinism of those who buy their motor cars from this firm and invest their capital in its war interests.

Lord Wargrave, a magnificent name for the part, presiding at the annual meetings rejoiced in the necessity for war:

1927.—"The era of an ideal when universal peace shall reign seems a vain dream. Warlike operations have been necessary during the year in many parts of the world, and in every case the aeroplane has proved essential. It cannot be neglected with any prudence whether in peace or war."—Feb. 22, 1927.

1929.—"During the past twelve months a further number of their new Faero engines had been fitted to a large number of experimental types of Royal Air Force aircraft. . . . There could be no two opinions with regard to the national character of the property of Rolls-Royce Ltd. They had only to recall the invaluable services rendered by the company on land and in the air during the War to give proof of that statement."—Feb. 23, 1929.

In 1931, Lord Wargrave boasted of "the pre-eminence of the Rolls-Royce aero-engines." The following year he enthused over the "number of 'Kestrel' and 'Buzzard' engines" that has been supplied to foreign countries. He mentioned, particularly, the large orders received from the Belgian Air Force.

We have heard the chairman address his shareholders. Who are these directors and shareholders? On enquiry, we shall find them to be the leading banks of England, Scotland, and Ireland; the Insurance Companies, headed by the Prudential; leading members of the Church; even the great Quaker families and industries. The network of murder and armament intrigue known as the British Munitions Industry is a romance of widespread crime, greater and more marvellous to study than any detective story, intimately supported and controlled through a thousand ramifications by the entire life and activity of British Capitalism. The most peaceful capitalist has an interest, direct and immediate in the murder racket. And the Labour and Communist politician discovers that it is impossible to pursue the course of parliamentary careerism without substituting the idea of national war for social war, murder for progress.

A GREAT PACIFIST

On September 3, 1938, Bart de Ligt died at Nantes in France, at the age of 55. His body was cremated in Paris and the ashes conveyed to Holland. On Saturday, September 10, they were placed in the columbarium of the crematorium in Westerveld, near Haarlem. Thus passed the man, whose writings, without exception, are banned among members of the Dutch army and navy.

Bart de Ligt was born in 1883, in Rhenen, where his father was a Protestant minister. He studied for the ministry, but was influenced by Socialistic ideas at an early age, and he believed that a hired ministry was unscriptural. He entered the ministry, however, but delivered Socialistic sermons and attacked severely the ruling politico-economical system and its ethical foundations. He published two pamphlets dealing with the office of the prophet in relation to the national festivals and the people's distress. On the outbreak of the world war he issued a pamphlet which caused a stir throughout all Holland. It was entitled: "The Guilt of the Churches." This pamphlet was circulated widely by the League of Christian Socialists, to which he belonged. At Nuenen he preached a sermon, on the theme, "Veni Sancte Spiritus," in which he attacked boldly the militarist system. In one passage he said:

"The soldier is subordinate to the corporal, the corporal to the sergeant, the sergeant to the officer, the latter to the field-officer, and finally comes the general. But he, too, is but a tool in the hands of the government which directs him. . . . If the government moves the general, they all move. It is the one machine. And if the general says 'Shoot!' they all shoot, at whatever it may be, and even though it were the heart of Jesus Christ, that sacred heart of God."

As De Ligt persisted in delivering Anti-Militarist sermons and addresses, the Government banished him on June 23, 1915, from Brabant and Zealand as well as other places. This banishment remained effective till May 1, 1920. On March 6, 1916, he seceded from the Church and threw himself heart and soul into the movement for refusing military service which had developed in Holland. He gradually became an Atheist and an Anarchist. This year, 1916, he was convicted of being a "seditious agitator" and imprisoned. From the prison library, he obtained an original French edition of Tolstoy's "The Christian Spirit and Patriotism," which the great Russian published in 1904. The clear arguments of Tolstoy convinced De Ligt that during the war days of mortal peril, a fervent and tireless fight against militarism was even more necessary than it was when Tolstoy wrote.

Five years later, Bart de Ligt referred to this conviction and imprisonment when he championed the cause of the Dutch conscientious objector, Herman Groenendaal, who refused military service, and answered imprisonment with a hunger-strike.

On Sunday, June 26, 1921, he addressed a huge meeting at the Hague, in defence of Groenendaal, and incited all who attended to refuse to build barracks and prisons, to refuse to manufacture war materials, to refuse military service, and to secure Groenendaal's release from prison and military service by a general strike. De Ligt incited in the name of Jesus, Marx, Bakunin, Tolstoy, and Groenendaal.

An important passage of his speech, for which he was indicted, was as follows:—

"I have come here to-day to stir up resistance to the authority of the State! In the name of Jesus! In that name I appeal to all primitive Christian feeling which still survives in these days; to the spirit of sacrifice and will towards Communism which radiates from original Christianity, and continues through heretics, sects, so-called saints, and revolutionaries till the present time!

"In the name of Marx, who brought us the science of Socialism and spoke the words, 'Workers of the world, unite!

"In the name of Bakunin, that hero and poet of liberty who attacked so passionately all official authority!

"In the name of Kropotkin, who opposed his doctrine of mutual aid with its Socialist foundation to Darwinism with its bourgeois foundation!

"In the name of Tolstoy, because he summoned to rational life and declared that to act in the light of truth is the only infallible method of revolution!

"And in the name of Groenendaal, for he has assimilated the quintessence of all this and defends it at the hazard of his young and noble life!

"I incite you—to what? To do not destructive but productive work; to make nothing which is an assault upon body, soul or mind. This means to refuse service to war, direct or indirect. For war is a bad, irrational, immoral, inefficacious method of deciding conflicts. Besides, the conflicts in question are only to the material, and by no means to the moral, advantages of small ruling classes or groups. And why? Because we are threatened by a new world war."

On his trial before the Court of Justice at the Hague, De Ligt defended his speech and attitude with fearless vigour. Since his conviction in 1916, he had accepted the name "seditious agitator" in the same way as the adherents of Fox accepted the name "Quaker." Stating that his speech had been delivered at 1 p.m., De Ligt challenged the Court to convict him:

"As Socrates and kindred spirits corrupted the youth of Athens, so I corrupt youth by spoiling it for militarism; by arousing its sense of responsibility in relation to Imperialism and War. So I act in a criminal fashion by putting god, spirit and conscience above church, authority, and state. So I appeal to the despised masses and tell them that they have nothing to expect or hope for from the ruling classes, but that they must bring about their own emancipation by new, non-bourgeois, non-feudal, or pre-feudal methods; by methods higher than those of the brute; by human methods. In this light, all my work, from day to day, from hour to hour, is entirely 'seditious,' sometimes systematically so, sometimes spontaneously. This was so, is so, and is likely to remain so. When I said on Sunday, June 26 last, in the Hague, at or about 1 p.m., 'I have come here to-day to stir up resistance to the authority of the state,' I acted rightly. I felt and knew from the tension in the audience that I was thoroughly understood: that my hearers realised these were no irresponsible words. I felt—for one feels these things when one is accustomed to public speaking—that the meeting understood the spirit in which I spoke, and realised that I was about to say such things as elsewhere might be considered most base, but which among us at any rate, are considered best and highest."

In his work on "Anarchism and Revolution," De Ligt explains why a great percentage of the best revolutionary workers were at first very religious. "All later moral and cultural values," he declares, "arise in mankind from preceding ones." Denials, to mean anything, must be moral as well as intellectual. They must be positive and not negative denials. He who denies must have gathered to himself the intrinsic value of that which he denies. Christianity, in its original form, is unthinkable without Judaism, the ethics of the Stoics, the wisdom of Plato and Heraclitus, and the worldly wisdom of the Persians. The urge towards human and cosmic solidarity is "the deepest source of Anarchism and Socialism." Bakunin, especially, "realised the historical connection between all social and cultural phenomena."

De Ligt's views on Anarchism approached those of Gustav Landauer, the German Anarchist, murdered during the Munich Soviet Revolution. Man should strive to become his own providence, and so attain an increasing consciousness of his "responsibility in the cosmic-historical process." Marx and Engels are right when they say that history has not begun. Tolstoy and Bakunin also state that mankind is passing through the preliminary stages of history. So long as man is dominated by social conditions, so long as he is unable to command circumstances, the historical development of mankind has not commenced. History will begin when social action is the free expression of the human spirit. Schelling declared that the significance of history was that the world was developing from object to subject—from thing to personality; from nature to spirit. Human personality becomes increasingly important with the development of history, and the freedom of that personality is the aim and the foundation of the technical and economic processes of civilisation. Anarchism, in appealing to the spontaneity of man, restlessly stimulates man's power of developing by and through himself. It keeps in view the ultimate object of all revolutionary struggle: conscious control of oneself and of the world. Recognising the world problem as being finally one of character, Anarchism fights for a new human personality in a new civilisation.

Bart de Ligt played an important part in founding the International Anti-Militarist Bureau in Holland in 1921. As a delegate to the Peace Congress of the International Federation of Trade Unions held in the Hague towards the end of 1922, he uttered words of warning that the workers should heed to-day:—

"I would warn the workers against every pacifist movement whose representatives have the intention of maintaining Capitalism and who, at the same time, think that they are fighting for the abolition of war. . . . As everyone knows, governments are the humble servants of the economic rulers. Whenever it is a question of war, they ignore parliament. . . . We always find the governments against those comrades, the unsubjugated, who refuse military service—those who make war on war, not with phrases, but with deeds. Governments are our enemies. Therefore it is impossible for anti-capitalist anti-militarists to collaborate with them. It is even more impossible to collaborate with the League of Nations, which bears such a noble name and which is such a dirty business. By calling attention to a possible democratising of the League of Nations, the revolutionary consciousness aroused in the proletariat by the experiences of the world war is confused. . . . If you would combat war effectively, comrades, trust only in the proletariat itself. It is true: the proletariat is still weak. It is morally under-fed. But do you think the proletariat would become strong if it were to join the bourgeoisie and its institutions for this most difficult and most dangerous fight—the actual war against war? Why is the proletariat internationally so weak? Because the proletariat is not only subject to the armed, but also the moral dictatorship of the ruling classes; because it believes in the god of the church, in the right of the state, and in the authority of leaders. . . . We revolutionary anti-militarists who collaborate within the I.A.M.B. recognise no official leaders. . . . We will not be dependent on modern leaders as on new priests of idolatry. The principle of our revolution is: the liberation of the people, by the people itself."

De Ligt was a delegate to the Anti-Poison Gas Congress and the Congress of the League against Colonial Oppression and for National Independence, both held in Frankfurt in 1929. At the first congress he appealed to scientists to organise themselves nationally and internationally for the purpose of bringing about responsible production. Science without conscience, he said, is ruining humanity. He conducted a tireless opposition at this congress of the League against the fatal bolshevik method of making every organisation subordinate to the interests of Moscow politics. He pointed out that the Russian policy and the tactics of the Third International were furthering the rise of brutal bourgeois dictatorships in the near East. He maintained that the League should take measures to prevent its becoming, consciously or unconsciously, the acolyte of the newly arising bourgeoisie in Asia and Africa.

He was most anxious that oppressed Colonial peoples should not form new states, but, instead, should "seek to renew social life in such a way that all class domination should be abolished."

"The international revolutionary movement must give up assisting unscrupulously the militarisation of the movements for the national independence of the coloured races. . . . To favour the creation of a military hierarchy is always something essentially counter-revolutionary. . . . Nothing is more baneful than to try and instil the common logic of violence into people who are already so sensitive to the logic and practice of non-violence. It is an attempt upon what is best in them, to seek to gain them over to the most abject and feeble cause of Western civilisation. . . . Instead of introducing Western militarism into the East, we should, on the contrary, suppress it in the West."

De Ligt was opposed to violence, which he deemed a counter-revolutionary factor. In "The Conquest of Violence," published in 1934, he declared that the social revolutionist must break with violence and hold only to those fighting methods that were in line with his goal of general reconstruction, or else accept the conclusion vociferously proclaimed by the Bolsheviks at the Anti-Gas Warfare Conference at Frankfurt in 1929:

"Against the armies of women reactionaries, we must have armies of women Reds. Against the poison gas of the Whites, the poison gas of the Reds! Against the White bacteria, the Red bacteria!"

De Ligt commented:

"Some revolutionaries of the last century were naive enough to think that war, political or national, might easily be turned into war, civil or revolutionary . . . nowadays war, thanks to the scientific means of slaying available, presents a character so negative, not to say nihilist, that to use it is impossible for a real revolutionary, unless he is willing to load his conscience with the mechanical mass murder of men, women and children and animals; the complete destruction of towns and plains and their inhabitants, and plants; the diffusion, impossible to regulate, of gas and microbes, which would blindly annihilate friends and foes, comrades and adversaries . . . and the odious crime that this would mean against Socialism and mankind in general."

MILITARISM STRIPPED TOO NAKED

"THE SPIRIT OF THE BAYONET."

By Coy. Sergt.-Major Franklin, M.C.

(Reprinted and abridged from "The Daily Herald," London.)

[Coy. Sergt.-Major Franklin, M.C., addressed the Inns of Court Officers' Training Corps, on July 19, 1918, on "The Spirit of the Bayonet." The following report of his speech was published officially in pamphlet form for circulation among members of the corps, but was withdrawn at the command of a higher authority. It was broadcast in pamphlet form by the No More War Movement, with an introduction by Lt.-Col. Arthur Osburn, D.S.O., after Hannen Swaffer reprinted the suppressed speech in the Daily Herald. The speech was denounced by Mrs. Naomi Mitchinson, Ethel Mannin, Havelock Ellis, H. G. Wells, Lord Ponsonby, Marley, etc.—Ed.]

"I wish to speak to you this evening about the spirit of the bayonet . . . I wish to recall something about the first Expeditionary Force . . . Those troops knew little or nothing about the bayonet . . .

"At first we had thought that we were going to polish off the old 'boche' in a few days. That was a fine spirit to have, but we found that the 'boches' who had been preparing for this business for the past forty years, were not to be settled so easily. Then we remembered that all our wars for the past 200 years had been won by the bayonet. And we intend to win this one with the bayonet too (Cheers).

"DELIGHTFUL FEELING.

"Don't ever forget that the bayonet as a real war-weapon is our invention. When I say our invention I am speaking of the Army Gymnastic Staff . . . Anybody with any experience of tackling the 'boche' knows that there is something more to be done after you have killed one; you must get it out damned sharp to kill somebody else. It was a good thing to show Tommy how to kill a 'boche' and to get that delightful feeling of putting him out with a bayonet—to feel that he had finished off one of those dirty creatures that we call Germans. But there is something more to be taught . . . We had to teach the bayonet-fighters that after killing their first man they had got to go forward and kill more, and still more.

"The only time the Germans know how to kill a man with a bayonet is when they catch him undefended; of course, that means when he is badly wounded and unable to take care of himself. When we teach you how to use the bayonet we know you will be able to kill a German whatever he has in his hand . . .

"We talk about artillery. Well, the artillery will do big things . . . The artillery has done its work to blot out everything. Now for our job. We have to go over that ground with the bayonet and I can assure you that you will find plenty of dirty work to be done.

"You've got to get down and hook them out with the bayonet; you will enjoy that, I can assure you. (Laughter.)

"You will want the bayonet to clear the trench. And it is because I know the value of the bayonet that I want you to forget sympathy.

"You should have no sympathy for any damned Germans; I have none, nor has anyone else that I know in France. If at any time you should be sympathetic, let it be to put a squarehead out of his misery—you will be doing him and yourself a good turn at the same time. (Laughter.) You will certainly know what it feels like to drive that bayonet home and get it out again; you will feel that you will like to go on killing. You are here to work on that idea and to work damned hard.

"PRETEND TO SURRENDER.

"At the moment I have in mind the case of a young officer who was with his men in a newly-taken position at Bullecourt . . . You may have run out of ammunition, and all you have to depend upon is the bayonet, and the next thing to happen is a counter-attack. In the case of this young officer, he was in that predicament, and he saw coming towards him no less than four lines of Germans.

"The young officer said, 'Well it's either them or us.' And this is where the eye and brain came in. He passed down the word that the moment the 'boche' got near they were to jump on the parapet and hold their hands and rifles up (a pretence of surrender). When the word 'charge' was given, they had to fly into them with the bayonet.

"And they flew into them, too! They charged through the first line, into the second line, by which time the third and fourth line had got the wind up. What remained of the first, second and third, rushed back on to the fourth line; then the whole lot lost control and tried to rush back to where they had come from, made a mess of it, ran into their own wires and were annihilated by our artillery. That officer by his quickness of brain, saved the day and his men's lives as well. That's what we want you to be able to do . . .

"Don't forget that the Germans, when they advance, do not come on in tens and twenties, but in their thousands, and you have got to kill or be killed. Don't think, as the Rev. Meyer says, that 'two blacks don't make a white.' Get sympathy out of your head. We washed sympathy out of the service years ago. We go out to kill. We don't care how, so long as they are killed, and so effectively put out of action.

"I can assure you that it is a funny feeling that creeps down your spine just before you go over the top. (Laughter.) . . . Then came the order 'prepare to advance.' We caressed that bayonet between our fingers and we got ready to do things, and the moment that we were over the top all fear vanished.

"Bloody work had got to be done by us and we did it. (Cheers.) And it is always the case. Your main object is to meet the enemy. You go straight forward looking for somebody to kill with your bayonet—in the neck, in the eye, in the lungs—the whole job is to get the point in and get it out quickly.

"I have heard of one man accounting for thirteen Germans with his bayonet. I know a case of an N.C.O. in charge of a patrol surprised by Germans. The first thing that the N.C.O. did was to take a flying leap and get his man in the arm, then withdrew and went for the next and got him fairly in the heart. When it was over and he came back, his chums asked him if he knew what he had done. He said that he did not, but added that he believed he had killed one man and made the other wish that he had not come out. (Laughter.) Of course, he had gone mad, and he said, 'I felt that I could go on killing.'

'FINISH OFF' WOUNDED GERMANS.

"That is the spirit to have—to keep on killing. He had cut out sympathy. And I say to you: if you see a wounded German shove him out and have no nonsense about it. We are going to have no sympathy with Germans at any rate.

"What is the use of a wounded German, anyway? He goes into hospital and the next thing that happens is that you meet him again in some other part of the line. That's no good to us, is it? So when you see a German laid out, just finish him off. Don't trust him any further than you can see him. Remember that the next thing that will happen if you don't is that he will put a bullet into you or one of your chums while he has the strength to do it. The only time that a German can find pluck to kill with the bayonet is when he comes across one of our own wounded; he will plunge the steel into their hearts as they lie unable to defend themselves. When you see this done, can you have any sympathy for them? No! Ten thousand times no! Kill them every mother's son of them. Remember that your job is to kill them—that is the only way — exterminate the vile creatures! . . .

"Take this game seriously. Remember that there are men in France who are fighting and laying down their lives while, in comparison, we are here in clover, in safety, and are getting our eight hours' sleep each night. They curse a bit, but really they do their work most cheerfully. They know that you are coming out to help them, and when you go we want you to be able to teach them how to murder that vile animal called a German. Then try and experience what it is to have the feeling of the warm blood trickling over your hands . . .

"Get hold of your men; whatever you say, see that it is done. But whatever you do, see that these men are taught to kill. We are going to teach those German curs their manners, and we have to do it and will do it. They don't know them. The more of them we kill the better. If a Frenchman calls you 'comrade' he is a comrade. But when a German says 'Kamerad' you know that he wants to be put out of his agony. (Laughter.)

"GERMAN PRISONERS KILLED.

"I remember a corporal saying to me, pointing to some German prisoners close by, 'Can I do these blokes in, Sir?' I said, 'Please yourself.' He did. When the corporal came back he said, 'I felt something that I have never felt before—and I have been in Dartmoor too. (Laughter) I felt what it is like to kill; but it's damned hard to get it out. God! He had a belly like iron.' (More Laughter.)

"I remember once disobeying orders in France. I got permission to go salvaging in High Wood—actually I wanted to go up and see the show . . . When the show died down I carried on with my salvaging task, and I picked out no less than five German bodies with British bayonets still in them. The bayonets were in their guts! There is an unfortunate tendency with a Britisher to go for a German belly—I suppose that it is to let the lager out. (Laughter.) But it shows a lack of direction and withdrawal. When I saw this I thought that there was good food for reflection; I saw that one had not only put the bayonet right in, but he had got the nosecap in as well. (Laughter.) The spirit was there, but skill was not. It is always advisable to avoid the stomach, for you are not likely to get out quickly enough to deal with anyone else who is likely to be coming along.

"Now a closing word. Don't be afraid to die. Go forward, chance your luck; you will come out in the end. Keep your mind employed and you won't think of what might happen."

THE COMMANDING OFFICER (Lieut.-Col. H. L. Stevens, D.S.O.): "I wish to express my very cordial thanks to Sergt.-Major Franklin for his speech . . . I hope that you will all bear in mind what he has said to you and that you will all try and act up to it, not only in his department but in all the other departments while you are here. I call for three cheers for Sergt.-Major Franklin."

The Colonel's call was answered with three resounding cheers.

CONCERNING SPAIN

The following letter concerning Spain has been received by our Comrade Ethel MacDonald from Comrade Russel Blackwell (otherwise Negrete) who was arrested and imprisoned by the Stalinists in Barcelona:

Miami, Florida, U.S.A.
April 4, 1939.

Dear Ethel,

. . . As you know I spent 9½ months in the prisons of Cuenca, Madrid and Valencia, the Stalinists accusing me of everything from Mayhem to treason, and it is a near miracle that I got out at all. This morning's papers report the execution of Apellaniz, Stalinist Cheka chief in Valencia. He was the most infamous of the whole murderous crew and appears to have killed more than one of our comrades.

I could get no information about the Smillie case while in Valencia prisons, although I was informed that the British Consul was largely responsible, inasmuch as he knew about it and did nothing (this from an excellent reliable source). Consul's name was Sullivan, a Fascist sympathiser, so it seems. The prisoners in Barcelona were all freed by the comrades before the flight. The Stalinists were so anxious to save their hides that they did not take the necessary time out to kill them before leaving, as we feared they might. I feel the same as you do regarding the comrades that we have lost in Spain. At the same time, as you say, it is useless to shed tears over them. The best tribute is to carry on, not with stupid heroics, but intelligently, analysing what has happened, the why and the wherefore thereof. Next time it must not happen the same way. It need not have happened this time. I believe it can be prevented next time.

In the period after you left Barcelona, I was extremely depressed. It hurts to see a revolution cut to pieces before your eyes and feel helpless about it all. At that time I felt frustrated and helpless, and the future looked very dark. But the trip that I took to the southern and central provinces and the last weeks in Barcelona itself gave me a different impression however, and convinced me that the Spanish movement is NOT dead; that it is still one of the most powerful revolutionary movements; and that it is already commencing to draw the lessons that can bring it victory to-morrow. True, most of the older revolutionary generation has been killed in the struggle and the south of Spain has been decimated. But even so, those that are left, are not (I speak of the last weeks of 1938 when everyone knew that military defeat was inevitable) licked. Those that survive Franco's slaughter, both those that continue in Spain and those that get away into France—and for whom we must find a semi-permanent haven abroad—have a lot of fighting spirit left. Spain will continue to ferment. Franco cannot consolidate a true Fascist regime without tremendous internal convulsions. I know that you do not agree with us on the question of the party, although you did on the question of proletarian power—in general. It is necessary now to draw the final conclusion. Think of the different situation that we might have had if the FRIENDS OF DURRUTI, which held more or less your position, had understood the question of the vanguard party, and had stepped forward boldly giving active leadership in the struggle for power. Had this been done in May, history might have been of victory instead of defeat. We might have been defeated in the end anyway because of the international set-up, but even so, we should have gone much further on the road to workers' rule. There was a chance of victory if power had been seized in May. By rejecting the role of vanguard, the FRIENDS OF DURRUTI only contributed unconsciously to the perpetuation of a policy that meant inevitable ultimate defeat. I should not say ultimate though, for, as I have already stated, it is not finished historically.

. . . I have a hunch that the next revolutionary struggle in Europe will be in Spain . . . One of the main jobs of the international movement is to help the Spanish comrades reconstitute the revolutionary movement. The central task here is to create a vanguard organisation, through a regroupment. The real revolutionists of the F.A.I., J.J.L.L., P.O.U.M., and Left S.P. should be rallied around a new organisation, a new banner unbesmirched by class collaboration and betrayal. This task is generally understood by many Spanish comrades, including leading people in the F.A.I. I have spoken with many of them over the country and do not consider it an impossible development. Many of the comrades who have participated in the struggle at the front, especially the younger ones, would welcome such a development. It is the only road to victory to-morrow, but while it is open there is no room for us to be demoralised . . Revolutionary greetings to yourself and comrades,

RUSSELL BLACKWELL.

Fascism or Democracy: Which?

THE STORY OF THE AUSTRIAN LOAN.

In Britain we enjoy democracy. Our administration expresses the civilized idea of Government by and through debate. We are opposed to violence and to annexation. The taking-over of Austria by Germany, the march of the Fascist army annoyed and startled us. It was not democracy. The Labour Party leaders, and the Communist Party leaders, wanted us to march to war on Germany to revenge this march into Austria. Chamberlain was condemned for surrendering or betraying Austria. Superficially, the argument seemed plausible. Fundamentally, it was false Not Fascist Germany, but democratic Britain, destroyed the independence of Austria. That destruction was supported in the House of Commons by Walton Newbold, when he was Communist M.P. for Motherwell. At that time, Willie Gallacher was not an M.P., he was a hanger-on of Newbold, always to be found on the terrace or in the lobbies of the House of Commons, getting notes for articles to prove that Newbold represented the interests of the working-class.

If the reader will look up Hansard for 1922, he will find an official report of the speech delivered in House of Commons in December of that year, supporting the Austrian loan. Newbold, at that time, spoke and acted in the same capacity as Gallacher acts to-day:—

(1) He was amenable to the discipline of the Communist Party, controlled from Moscow.

(2) He gave expression to the C.P. policy of attempting to secure affiliation to the Labour Party.

And he received the applause of Willie Gallacher, not yet a Member of the House.

Said Mr. Newbold to the House of Commons:—

"I give my general support to this matter of the loan to Austria."

Supporting the loan, he proceeded to show that he did not support the League of Nations:—

"I regard the League of Nations with disgust and abhorrence."

And so say all of us! At a later date, Moscow discovered that it was an error to regard the League of Nations with disgust and abhorrence. Its tame spokesmen were taught to eulogise the League of Nations, to view it with approval and regard.

Newbold proceeded to expose the corrupt character of the loan, and explained that Sir Henry Strakosch, the chairman of the Financial Section of the League of Nations, which became the supreme power, under the terms of the loan, in turning the screw upon Austria, was also a director of the Anglo-Austrian Bank, which was to benefit directly from the loan.

"There is an attempt being made on the Continent of Europe to take away the State monopoly on tobacco and put it in the hands of two tobacco companies—one British and the other American—if it is possible to distinguish the two. They desire to exploit Austria, France and Italy in the same manner as they are exploiting Turkey, Greece, and other countries."

Read that passage and then consider the attitude of Germany towards the peace invitation of the United States President. Consider the attitude of the capitalist press in Britain and the United States towards the German invasion of Austria. Ask yourself what the working-class democracy in Britain and the United States has in common with the great tobacco companies of Britain and the United States?

In supporting the Austrian loan, Mr. Newbold, spokesman for the Communist Party, the elect of the working folk of Motherwell, knew that he was aggravating the hardships and privations of the Austrian people. The Government White Paper, containing the agreement and protocols respecting the loan, specifically averred that the position of the Austrian people would be rendered harder during the period of "reform" which the leading Powers — the Anti-Germanic Powers — would enforce. The Financial Committee of the League of Nations stated in this precious official document, which was read and approved by the elect and elected of British democracy:—

"The period of reform itself, even if the new credits are forthcoming, will necessarily be a very painful one. The longer it is deferred the more painful it must be. At the best the conditions of life in Austria must be worse next year, when she is painfully re-establishing her position, than last year, when she was devoting loans intended for that purpose to current consumption without reform.

"The alternative is not between continuing the conditions of life of last year or improving them. It is between enduring a period of perhaps greater hardship than she has known since 1919 (but with the prospect of real amelioration — therefore the happier alternative), or collapsing into a chaos of destitution and starvation, to which there is no modern analogy outside Russia.

"There is no hope for Austria unless she is prepared to endure and support an authority which must enforce reforms entailing harder conditions than those at present prevailing, knowing that in this way only can she avoid an even worse fate."

The purpose of this loan, supported by Walton Newbold, whilst Communist M.P. and the pet of the Communist Party was to impose a British financial stranglehold on Austria, and so revive Austrian Capitalism as the subsidiary of British Capitalism; to establish a British financial dictatorship over people, who were literally dying of hunger in Austria; over children whose physique was mortally impaired in many instances; and seriously undermined where they promised to survive actual death. Austria was to become a nation of organised corpses and impoverished invalids for the purposes of this loan and in the interests of absentee speculators.

Newbold realised that the loan was made to save Austrian Capitalism for British exploitation, and not to serve the starving poor of Austria. He told the House of Commons in this amazing speech:—

"Nothing worth mentioning has been done in this House to save the starving children of Vienna. But when it comes to a matter of saving the credit of the country, which has been aptly described as the nerve-centre of finance, immediately we find the League of Nations and this House all agog, at a moment's notice."

Realising all this, Walter Newbold, Communist M.P., with the blessing of Moscow and the earnest loyal seconding of Willie Gallacher outside the House, supported the Austrian loan of 1922.

The British White Paper made one of the conditions of the loan that Austria must establish "an efficient gendarmerie." The Austrian representative was forced to give this pledge to British Capitalism:—

"The Austrian Government will take all measures to ensure the maintenence of public order."

This Austrian loan was devised with a two-fold object: firstly, to stabilise capitalism in Austria with the aid of foreign control and foreign money, and so stave off European Revolution; secondly to retain Austria as the milch cow of the victorious Allied Capitalists, especially those resident in Britain and the British Empire.

This loan destroyed Austria's economic and political independence during the projected period of financial control, governed by the loan. No definite term was set to this period of control. The idea was to make it permanent. From the loan agreement, and the documents appertaining to it, we quote this passage:—

"The functions of the Commissioner-General shall be brought to an end by a decision of the League of Nations, when the Council shall have ascertained that the financial stability of Austria is assured, without prejudice to any special control of the assets assigned for the service of the loan."

The programme of reform dictated by the controlling authority and sanctioned by the League of Nations had to be adopted by the Austrian Government, as a condition of the loan, and voted by the Austrian Parliament, which was compelled to accept the programme, as an ultimatum, en bloc, and had no further say in the matter. The vote of the Austrian Parliament, thus given under duress, conferred on the Government "full powers to take decisions of every kind in agreement with the controlling authority."

The controlling authority saw the "Reform" programme carried out. It inspected the accounts of the Austrian Government departments. The controlling authority consisted of a committee of the guarantor Government and a Commissioner-General. The League of Nations was the Court of Appeal.

Every item of the Austrian public expenditure was dictated. Drastic reductions in pensions and social services were ordered. It was ordered, also, that the subventions to local authorities to assist them in paying their officials on the basis of the cost of living index were to cease.

The Austrian Government was made to surrender all right to issue paper money. It was not permitted to negotiate or conclude loans, except under the consent of the Commissioner-General. It was ordered that the Austrian State Bank of Issue be handed over entirely to private enterprise, and become autonomous in its relations with the Austrian Government. Through this bank the Austrian Government was compelled to carry out all its cash transactions. The bank had to present its balance sheets to the Commissioner-General.

The gross receipts of Austria's Customs, tobacco monopoly, and, "if the Commissioner-General should deem them necessary," other assets also, had to be paid into a special account controlled by the Commissioner-General to assure the service of the annuity of the loan. All Austria's State industries were ordered over to foreign enterprise.

One of the first things to be done with the loan, for which Austria was compelled to surrender her independence, was to repay to the controlling Powers the loans they had already made.

As a result of these coercive measures, the usurious Powers hoped "it may well prove that the guarantees eventually involve no actual cash liability upon the guarantors."

In other words, a cheap dictatorship over Austria was established by Britain, through the medium of "Government by Debate" at Westminster, and to the entire ignorance of the working-class electorate in Britain.

Why was no protest made against such "Fascism," and such very real invasion of Austria?

A. R. P.

WHAT ARE YOU DOING ABOUT IT?

A.R.P. activity is endorsed and supported by all parliamentarians: by the Tory Party, the Liberal Party, the Labour Party, and the Communist Party. A.R.P. can never protect the common people.

Against aerial attack and poison gas there is no protection. Gas masks are useless. Cellars finally are death-traps and tombs, into which heavy poisonous gases must penetrate ultimately. Pacts and conferences and statesmen-exchanged scraps of paper can never stop war. The people can organise to resist war.

The only way to avert war is for the common people to let the Governments know that they will resist war.

The duty of the common man and woman is to live without fear. If death comes, accept it. But do not create death from fear of death.

Vol. 1. No. 3. JUNE, 1939. Price : TWOPENCE

GLASGOW'S "SOCIALIST" LORD PROVOST

DOLLAN: THEN AND NOW

"Hoots, he's nae worth the heedin', that lad. He's anybody's dog for a biscuit."

In these terms of contumely and derision, the old Scot's saw defines the political opportunist. It expresses the limit of rural contempt for the type of man who uses radicalism as a stepping stone to a seat in the House of Lords, and Socialism as an excuse to become Prime Minister in the Westminster National pool. The phrase is used in times of crisis to point scorn at John Bunyan's Mr. Facing Both Ways. Lord Provost Dollan must have employed it more than once in those days, when, as "Myner Collier" he became an outside contributor to the columns of the Forward. To-day, reviewing his attitude during the Great War, as a conscientious objector; and his conduct now, as Lord Provost and recruiting sergeant; many Socialists recall the phrase and apply it to him.

Writing in Forward for April 22, 1939 Walton Newbold drew attention to the war-time attitude of Emmanuel Shinwell and Herbert Morrison, and also to the caption that appeared in the Daily Herald, for April 15 last:—"Biggest Show By Military Since War." Newbold was prompted by this headline

"to enquire whether the Lord Provost, who is stated to be acting as 'co-ordinating officer,' is any relation to P. J. Dollan. If I remember aright, he must now be well over military age, but I have an idea that, some twenty-two years ago, he was seeking exemption from military service."

Since his election as Lord Provost, Dollan has been most active, reviewing territorial units, and recruiting for national service. The Evening Times, Glasgow, for Monday, May 29, 1939, published a small paragraph as follows:—

"SINGING FOR RECRUITS.

"Sir Harry Lauder Does His Bit.

"Famous Scots comedian Sir Harry Lauder is the latest National Service recruiting sergeant. When Lord Provost P. J. Dollan, of Glasgow, was addressing a National Service meeting in the Lorne Cinema, Kinning Park, last night, he saw Sir Harry in the audience, and insisted that he come to the platform.

"Then Sir Harry made his appeal in his own way. First of all he sang 'Put your faith in the Motherland.' Then he made a few typical Lauder remarks in which he told the Lord Provost to continue his work for National Service and 'Keep right on to the end of the road.' Then Sir Harry sang the song which he has made famous throughout the world."

Harry Lauder sang for recruits during the Great War. He also sang for conscripts. In those days, Thomas Johnston was busily engaged trying to persuade Socialists that George Barnes had not "sold out." When Barnes denounced "class-consciousness," and announced his willingness to leave the Labour Party, and identified himself with Lloyd George, Carson, Curzon, Milner, and Bonar Law, Johnston announced, in Forward, for September 1, 1917, that he felt it "almost as a personal blow."

In the same "War Points," Johnston attacked Cunningham Graham who, in the Glasgow Herald, declared that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald is licking stamps for "his German friends." What wit! Johnston listed and ridiculed the Labour leaders who had been made Commanders of the O.O.T.B.E. for recruiting:—

"J. T. Brownlie and R. Young, of the Engineers; A. Bellamy, of the Railwaymen; Miss Margaret Macmillan, James Sexton, and (as sure as death!) Havelock Wilson, Jimmy Brown, and David Gilmour (of the Scottish Miners); F. Chandler (of the Carpenters and Joiners); E. L. Poulton (of the Boot and Shoe Operatives); W. C. Robinson (of the Beamers, described as 'a Labour candidate'); Stewart Bunning (of the Postmen); and Ben Turner (of the Textile Workers)."

Johnston culled from the Daily Telegraph some of the Statutes and Ordinances of the Order. The Labour Commanders were entitled to wear "upon all great and solemn occasions a purple riband and badge of the breadth of one inch and three-quarters passing from the right shoulder to the left side. 'The medal of the Most Excellent Order is to be silver, having on the obverse a representation of Britannia within the circle, and motto of the Order, and on the reverse Our Royal and Imperial Cypher, and shall be worn on the left side suspended by a ring to a purple riband of one inch and one sixteenth of an inch in width'."

And so Johnston felt that these persons were in the same category as the Roberts, the Thomases, and the Hodges. To-day, he does not seem to be in a much better category himself! Dollan was in a different category entirely.

The story was told partly in Forward for September 8, 1917, in the "War Points":—

"Everybody knows that the Glasgow Town Council Labour Party is being steadily and effectively cleared out. Dollan and George Smith are in jail: others are in the army: others again, like Angus McDougall, are in work of 'national importance.' . . . Some of the Labour representatives—P. J. Dollan and George Smith, for example—are temporarily absent through no fault or laxity of their own. . . .

"As we expected, the Court of Session has turned down Councillor P. J. Dollan's appeal against the importation into his military exemption certificate of a stipulation that he must find work 50 miles from Glasgow, or in other words, that he must get himself so far off that he will be unable to harry Town Clerks, Lord Provosts, Profiteers and the like.

"The trial is adequately summed up in the 'Glasgow Herald's' paragraph:

'The Court without calling on counsel for the respondent, dismissed the appeal, with seven guineas' expenses.'

"And the lawyers are £100 or thereby the richer, and the I.L.P. £100 or thereby the poorer, and Dollan hies himself off again to jail or to some work of national non-importance under a Home Office Committee. Until the war is over, the local Capitalists are relieved of his presence, and as a sort of final send-off the local Magistrates prohibit a public meeting of protest."

At this time, Harry Lauder was busy boosting the war, in company with the then Lord Provost of Glasgow, now dead and forgotten. When we read John S. Clarke's article, urging war, in the Glasgow Evening News for April 28, 1939, we recall the attacks he made on Lauder during the war years. Clarke continued his attacks when the war had concluded. In the Worker for October 9, 1920, before he had sold out to the Capitalist class via the Town Council and the House of Commons, Clarke denounced Lauder as and attacked the Glasgow papers for printing "nearly a whole column of the senseless drivel that Sir Harry Lauder vomited at his presentation in the Grand Hotel last Friday."

"Harry resembles a Labour fakir in lots of ways. Both are types of the working class who have used that class as a stepping stone into the class above. One pretends to represent the worker in the House of Commons or as a union official, and makes use of both positions to become absolutely bourgeois at the workers' expense.

"The other tickles the ears of the pious by preaching in various pulpits, and charms the impious by stimulating drunken debauchery on the stage ('I'm fou the noo') in order to do precisely the same. Both succeed, and succeeding, scorn the people to whom they owe their 'success.'

"Both flatter themselves that they have 'got on' by virtue of their own amazing brilliance (compare the brag of J. H. Thomas, for instance, with Lauder's assurance that 'all the good things of life wouldn't have come to him had he not deserved them'), and both cherish the belief that any twaddle they care to utter is accepted as the deepest of wisdom. Look, for example, at the callous self-sufficiency of a man who, after the bloody savagery responsible for millions upon millions of deaths, and in a time when millions upon millions are hungering in Europe, when a sordid, furtive war is being carried on against Ireland and Russia, when angry murmurs of complaint are arising from the industrial world and the poor of earth are poorer than ever they were, can talk like this:

"'Harry concluded with a "warm welcome" to his old friends to look him up at the Glen. He painted a glorious word picture of the pool where the water is as clear as crystal, and "man, the world's a bonnie place".'

"'Man, the world's a bonnie place.' What a host of comfort there is in such words to the broken ex-service men who followed Lauder's advice and fought for the 'bonnie place.' 'God's in his heaven, all's right with the world.' Sir Harry might live to see the day when he'll lose more than his hair."

The first Saturday in July, 1926, thousands listened in to Harry Lauder broadcasting. Introducing topical subjects, he regretted the miners' dispute and expressed the hope that it would soon end, as there were thousands of miners anxious to get back to work. Lauder forgot to mention the fact that the mine-owners were preventing the miners from working, because they refused to pay them sufficient wages to keep body and soul together. The mine-owners were responsible for the strike, not the miners. Harry, being a theatrical artist, and as such, an extreme reactionary, did not face this point. His sympathies were with the owners, although his theatrical success had depended upon the patronage of the workers. To them he owed his livelihood and the Glen!

This is the man whom Dollan, being Lord Provost, salutes at a public meeting and invites to the platform.

Says the Evening Times for May 29, commenting on its own news item:—

"When the Lord Provost, along with Sir Alex. Swan and Sir Harry Lauder, who were the speakers, left about 10 p.m. they were cheered by crowds in the streets.

"Mr. Dollan told me to-day that this was the most popular demonstration that has been witnessed during the A.R.P. campaign. But, he added, Kinning Park still needs 230 wardens to fulfil its quota."

There were no A.R.P. wardens then, but substantially, this is the kind of patriotic rallying that the then Lord Provost of Glasgow did in 1914, and during the years of the Great War in which Mr. Dollan refused to serve. At that time exactly the same arguments were waged in support of organising the maximum defence for the Clydeside as are put forward to-day by the present Lord Provost in the columns of Forward and on the various platforms on which he speaks. It is for Mr. Dollan to explain how he was right in scorning the defence of the country in 1914-18 whilst to-day he is so stern on the necessity of doing so. Either he is right to-day or he was wrong in 1914-18. There is another explanation, namely, that it is impossible to become the Lord Provost of a city, even a "Socialist" Lord Provost, without being caught up in the network of Capitalist Imperialism.

SOLVED IN WEST FIFE.

Willie Gallacher, not yet M.P., wrote in his "Political Notes," contributed to The Worker (No. 302) for September 6, 1924, with a parade of big type:—

"THE BIG QUESTION.

"The all-important question before every little creature who is parading around with a bellyful of shoddy politics is, 'How to get a constituency and a seat in Parliament'."

And now—the all-important question for Willie is how to keep that seat!

CONSCRIPTION—WITH CIGARETTES!

Down With The Conchies — New C.P. Line

The new C.P. slogan is: "Cigarettes for Conscripts." This is the neo-Leninist programme for a democratic army. Step by step, the Communist Party has moved towards its goal of a conscript army. Whereas Lord Roberts and the Anti-Socialist Union used to urge conscription, and the Socialists were opposed, to-day a Labour Party in Opposition, aided by Communist Party jingo propaganda, has driven the National Government forward to Conscription. To-day, Conscription is on the Statute Book, and the Communist Party solemnly assures that it is opposed to conscientious objectors, and that its policy is cigarettes for our boys, the conscripts! The Stalinist rendering of: "Workers of the world, unite!"

In the Soviet Union, the Bolsheviks crushed all factions of the Socialist movement and murdered the Anarchists, that they might establish a Conscript Army, and stamp out Communism. In Italy, the Third International hirelings betrayed and sabotaged the Syndicalist struggle. In China, they recognised Chian-Kai-Shek, after he had murdered thousands of Communists in cold blood. In Germany, the official "Communists" allied themselves with National Socialism, and only opposed Hitler when it was too late to be effective. Back in the Soviet Union, having exterminated by murder and exile all other Socialist groups, the Communist Party went heresy-hunting in its own ranks. It passed from Leninism to Stalinism, and treated Trotsky, Zinoviev, Kamenev, Rykov, Bukharin, Rakovsky, etc., as Marx would have liked to have treated Bakunin. Properly Stalinised, the Party murdered its own leading members, men who had pioneered the revolution and served the party faithfully and laboriously for many years, in prison and in exile. Every murder was applauded by Gallacher, Pollitt, McShane, and the other hired hacks in Britain. In France, the C.P. United Front betrayed the workers in their strikes, and the Moroccans in their struggle towards freedom. The Spanish Revolution, despite all the rhetoric about the International Brigade, was sabotaged and betrayed directly by Moscow. The thousands who died in Spain, the masses now herded into French concentration camps, owe their situation to the cowardice and treachery of Moscow and its hirelings. The Soviet Union supplied oil to Franco, and supplied war material to Italy and Germany, knowing that these countries were actually conducting a Fascist and National Socialist invasion of Spain. The triumph of the Fascism they assisted was turned by the Communists into a pretext for a campaign in Britain for economic and military sanctions, a campaign bound to end in conscription. In the first years of the Russian Revolution, we had urged "Hands off Russia," meaning war against Capitalism in Britain in defence of the Soviet Union. The latter-day "Communists" replaced this with a cry for a "Peace Pact with The Soviet," knowing that conscription must result in Britain.

In the Weekly Worker for January 9, 1932, William Gallacher endeavoured to justify the C.P. disrupting the Glasgow Free Speech Council. The Anti-Parliamentarians wanted to organise this body into a genuine Council of Action. The effort was sabotaged by the "Communists" and their bogus organisations. Gallacher declared that "all the rottenest opportunists and parasitic elements in Glasgow got associated with this Council," meaning the Anti-Parliamentarians, who pioneered it, and the I.L.P. Since he and his colleagues afterwards attempted to form a united front with the I.L.P., actually he meant the Anti-Parliamentarians, whose aim was to establish a "constitution."

Gallacher did not want a constitution, because that would have meant organised working-class democracy, and have prevented the trick domination of the C.P. through fake sports organisations. He proceeded to denounce the Anti-Parliamentarians as being "of necessity enemies of the movement." Gallacher added that "when they saw they were going to be involved in a serious movement, the parliamentarians (meaning the I.L.P.—Ed.) and the anti-parliamentarians left the conference," etc.

The truth is Willie Gallacher and his colleagues feared that a serious movement would be established, and proceeded to destroy it by attempting to organise a purely bogus movement. The bogus Council was self-evidently bogus and passed out. It served the purpose of disgusting the workers with struggle.

Willie Gallacher is a degenerate time-server and careerist. Ever since the foundation of the Communist Party, under cover of violent language and revolutionary phraseology, he had done nothing but advance the cause of Fascism. His revolutionary understanding led him to applaud and canvass for Mosley, against the latter's wishes even. To-day, Gallacher's time-serving reaction is apparent to every student of the social problem, to every thinking worker in the struggle. John MacLean estimated Gallacher rightly.

In March, 1934, the New Leader, organ of the I.L.P., described Willie Gallacher as the "Professional Fierce Man of the Communist Party" and accused him of being unable "to state a case for his political views without wholesale lying." The writer suggested that it was hopeless to expect Gallacher ever to suffer "from the horrid disease of intellectuality." Commenting on the distance Gallacher would "travel for the sheer pleasure of telling another lie," the writer declared: "Inability to get within one hundred miles of the truth has always been one of his weaknesses."

John McGovern attacked Gallacher in the columns of the New Leader for September 20 and 27, 1935. In the first article, McGovern asked: "Will Willie Join Up?" This heading is of particular significance now.

McGovern declared that the Communist Party believed in action being taken by a collection of Capitalist Governments that called themselves a League of Nations. Since this League had no army, navy, nor air force, Britain would have to supply these forces and close the Suez Canal, if military sanctions were adopted against Italy, as demanded by the C.P. This meant war. In this event McGovern wanted to know:—

> ". . . will the members of the C.P. be advised to join the British Army, and will Harry Pollitt and Willie Gallacher offer to serve in the British Army?"

McGovern declared that Gallacher "and his fellow Communists are compelled to back this outrageously anti-working-class policy of collaboration with Capitalist Governments." He then asked Willie three questions and demanded a straight answer to each. The first two questions enquired if the C.P. wanted the National Government to apply sanctions against Italy, and to make and continue war, if sanctions resulted in war. The third question read:—

> "3. If so, does the C.P.intend to advise its members to join up in the British forces, and will Harry Pollitt, Gallacher, and other C.P. leaders offer their services to the Power or Powers making war on Italy?"

Accusing the C.P. of trying "to put a Hallowe'en false face upon its policy" of war, McGovern declared that "before the end of the war, there will be no Communist Party in this country." He explained to Gallacher:—

> "Whenever I speak I do you and Pollitt credit by saying that your war policy was not decided by you or your members, but was dictated to you from outside, and that I believe you must know it to be fundamentally wrong. Surely I could not be fairer than that."

McGovern was quite right to say that the C.P. policy was dictated to it from outside. In February, 1928, the Manchester Guardian published a message from its special correspondent at Moscow, Arthur Ransome. He reported the decision arrived at by the Plenary Session of the Executive Committee of the C.I. at its meeting on Saturday, February 17, instructing the C.P.G.B. to run Communist Party candidates in opposition to Labour Party and T.U. candidates at parliamentary elections. The Times reported that, "the British delegates, Mr. Campbell and Mr. Brown guaranteed that the 'Ikki' (the Third International Executive) would not be disappointed, and Mr. Gallacher promised to be loyal and energetic."

This instruction, which was carried out, was opposed entirely to the policy pursued at that time by the C.P. in Great Britain. The then current issue of The Communist contained a long statement, "the thesis of the Central Committee of the C.P.G.B." which, after much quotation from Lenin, and dialetic against the sham "left elements of the Wilkinson, Maxton, Lansbury type," concluded that the party must not oppose but support even MacDonald, Thomas, and Henderson. The British Executive said it must support these Right Leaders to command popularity among the workers. To-day, the C.P. supports Conscription for the same reason, and has evolved its masterly slogan: "Cigs for Conscripts!"

In Moscow, Bukharin would have none of this: and as he had not then reached the execution stage, Gallacher, Campbell & Co., promised to obey him, and to pursue a policy which their contemporary monthly declared "will strengthen the reformist leaders against the Communist Party." What a party!

Gallacher attempted a reply to McGovern by declaring that the C.P. demanded "that Britain becomes an effective part of a collective peace system."

McGovern translated this reply, in the New Leader for September 27, 1935, as meaning that Gallacher stood for Imperial war. He warned Gallacher:—

> "Be very careful of the road you are travelling, Willie. It is a dangerous, slippery path that will lead to disaster. I cannot believe that your rank and file will follow you on it. . . .
> "You are lining up behind the National Government, the League of Bandits, the T.U.C. leadership, the Labour Party and the Archbishops in demanding sanctions and war against Italy. You are therefore supporting Capitalists in a war which will be conducted for their aims and ends, and not yours. . . .
> "If the Communist Party continues to pursue its line of sanctions and war, I am afraid that, if they are logical, J. R. Campbell, Aitken Ferguson, Harry McShane, Peter Kerrigan, George Middleton, and many other C.P. spokesmen who served Capitalism in the 1914-18 war, will require to face the Italian workers in this prospective war."

McGovern's reference to Campbell, whose war career and subsequent use of it when he was accused of sedition, were disgraces to the Labour movement—was a shrewd hit!

Gallacher took a further step on the road predicted by McGovern when he laid a stone, one fine Wednesday in 1938, on the Peace Pavilion Cairn, at the Empire Exhibition, Glasgow. Welcome to Gallacher was extended by Colonel John Johnston, Vice-Chairman of the Peace Pavilion Committee. The next day, the Daily Worker published a sob-interview with Gallacher, who explained that the cairn he laid was "not only a landmark in the history of Scotland, but a landmark in the history of the world. It is a symbol of peace in the midst of continually recurring crisis, crisis that brings the black shadow of war and dread across the face of Europe."

It would be a blasphemy against decency to reproduce the rest of the rubbish spoken by Gallacher and reproduced by the Daily Worker; sheer, nauseating, undiluted hypocrisy. All this time the C.P., with Gallacher as its parliamentary representative, was pursuing the policy leading up to conscription. Declaring its opposition to conscription, the C.P. intrigued to place it on the Statute Book.

"Down with Conscription," said the Daily Worker of April 28, 1939. But the Soviet Union has conscription. Lenin secured some rights for conscientious objectors in 1920, and mitigated the lot of Dhookobors, a Tolstoyan sect opposed to militarism. After Lenin's death, their persecution became terrible. The French Communists supported conscription in France and urged it in Britain. The French Communist paper L'Humanité, in its issue for April 27, 1939, published an article which said:—

"It is impossible to contest the far-reaching effect of the British decision. Until it was taken, the guarantees given by Great Britain to Poland, Rumania and Greece were more symbolic than practical."

When Mr. Chamberlain quoted this in the House of Commons on the day of publication, Willie Gallacher said that he repudiated the French Communist who wrote the article. On the same day, when Colonel Wedgwood suggested that the Russian Government wanted conscription in Britain Gallacher said that "no matter what happens in any country I will stand by the workers of this country, and oppose conscription and oppose the Prime Minister."

At last conscription came!

In the Evening Times, Glasgow, for May 23, 1939, Harry McShane wrote from the local C.P. headquarters a letter to the editor, declaring that instead of resisting conscription, we must insist on the peace pact with the Soviet Union. McShane added:—

"Many of us who fought against the last war realise that the position to-day is very different from the position in 1914, and yet we find ourselves inclined to react as if nothing had changed. This accounts for the inclination to carry on the fight against conscription. Now that conscription is here it should be our job to make sure that the new Army becomes a force for peace and a check to the Fascist danger.

"I know that this will be looked upon as treason by some Socialists. Their attitude can only be explained by an under-estimation of the Fascist danger or a refusal to break with tradition. They cannot see that the future of Socialism is bound up with the struggle against Fascism. Some of them will never see it until they land in a concentration camp."

Another patriot! After all the C.P. pamphlets ridiculing and attacking the British Empire!

Of course, this was "the Party Line"! Pretending criticism of the National Government, the Daily Worker in its issue for May 27, 1939, declared in bold type:—"They are Our Boys." Which was obvious.

Quite an Horatio Bottomley touch—to boldly announce the obvious in rhetorical challenging terms of pride! Then came the advice: don't resist conscription but send the boys cigarettes! More Bottomley!

Let this powerful sagacious Communist editorial speak for itself:—

"Next Saturday the Youth who are liable for military training will register at the Labour Exchanges. A few days later many of them will commence training. . . .

"The great mass of the British people should make clear to the Government that it cannot get away with any moves aimed to make these boys the tools of political reaction.

"'Keep in touch with our lads,' must be the slogan of the working class. Why should not every trade union and youth organisation have its committee which will keep in touch with the boys, send them cigarettes, books and papers, and give them all the news from the workshops, and from the organisations of which they are members.

"In this way the comradeship between the people and the conscript army will be strengthened, and the way of the reactionaries rendered more difficult."

In other words, accept conscription!

In the same issue of the Daily Worker, the Central Committee of the C.P. addressed a statement to the delegates to the Conference of the Labour Party, which opened at the Garrick Theatre, Southport, on Monday, May 29, 1939. This statement said:

"Further, the futile policy of individual resistance to conscription should be firmly rejected. . . . The Labour Party cannot support any policy which means the abandonment of the mass of the conscripts to the reactionary military machine. The paramount task to-day is to carry on the fight for the democratisation of the armed forces," etc.

To oppose militarism, to refuse to fight for capitalism, to denounce war, is—to betray the working-class! To support war and militarism, and to call conscription a democratic army, is—to believe in the class-war and emancipate the workers! What logic! What Communism! What magnificent and what sorry reaction!

WALTON NEWBOLD EXPLAINS:

HIS SPEECH—HIS OWN: HIS VOTE—MOSCOW'S!

[J. T. Walton Newbold, formerly M.P. for Motherwell, who resigned from the Communist Party in 1924, has replied to the article published in the last issue of "The Word," commenting on the strange fact that, whilst he denounced the Austrian loan in one of the most powerful speeches made in Westminster, he voted for the loan and announced his intention of doing so to a somewhat surprised House.—Ed.]

Dear Guy Aldred,

It was good of you to send me a copy of the second number of The Word. It was good because it is essential that you should not continue in error and attribute to Willie Gallacher actions and ideas which may injure him, and of which he is—as in so many other respects he has always seemed to me—innocent as a babe new-born.

First, let me revert to the curious episode that intervened between my speech in opposition to the Treasury guarantee of the League of Nations Loan to Austria and my vote in its favour.

Indeed, I am glad that you have raised the matter from the dead and given me the timely opportunity to expose one of the most shameful of the relations of the Soviet Government with international finance capital. It was the discovery of those relations which caused me to cock my ears about one month later when, for the very first time, I went to take my seat on the Presidium of the Comintern.

I had spoken most strongly against the giving of the Guarantee and, then, gone round to the head office of the Communist Party to see Tom Bell. In the street doorway, I met the liaison between the Trade Delegation—through which messages and money were transmitted for the Comintern to the Communist Party of Great Britain, viz., Andrew Rothstein. With him was one of the Inkpins and I told them of the business before the House of Commons. To my astonishment I was instructed by Rothstein to vote for the Guarantee.

Years elapsed and I was sitting in Vienna with one of the managers of the Austrian Credit Austalt. It was the summer of 1930. I was a member of the MacMillan Committee on Finance and Industry and travelling on the letters of reference of Philip Snowden and of the Bank of England. I had broached the same query I put that summer to bankers in fourteen countries from the manager of the Clydesdale Bank in Scotland to the Governor of the National Bank of Hungary. Could he see any sign of an alleviation in the crisis, any "let up" of the depression? He was one of the only two out of more than twenty who believed he could—and, next year by that time, he was one of the more discredited directors of a house that had collapsed and that had come near to bringing down the biggest merchant banks propped up by the Bank of England.

He was most communicative about the big business and the complete satisfaction the house—controlled by Rothschilds—had in respect of financing trade with the Soviet Union!

To my certain knowledge—I lunched with the British liaison officer at his private house the day it re-opened after the crash of 1931 — the Darmstadter Bank had extended huge credits at long term to the Soviet Union.

More than that. I was returning from Warsaw, via Bucharest, Istambul, Athens, Belgrade, Vienna, and Prague in the weeks of the political crisis of August and September, 1931. I was doing so at my own charge and had with me letters of reference from eight banks in five countries, not to mention the good offices of two Government Departments in London and one in Paris and the foreign offices of all the members of the Little Entente and of Poland.

Two weeks before, Britain had gone off gold and the banking economists "threw a party" for me in Berlin. Ivan Kreuger's chartered accountant and myself got the economist of the Deutsche Bank in a corner and had a quiet talk. We found the amount that "Germany" had borrowed at three months and lent at five years to the Soviet Government.

When I got home I told the managing director of a banking house that was very hard hit by the collapse of the Austrian and German banks: "My friend! You have had your paws caught in the ice-box by the Bolsheviks!"

And, remembering Andrew Rothstein and his aunt, Zelda Kahn-Coates, wife of W. P. Coates, when I had a book to publish I invariably laid down the rule to my agent: "You must not take it to that very great publishing house." Its name need not be mentioned but it is said in the book trade to be in credit with the branch of the tribe that spread from Frankfurt to Vienna more than a hundred years before it financed the mass production of "Marxism."

Andrew had instructed me to vote a guarantee to the house of Rothschild and so to cheapen credit to the Soviet Union.

Andrew was a queer lad, but then so was his father, Theodore Rothstein. Very few of us knew that he was simultaneously Lenin's representative in London and Russian expert at the Foreign Office to A. J. (later Lord) Balfour.

Gallacher had nothing whatever to do with that vote of mine on the Austrian loan. Like me, he was very uncomfortable about it. But, then, Gallacher was always very uncomfortable about Rothstein, père et fils.

Now to another point. You write in all good faith but yet in the most profound error:—

"Newbold, at that time spoke and acted in the same capacity, as Gallacher to-day:

(1) He was amenable to the discipline of the Communist Party, controlled from Moscow."

The secret of my election at Motherwell in 1922 was one that it has all along seemed to me must have been self-evident to every intelligent observer in the West of Scotland. It was identical with that of the election at North Battersea of the only other member of the Communist Party standing then, and for long afterwards, who did not forfeit his deposit, viz., Shapurji Saklatvala when he responded to my invitation to come to Motherwell in November, 1918, that happened which put us both into the Imperial Parliament in 1922 . . . and made us anything but "amenable to the discipline of the Communist Party" — or of the Labour Party. MacDonald and Henderson found us both to be men with the means to persuade them respectively—one of us took the one and the other of us the other—of the desirability of not unduly hindering our return.

A very remarkable telegram was shown to the Secretary of the Motherwell Labour Party. It came from the National headquarters of the Labour Party and, whilst expressing inability to confirm the local party's endorsement, went on to say: "but do nothing to repudiate him."

That was good for three thousand votes. The balance of some five thousand was made up in the main by those who received something stronger than an assurance that my election would be acceptable to the President and Government of the Irish Republic. That message was communicated by a priest of the Church. Much the same thing happened at Battersea. Shapurji Saklatvala moved and I seconded in Imperial Parliament, the rejection of the Treaty with the bastard Irish Free State.

In 1924, J. H. Thomas became Secretary of State for the Dominions and was going to continue to negotiate for the Labour Party when in office with the Irish Free State. He was receiving too much attention from a lady in the county of Derby whose family had always sought to control the M.P. for the county town of Derby. As Lady Cynthia Mosley joined the platform party I reappeared on the floor of the Labour Party Conference from the High Peak of Derbyshire. Eighteen months later, I talked money to the Treasurer and the Secretary of the Labour Party, and in August (on successive Saturdays) I was unanimously selected as Labour Party candidate for the High Peak and sailed from Southampton to see Canada and the banks (not of Newfoundland but of New York) with a letter of recommendation from the member for Derby. Did I go forward for Derbyshire? No. In September, 1927, the Irish Labour Party and Sinn Fein failed by one seat to capture control of Dail Eireann and I dropped all attempts again to enter or influence the entry of others into your Imperial Parliament.

Now my address is in Eire.

Yours very truly,

WALTON NEWBOLD.

SO HORRIBLY UNTHINKABLE!

J. Ramsay MacDonald, speaking at the Inter-Parliamentary Union Congress, held in London, on July 23, 1930, said:—

"No nation can contemplate war and prepare for it. Science has subdued war by making the conditions of the next war so horribly unthinkable."

If by nation, Ramsay MacDonald meant the common people, this statement is quite true. The common people never contemplate war and never prepare it consciously. The common people simply drift and never think. But they work at munitions, serve reaction for wages, and so actually do prepare the way for war. Their actions are directed by the Governments, who do contemplate war and who prepare it callously and deliberately. Mostly these Governments are controlled by the armament firms, who organise a trinity of criminal error: they contemplate war; they propagate war; they prepare for war. The business of the armament firm, and the status of the statesmen under capitalism, are based on the promotion and propagation of war. These people are not deterred from their purpose by any contemplation of the horrors of modern war.

They know there is no glory in war. They know that war is not merely hell, but a foul indecent hell. They know the depths of that hell: culture and knowledge turned to crime; organisation devoted to murderous profit; mankind lower than swine; the brain of gods controlled and directed by the mind and vision of something less than beasts. War means filth—starvation—disease—crime. Death from science—by death rays! Death from torpedoes—directed by wireless! Death from liquid poison; from tanks and poison gas; from disease germs. Pestilences methodically prepared and deliberately launched on man and beast. Men, called savants, receiving wages for pursuing such depravity in the laboratories of civilisation's great countries, the Powers of Christendom. Blight to destroy crops; Anthrax to slay horses and cattle; Plague to poison whole districts and not just to defeat armies: such is military science, pursued by Governments, applauded by statesmen, defended by divines, and extolled and made possible by the money-lords of the armament ring.

The Rt. Hon. Winston Churchill, enemy of the Bolshevik Revolution, advocate of the 1939 Soviet Pact, knowing that wars mean this and are prepared for in this way, urged conscription to this end. Major-General F. D. Swinton described the invention of lethal rays to shrivel up and paralyse human beings, and accepted such preparation as normal, the natural lot, purpose, and destiny of humanity.

The United States Chemical War Service has discovered a deadly poison liquid, three drops of which on the skin, will kill a man, sending him to his grave after imposing on him a terrible agony. And then, of course, there are torpedoes, controlled by wireless, guided from the air, and able to change direction to follow victims.

Major-General Fuller, whom we knew in our Agnostic Journal days, when he was only a Captain, is a remarkable man in many ways. He is a student and a writer of force, as well as a soldier. For some unearthly reason he believes in war. But he has no illusions as to the meaning of war. He depicts the next war:—

"Fleets of fast moving tanks, equipped with tons of liquid gas, against which the enemy will have no possible protection, will cross frontiers and obliterate every living thing."

This is what war means. All horribly unthinkable! But contemplated and prepared. Ramsay MacDonald must have known that he was speaking nonsense when he pretended otherwise.

Captain Wright, sometime Assistant-Secretary to the Supreme War Council, wrote of Sir Henry Wilson, who was director of military operations at Army Headquarters when the war broke out:—

"Sir Henry had predicted and prepared for this war all his life. He had been over the ground upon which it was to be fought, time after time, on his bicycle, and, for example, had chosen the billets our headquarters were to occupy in one place."

Ramsay MacDonald found a place in his First Labour Government for Lord Haldane, as Lord Chancellor. Haldane was War Minister in the Liberal Government of 1906. On pages 31-35 of Before the War, he described how the Great War was prepared in advance, having been fully organised and anticipated:—

". . . Anyhow, we fulfilled our contract, for at 11 o'clock on Monday morning, August 3, 1914, we mobilised, without a hitch, the whole of the expeditionary force, amounting to six divisions and nearly two cavalry divisions, and began its transport over the Channel, when war was declared six hours later.

". . . The navy was already in its war stations, and there was no delay at all in putting what we had prepared into operation."

The nation, meaning the ruling class, had contemplated and prepared for war.

The Glasgow evening press, on May 6, 1913, reported the speech made that day in Glasgow by Field-Marshal Lord Roberts, V.C., to the City Fathers. Here is an excerpt:—

"I seem to see in the near distance the gleam of the weapons and accoutrements of this army of the future, this Citizen Army, the wonder of these islands, and the pledge of the peace and the continued greatness of this Empire."

To-day, "Bob's" dream of National Service is realised. Britain is a conscript nation. The conscription is not seriously opposed by the Labour Party, the Communist Party, or the Trade Unions. Lord Roberts was supposed by the reactionaries to have made a great speech. Actually, he expressed an ugly common-place anticipation of horror and oppression, ending through misery, in hopeless calamity—the calamity of war-preparedness after war, and conscription for unending wars. The common people, even the so-called Socialists among them, have accepted the horror as inevitable, even though the interval between Lord Roberts' speech and its realisation, treated the world to a war, which during its course, and in the process of its aftermath, presented such astounding contrasts of reward for services rendered and sufferings endured.

Here are two cuttings from the Sunday Express, for October 12, 1932:—

"Attending the D.C.M. League rally at Blackpool was a hero who is now living on 13s. 6d. a week. He is the oldest living holder of the D.C.M., ex-Corporal Harry Hampton, aged 78, of Leicester St., Bolton."

"Viscount Byng of Vimy Ridge is resting quietly at his Essex home at Thorpe-le-Soken. He received a gift of £30,000 in 1919 for meritorious war services."

This gift did not include pensions, or normal reward due to rank, at time of retirement from the armed forces. Byng did not stand alone in his enjoyment of a special gift over and beyond his ordinary emoluments. His name is to be found in a list, which includes other persons of rank. Each person named received, apart from, and in addition to, his pension, a sum free, gratis, and for nothing, as the special gift of a "grateful country." The sums each received range from £100,000 to £10,000. Here are some of Byng's colleagues in the financial honours list:—

(1) £100,000—Admiral Beatty and Field Marshal Haig.

(2) £50,000—Admiral Jellicoe and Field Marshals French and Allenby.

(3) £30,000—Field Marshal Plumer and Generals Rawlinson and Home.

(4) £25,000—Lt.-Col. Hankey.

(5) £10,000—Admirals Madden and Sturdee; Rear-Admiral Keyes, Vice-Admiral de Roeback; Commander Tyrwhitt; Field-Marshal Wilson; Generals Robertson and Birdwood; and Air Vice-Marshal Trenchard.

In addition to the special gift mentioned, and the ordinary pensions of rank, many of these persons received titles and other honours.

Now consider what plain Tommy Atkins, Kipling's "good 'un" received at the conclusion of the war. He was not ennobled. He received no special gifts. He received no capital sum: only a weekly dole, served out in shillings. Here is Private Tommy Atkin's financial honours' list, to find a place in which he had to exhibit evidences of suffering:—

Shillings.	Disablement or Condition.
(1) 40	—Permanently disabled; totally paralysed; mad; blinded.
(2) 36	—Lost right arm.
(3) 32	—Lost leg; struck dumb.
(4) 28	—Lost nearly all leg; struck deaf; lost left arm.
(5) 24	—Lost half-leg; lost most of left arm.
(6) 20	—Lost less than half-leg; lost one eye.

(8) 16	—Lost right thumb or four fingers.
(9) 12	—Lost left thumb or four fingers.
(10) 8	—Lost two fingers; lost toes below knuckles.

What a callous calculated gradation of compensation for misery! What finesse of brutality! In MacDonald's phraseology, so horribly unthinkable! But contemplated and prepared! Fact! For this doom are our conscripts being prepared.

MacDonald said no nation could contemplate a next war and prepare for it. Let us leave Britain out of our calculations and ignore all the Europeans who are contemplating and preparing for a next war. Let us consider the United States of America.

Take the post-war years, and note the increases:

Fiscal Year	War Department.	Air Corps.
1921	$292,886,375	$32,332,907
1930	$327,363,054	$59,981,778
1932	$344,610,560	$72,491,915
1936	$382,654,083	$85,836,332
1937	$394,095,800	$96,872,333
1938	$393,460,400	$101,851,424

What is this but contemplation of, and preparation for the horribly unthinkable?

If the world is to be redeemed from war, the peoples of the earth must rid themselves of statesmen and parliamentarians, who dabble in panics, that the horribly unthinkable might become commonplace, miserable, disastrous facts.

BART DE LIGT'S WORK

The last organisation Bart de Ligt started, in close association with his wife, was the International Peace Academy. The first Summer School organised by the I.P.A. in France suggested that there was much usefulness in this work. Mrs. C. L. de Ligt-van-Rossem is continuing the work, and is organising a new International Summer School in Switzerland. She hopes to have a good group present of English-speaking participants. The period is August 1st to August 12th.

The Château de Greng, by the Lac de Morat, Neuchâtel, has been chosen and the students will meet in lovely surroundings with splendid opportunities for exploring the beautiful country.

The aim of the Peace Academy is to discover what may be the general tendency of a new social order; how this tendency will express itself in the different aspects of social life; and what are the necessary conditions for the development of a new social order. The harmony of ends and means will form the background of the whole course.

"Towards a new psychological and social Outlook" is the subject given. Basic psychological, educational and moral factors will be dealt with, and also political, economic and social conditions.

The daily programme is very simple; and it is a fact that very moderate terms have been arranged for board and lodgings for the twelve-day course. There is accommodation for campers. Applications for enrolment should be made as soon as possible to: Mrs. C. L. de Ligt, Petit-Lancy, Geneva, Switzerland, or to Mr. R. H. Ward, 10 Abbey Gardens, London, N.W.8.

Bart de Ligt's work is being carried on through these Summer Schools and reaching out throughout the world as a result of the associations formed.

"THE CONQUEST OF VIOLENCE."

Published at 7/6; now sold at 3/6

This magnificent and most complete work by the famous Dutch anti-militarist will be reviewed at length in the next issue of "The Word." Those interested in the anti-war struggle should secure a copy of this work at its specially reduced price.

CONSCRIPT CUTTING AND COMMENT

Bailie A. H. Porter presided over a meeting of individual members and affiliated organisations of the No Conscription League held in the McLellan Galleries, Glasgow, on Tuesday, May 16. The meeting was reported fully in Forward for May 20. Emrys Hughes, who made a splendid stand as a C.O. during the Great War, and received much brutal treatment, has offered a strong opposition to conscription in the columns of Forward. Recent issues of this journal merit close reading on this subject: and reports of Scottish N.C.L. should be sent to the editor. Organisations affiliated to the N.C.L. should develop a live fellowship and an active inter-group and inter-party campaign.

The Daily Worker, for April 2, 1939, reported a speech made by William Gallacher, M.P., as follows:—

"I am absolutely opposed to conscription and to those who are behind it. I am pleased to see that the Labour Party has decided to fight this issue with all the power it can command. It is the cruellest thing imaginable for fathers and mothers who sacrificed for years to give their boys education and apprentice training to find them being handed over to the 'brass hats.'"

Conscription being law, the Labour Party is for it, Gallacher's eulogies are wasted, and his party slogan is, as stated in another column: "Support Conscription—With Cigarettes!"

The Rev. G. R. Maland, writing from 223 West Wycombe Rd., High Wycombe, Bucks., makes this statement as to the attitude of the Church in Peace News:—

"Whatever may be said about the attitude of certain clergy and ministers during the last war, may I say this, there are many of us to-day who will stand by the conscientious objector to the utmost of our ability both in his refusal to render military service and any service which may be regarded as making for war preparedness."

We welcome this statement and shall be glad to publish declarations by any ministers or churches that definitely oppose war and conscription.

The Socialist Party of Great Britain once again evades the war issue. Since this party conducts so much excellent propaganda, it is a pity it reduces truth to sophistry and develops cold feet at every crisis. In a pamphlet, entitled The Socialist and Conscription, the S.P.G.B. repeats what was written in its official organ, the Socialist Standard, in February, 1916, about the party's attitude towards conscription, then being introduced:—

". . . we are bitterly opposed to conscription. But what are conscription, war, unemployment, poverty, overwork and starvation wages but the direct results of capitalist class rule? What hope of any permanent amelioration so long as the workers are the underdogs? What hope, indeed, of even a paltry concession in this matter so long as the exploiters are masters of the State and feel their controlling position unmenaced? We, therefore, urge the workers to join in the real campaign against conscription; for conscription, on the part of the governing class, is only one item in the war upon the workers."

In a word, the S.P.G.B. is not opposed to conscription! Every Socialist, while realising the truth about economic conscription and the horrors of peace-time capitalism, must be opposed to conscription. To say that, because one understands Socialism, one must not resist conscription, is nonsense. Every Socialist should support the N.C.L.

Peter Kerrigan's report to the Congress of the Scottish "Communist"—meaning the dictated Stalinist Party of Hirelings—held in the City Hall, Glasgow, on the 25th and 26th February, 1939, is being sold as a penny pamphlet. On page 11, under the title "Combating Trotskyism," a bitter attack is made on Forward for maintaining the principle of the Free Press—an excellent principle to uphold in these days of stress. Here is an excerpt:—

"In dealing with the disruptive actions of Trotskyites and I.L.P.'ers it would be wrong to pass over the role of Forward. This paper has been going through a process of degeneration until now it is the first and generally the only journal to open its columns to Trotsky and his supporters. Its editorials contain each week a hotch-potch of spurious pacifism which is directly helping the Chamberlain War Policy, and supports Hitler's and Mussolini's claims for colonies, while it divides the workers' forces. Linked with this is its anti-Soviet bias."

Note that phrase, not war: but the "Chamberlain War Policy." The only thing the C.P. objects to is that Chamberlain showed direct the war policy of British Capitalism. The director should be Willie Gallacher: and Pete Kerrigan should be the stay-at-home War Chief, dining in style, and very important whilst the rank-and-file go to the battle-fields.

Against the "Fags for Conscripts" policy of the C.P., Forward has defended resistance and the C.O.'s. Let Kerrigan produce his record of war-resistance; let Willie Gallacher tell us his munitions-work during war-time, varied by Marxist dinner-hour lectures; and then read about the magnificent stand made by Emrys Hughes. Here is an extract from Forward, for February 16, 1918:

"A conscientious objector, Emrys Hughes, has served consecutive sentences amounting to 23½ months. The other day he got an additional six months. At his last Court-martial he claimed that no further sentence could be passed upon him as the Secretary of State for War had definitely stated in the House of Lords that there were to be no further successive sentences on Conscientious Objectors. He was told that what Lord Derby said was not law.

"But surely it is seditious to say a thing like that!"

We do not agree with Emrys Hughes' membership of the Labour Party, but we honour him for his war-resistance, his practising stand for a Free Press, and his fearless pen. We challenge his critics to compare, or contrast rather, records. Will their records stand the light of discussion?

Every C.O. should get our next issue. Reports will be published of N.C.L. activity from all over the country. There will appear an article, "War Resistance: A Matter of Conscience," by Annesley G. Aldred. Accounts of the Tribunals from the 1916 Conscription will be a feature. Also a reply to R. Palme Dutt's disgraceful and ridiculous Daily Worker article, "Marxism and Conscientious Objectors." How the betrayers of Italy, China, Germany, and Spain hate the Anti-Militarist! What enemies of the workers, what mean, contemptible reactionaries and counter-revolutionaries these C.P.'ers are!

TWO BABES WERE BORN

Two babes were born one happy morn,
They came with love divine,
And a mother smiled by the River Thames,
And a mother smiled by the Rhine.

These children grew, so brave and true,
Each mother said, "How fine!"
And hearts were glad by the River Thames,
And hearts were glad by the Rhine.

But one sad day, so people say,
Their rulers tried to shine,
And one heard the call by the River Thames,
And another the call by the Rhine.

These two brave sons, they raised their guns,
As they marched in martial line,
And a mother sighed by the River Thames,
And a mother sighed by the Rhine.

On the battle plain where the bullets rain,
These lads formed into line,
And hearts were sad by the River Thames,
And hearts were sad by the Rhine.

They took their sight in the bitter fight,
Their aim was really fine.
And a mother prayed by the River Thames,
And a mother prayed by the Rhine.

Two noble sons fell by their guns,
Their names in glory shine,
And a mother weeps by the River Thames,
And a mother weeps by the Rhine.

So the Thames so fine, and the River Rhine,
Flow into the same great sea,
And they seem to say as they kiss the spray,
"If men were as wise as we."

—FRED EASTON.

HYDE PARK MEETINGS

Local papers, and the ordinary London Press, boycotted the important case, affecting the right of propagandists and public speakers, that was heard at Marlborough Street Police Court, on Tuesday, November 15th, 1938. Only one report appeared—in the columns of the Scots Daily Express, Glasgow, for November 16th. This was as follows:—

Collection "challenge": Guy Aldred fined.

Lengthy quotations from a number of law books were made by Guy Alfred Aldred when he was summoned at Marlborough Street Police Court, London, yesterday for soliciting donations at Hyde Park on August 30, and for collecting donations.

Aldred, who was convicted and fined 20/- on each summons, said that his address was now 5 Baliol Street, Glasgow, and his London address Addison Gardens, West Kensington.

He objected to the relevancy and competency of the cases, pointing out that it had been held that a by-law must be reasonable. The by-law, he submitted, was unreasonable in that it made an offence of something which was not otherwise an offence.

The magistrate (Mr. J. B. Sandbach, K.C.) overruled the objections, and Aldred pleaded not guilty to the summonses.

Police Constable John Wyatt said he kept Aldred's meeting under observation, and spoke to him about the alleged breach of another regulation.

Aldred immediately got back on the platform and said, 'I have just been summoned under Regulation 22 and I want all my comrades to rally round and subscribe to a fund to fight these regulations. You can give me the money here or outside.'

In evidence Aldred said he was a journalist, secretary, and lecturer. He felt very keenly about the right to circulate literature and to make collections, but he found himself in conflict with the park regulations, which he criticised.

Told he would be reported, he said, "This is a matter of public importance." Three people handed him money—a technical challenge to the regulation.

This report does not do justice to the bureaucratic nature of the proceedings or to the impertinence of the Court. It must be acknowledged that, subsequently, in the formal arrangements leading to the appeal, much courtesy was shown by the Court officials. Our contention is that the public behaviour should be courteous and respective to principles of democratic right.

The High Court proceedings were boycotted also in the London press. In a matter of supreme public interest to the common people of London, a matter of urgent democratic right, no report was permitted to appear in the London press. The Judges were the L.C.J. (Lord Hewart) and Justices Humphreys and Lewis. We shall deal with these judges and their court behaviour in a subsequent issue of this journal. We are determined to expose and to change the Hyde Park regulations.

No report appeared in the London press: but the case was reported in the Glasgow press. We have reports from The Glasgow Herald; the News Chronicle (Northern Edition); Daily Record; and the Scots Daily Express. All dated May 3, 1939. These reports can be held over to our next issue.

The Stated Case that was presented to the Court; the arguments; the Hyde Park Regulations concerned and the Park Acts governing them; the conduct and careers of the Judges will be dealt with fully in an early Free Speech Fighting number. Citizen rights of propaganda are being destroyed by complacent acceptance of invasion.

It is the right of every citizen to purchase or sell literature at public meetings.

It is the right of every citizen to announce literature at public meetings.

This Citizen Right is Denied by the Hyde Park Regulations! Change them!

AS OLD AS THE CONSCRIPTS

We have before us as we write a paper that is of the same age as the conscripts, who have been called to the colours. It is the Sunday Pictorial, No. 180, for August 18, 1918. Above the title, on the front page, is advertised the chief article of the issue in question: "One Man—One Machine! By Horatio Bottomley."

Turning to the article, we note the sub-heading: "The Lesson of Our Splendid Victories in the West."

The editor explains in an editorial introduction to the article:—

"Drawing a moral from the lesson of the recent brilliant offensive of the Allies in the West, Mr. Bottomley makes a powerful appeal to the Government to expedite the production of Aeroplanes, Guns and Tanks—thus 'substituting iron and steel for human flesh.'"

At the end of the article, eulogising war, the editor promised:—

"Another powerful article by Mr. Bottomley will appear next week."

The war was Bottomley's hey-day. We know what happened to Bottomley when the war was over. In our opinion, Bottomley was less a scoundrel when he was sent to prison, and his career was ended in infamy, than during this period that he played the role of recruiting-sergeant and war-commentator, whether he actually wrote these articles to which he lent his name, or only signed them.

On the same page as Bottomley's article, is a "leader" which asks: "Will Omsk be Another Khartoum?"

This article denounces "the comparative smallness of the Allied exhibition in Siberia" and, eulogising "the Czecho-Slovaks in Western Siberia" who were "very hard-pressed" declares that "Omsk, the central rallying-point of these brave men, may become a second Siberia."

It never occurred to the Sunday Pictorial "leader-writer," its editor, or publisher, that the Czechs had no right to be at Omsk, and that the Allies had no business invading Russia.

The leader proceeded to attack "the Bolshevist leaders in Russia, who simply obey German orders" and declared that they "are nearing the end of their tether."

The tether, whether we like it or not, seems to have survived very well; and what about the German orders and the present Soviet Pact? The conscripts of to-day are supposed to believe the journalist-hacks, just like the conscripts of 1918 were supposed to do!

On page 5 of this precious paper, appeared an article, referred to in the "leader," written, said the "leader," by "Mr. John Albion, who knows what he is writing about."

Did he? We wonder—and leave it there, being of a polite disposition, and not caring to express oneself too vigorously.

John Albion's article was headed: "What We Must Do For Russia." To-day the cry seems to be: "What Russia Must Do For Us." The sub-heading was: "Open Letter to the British War Cabinet." Summarising Albion's article, the editor says that the writer "urges that far more troops must be sent to save the Czecho-Slovaks and to help Russian Nationalists." By "Russian Nationalists" was meant the Russian Whites, the Czarist counter-revolutionaries.

Here is an extract from the article, which merits being recalled to-day:—

"There was only one course for you to have adopted regarding Lenin and Trotsky, and that was to have nothing whatever to do with them, either formally or informally. Why did you ever palter with these men, whose hands are so indelibly imbrued with the blood of their countrymen? Whatever his professed motives may have been, Lenin is in effect a German agent, and has been one for years."

Historians will notice that Stalin did not appear in the picture at this time. The enemies were Lenin and Trotsky. They symbolised the Russian Revolution.

Later on this article declares: "that Germans and Austrians, aided by Bolshevists, are forcibly recruiting the people of Siberia"; describes "Lenin, a German instrument"; and requests the War Cabinet to "give Japan a freer hand" in Siberia; and to "send more English, Canadian, French, and United States troops to Vladivostok" to fight the Bolshevists. All in the name of democracy!

The front page of the Sunday Pictorial carries two pictures of the banned Nationalist meeting at Omagh. Mr. Dillon, M.P., is shown entering the field for the meeting. Police and military are in the background. The second picture shows Mr. Dillon and his supporters retiring. There was no disorder. The meeting ought never to have been banned.

On the same page are pictures of "Famous Italian Poet's Paper Bombs on The Austrian Capital." One shows "the first of the eight machines to return from the famous raid on Vienna"; and the other, "Major d'Annunzio with General Bongiovanni."

Beneath the pictures appears the explanation:—

"Major Gabriele d'Annunzio, the famous poet and novelist, recently launched an effective 'peace offensive' when, as the Commander of a squadron of eight aeroplanes, he dropped a number of leaflets over Vienna."

When one recalls d'Annunzio's subsequent exploits on behalf of Fascism, the idea of the poet launching a "peace offensive" is somewhat Pickwickian.

Page 2 shows us that the class-struggle was a reality even in war-time. There was a bus strike recorded as follows:—

"WOMEN STRIKE FOR EQUALITY WITH MEN.

"Tram and Bus Stoppage Surprises Londoners.

"CONDUCTRESSES' DEMAND.

"Munition Workers Delayed—Holiday Folk Miss Trains.

"A tramway and omnibus strike developed unexpectedly yesterday delaying thousands of munition workers and business people in West London.

"The strike is an unauthorised one and has followed the demand of the women workers for an additional 5s. a week, similar to the advance recently granted to the men. . . .

"Last night it was reported that more omnibus workers were leaving their work, despite the telegrams of their union leaders that all should continue at work until the result of the conference on Monday with Sir Geo. Askwith at the Board of Trade."

We can leave the story here. Sufficient is told. Note how good Old Trade Unionism functioned in 1918!

The same page tells the story of four Australian V.C.s being decorated. It records the prosecution at Old Street Police Court, London, of Ida Carter, aged 19, of Lewisham, a clerk, employed by the Stepney Tribunal, who forged the signature of the clerk to the tribunal, and handed out 8,000 exemptions, including an absolute exemption for her brother! He did not seem to know how to use an exemption card, even though he had "secured" one!

On page 3, we have a long account of the experiences of three British prisoners-of-war, unnamed, intended to feed the war fever:—

"LIQUID FIRE ON OUR UNARMED MEN.

"Hun Officer's Foul Order to Man with Container.

"ORDEAL OF AGONY.

"Escaped Prisoners' Story — Britain's Protest to Berlin.

"'The officer appeared to give an order, and the man with the container turned a stream of liquid fire straight down the trench in which we were standing. He could plainly see that we were unarmed.'

"In these few simple words, a private in the Royal Highlanders tells the story of another German outrage on unarmed and wounded prisoners of war—a story of horror, which is authenticated by the sworn statements of the men concerned as follows."

We stop the record there.

In Germany, the Kaiser was doing his bit towards the same end. Also on page 3, we read:—

"THE GRIEVED KAISER.

"Denounces British Air Attack on Open Town of Frankfort!

"The Kaiser, says the 'Cologne Gazette,' has sent the following telegram to the Mayor of Frankfort,—'His Majesty the Kaiser and King deeply sympathises in the misfortune which has befallen the open town of Frankfort as the result of the enemy air attack, which is contrary to international law, and claimed many victims, and requests you to convey to the relatives of those who have thus fallen for the Fatherland and to the wounded the sympathy of the All Highest.'—Reuter."

On page 7, we have two pictures: "The Deformed Transformed." The first picture is the statue of "Germania" in New York, as she was. The second picture shows the same statue, transformed into "Columbia." The statue was provided with a new face, and the Stars and Stripes deposed and replaced the German Eagle on her shield. What nonsense such stupid alterations and mutilations are!

Then we come to page 8, "Nuts and Wine," being gossip for the after-dinner hour!

Here is an excellent wisecrack to recall to-day:

"History Repeats Itself. The Retreat from Moscow.

Alternatively Called—The Bolshevi ction."

On page 10, we see what the ruling-class do for the working-class in wartime:—

"My Lady Paperhanger. — Pretty Mrs. Ian Macpherson, wife of the Under-Secretary for War, is staying in town to help Lady Markham with the fitting up of the new club for service girls. Because labour is almost impossible to get they are nailing up and making the chintz hangings, doing the painting and even some of the paperhanging themselves in the big Eaton-square houses they have taken."

On page 11, the Sunday Pictorial published an imposing announcement by the Government, entitled "Notes on Savings — No. 2 — How to Save on Laundry Bills." This invited everyone to invest in War Savings Certificates. The strange thing is this advertisement carried a design of National War Savings, on a Swastika background.

PAMPHLETS FOR THE PROLETARIAT

RAMSAY MACDONALD:
A Commentary.

The Tragedy of Ramsay Macdonald by L. McNeil Weir, M.P., is sub-titled A Political Biography. The author was for eight years Parliamentary Private Secretary to Ramsay Macdonald. He was appointed to that position when MacDonald enjoyed the sweets of office for the first time. He resigned it on August 24, 1931, when MacDonald planned to destroy the Labour Government and to become the leader of the National Government. From that time on, McNeil Weir became the bitter enemy of his former leader and his biography is a scathing denunciation of MacDonald, whom he regards as having been everything politically evil and undesirable. It would be easy to understand his denunciation of MacDonald for betraying the Labour Government and for forming and defending the National Government. It is not easy to understand his invective against the entire career of Ramsay Macdonald, both during the time that McNeil Weir was his secretary and also prior to their association, when McDonald was a shining light of the Labour Party and the hope of the I.L.P. The denunciation of MacDonald does more than destroy MacDonald. It may even fail as a complete denunciation of Britain's first Labour Premier. If the denunciation of MacDonald is deserved, if McNeil Weir writes truly and usefully in his political biography, then his previous apologies for MacDonald in the columns of Forward, his studied denunciations of MacDonald's critics, and even his association with MacDonald for a period of eight years, condemn not MacDonald, but his political biographer and all those parliamentarians who rallied to MacDonald's defence when he was attacked by the anti-parliamentarians.

During the thirty years that the anti-parliamentary movement in Britain was pressing forward its criticism of MacDonald and of parliamentarism, its activities were ridiculed if not denounced by men like Thomas Johnston, who used the Forward to describe Ramsay MacDonald as being "the Covenanter, turned by a strange wheel of chance Prime Minister." To-day, McNeil Weir tells us, with the approval of Thomas Johnston and all those former parliamentary admirers of MacDonald, that Ramsay MacDonald never was a Covenanter, and never had any ambitions other than the ambition to arrive somewhere. His aim was to sell his birthright for a mess of pottage, to gain the whole world at the expense of his soul.

It is not my intention to analyse McNeil Weir's work, although it may merit analysis. I content myself with drawing attention to the author's description of a speech that Ramsay MacDonald made in Glasgow on Sunday, October 8, 1916, at a memorial gathering in honour of James Keir Hardie, convened by the I.L.P. McNeil Weir reports the speech at length and carefully examines it. He shows that MacDonald uses platitudes for eloquence; plays on the feelings of his audience, waits for its applause, says in general terms the things that the audience wants to hear; and concludes his speech actually having said nothing, yet leaving his audience feeling that a most important message has been delivered. In a word, MacDonald's speech on this occasion, like all his speeches during the war period, was so much charlatanism. Why did not the parliamentarians admit this at the time?

McNeil Weir gives us to understand that he knew how valueless were MacDonald's speeches, and that Ramsay MacDonald's parliamentary intimates were aware of their leader's careerism and demagogism all the time.

Assuming that McNeil Weir's picture is correct, and there is no reason to assume otherwise, then this most expensive book on Ramsay MacDonald serves no purpose except that of reminding us that parliamentarism is useless to the interests of the people. This is perfectly true. Parliamentarism has betrayed the working-class. If we look back to the end of the war and compare what has been achieved by parliamentary activity with the hopes that excited the people when they returned the Labour Party as the official Opposition and later as the Government, we must realise that parliamentarism has utterly failed the working-class. The workers have secured no reforms and they have not achieved power. Their leaders have obtained security and state incomes. Even they have paid the price of loss of reputation. To-day these leaders are older than their years, the price that the radical or socialist has to pay for selling his birthright for a mess of pottage. It is said that Ramsay MacDonald stuttered after he became leader of the National Government. He lost his capacity for eloquence. If this is a sign of treachery then the parliamentarians of the Labour movement must all be traitors. Since their first return to Parliament they have learned to stutter and to-day they have no power with which to address the people, and no wish to address themselves to the people. They do not even aim to retire into private life. The hero of a great war for liberty might retire into private life naturally and easily. But these politicians cannot retire. They have achieved nothing which justifies retirement. In every case they have betrayed the movement that made them public characters. Their days have reached their end and their desire is to shrink into private life. They are finished. Parliamentarism has finished them and destroyed the socialism they once espoused so loudly.

SOLDIER THOMAS PARKER

During the war Thomas Parker enlisted in the Notts and Derby Regiment. He was under the lawful age. The fact was discovered. He was discharged. He persisted in re-enlisting, was successful. At the end of the war, he had served in France with the Northumberland Fusiliers, and was demobilised. He re-enlisted and served three years with the Grenadier Guards. At the age of 22, he was returned to civil life, stranded. The years he had given to a grateful king and country ought to have been spent learning a trade. The best he could do was to become a casual worker. He worked as a miner and navvy. Mostly navvy. He got little work.

In May, 1933, Thomas Parker, having slept in a workhouse, started to tramp to Tamworth in search of work, with no money in his pocket. In England, if you sleep out when you have money or a home you break no law. If you sleep out because you must, and if you are penniless, you defy the law. Thomas Parker, when night came, hungry and tired, crept in under a steam-roller by roadside. He slept on 6-foot by 2 of the surface of the land he had fought for. The police woke and arrested him. The magistrates at Coleshill were lenient. They could have sent him to prison for three months. They gave him 14 days. Thomas Parker was conveyed to Winson Green Prison.

What happened at Winson Green no one knows. Parker is dead. And dead men tell no tales.

The official account is that Parker refused to keep his cell-door closed. On the second night he kept shouting that he had done no wrong and that he must get out of jail, even if it was in his coffin. Parker was right in his facts and as to the manner of his exit.

At exercise next morning, Parker fell out. He said he was done. From then, say the officials, he behaved like a man in a frenzy. The prison doctor certified that Thomas Parker was a fit man and in a fit condition to undergo solitary confinement. Parker was sentenced to 3 days solitary confinement on bread-and-water by the Acting Governor.

On being sentenced, Parker solemnly held up his hand and said to the Acting Governor: "This is my death card! How are my relatives to know that I am dead?"

Thomas Parker was taken from the Governor's Room, and went, with two warders, on a short but fateful walk towards the silent cell which was to be poor Parker's death-house. Within a quarter of an hour he was dead.

The two jailers walked on either side of him. They released his arms for a moment. At that second, they afterwards said, Parker took a flying jump forward down a flight of stone steps. He landed at the foot of the steps in a sort of spread-eagle fashion and then struggled up to his knees. The warders left him and locked the cell-door. A few minutes later, a warder looked through the peep-hole. Parker was lying in a crumpled heap on the floor of the cell, with a wound on the back of his head. He was dead.

At the inquest, the prison doctor admitted that Parker might have been suffering from claustrophobia, as a result of his war services. This is a nervous complaint which makes it impossible for the sufferer to submit to confinement in a narrow space. The Under-Secretary for Home Affairs told Brig.-Gen. Spears in the House of Commons that any enquiry was not necessary nor desirable.

Thomas Parker "died" in jail, neglected, on June 2nd, 1933.

Dear Friend,

Each issue of the REVOLT is held up in the Post Office pending a ruling by the Solicitor of the Department, Vincent B. Miles, as to its mailability. This follows a ruling declaring the January 7 issue unmailable.

On February 24 last, we received the text of passages in the January 7 issue, which the Post Office claims violate the U.S. Postal Laws and Regulations and Title 1 of the U.S. Code. According to the ruling all issues containing these passages will be unmailable. Until the Post Office is compelled to cancel this ruling, REVOLT can be mailed only with the approval of the Post Office censor, Solicitor Vincent B. Miles. The passages involved occur in two articles in the barred issue: an instalment in the Study Course, A.B.C. of Marxism; and the statement of principles and aims of the league, headed "WHAT WE STAND FOR," which was published prior to January 7, in the May 21 and June 24 issues, 1938; and since then, in February 5, 1939, issue.

In order to give a clear picture of the stupid character of the action of the Post Office, we draw attention to the fact that the Post Office did not object to certain passages in our statement of principles describing the lot of the worker under Capitalism; the reality of the class struggle; the need for proletarian dictatorship, the construction of communism and the establishment of a classless society based on collective work and ownership of the means of production; the establishment of a council or soviet form of administration; and the building of a revolutionary party, pioneering the Communist Fourth International.

The Post Office censored a paragraph stating our belief that the only solution for the poverty condition of the working class was a revolutionary one; and it censored another paragraph describing our revolutionary goal. It took objection to a third paragraph declaring that the league's policy would be that of revolutionary anti-militarism during an imperialist war.

The passage from the Study Course to which the Post Office objects, quotes the historic words of the closing paragraph of The Communist Manifesto of Marx and Engels, which boldly proclaims the refusal of the communists to conceal their aims and methods of attaining them.

We believe that this is a matter which concerns the Labour press of the world. Will you give this case publicity?

Fraternally,

WALTER STRICKLAND'S MESSAGE.

The Malton Messenger has devoted considerable space to the life, work, and wishes of the late Walter Strickland.

In its issue for April 8, the Messenger published a letter from us, detailing the last wish expressed by Strickland, in relation to the struggle against war, which he described as "The European Menace."

In its issue for May 6, the Messenger published Strickland's last letter to us, dated Buitenzorg, Java, Asia, December 14, 1937. This is a very long and very interesting epistle and the Messenger placed it beneath the appended headings, spread across the page:—

SCIENTISTS AND SAVANTS ALONE CAN END WAR

The Late Sir Walter Strickland's Last Letter—On International Problems

AN APPEAL TO STOP "THIS MARCH OF HOMICIDE"

"IS NOT YOUTH TOO GLORIOUS TO BE MAIMED AND MURDERED?"

The editor of the Messenger introduced this letter with the following explanation:—

"'The end of war depends upon the robustness of the men of science and of thought in every country,' wrote the late Sir Walter William Strickland in one of his last letters. Written in Java in December, 1937, this letter, which we publish below was addressed to Mr. Guy A. Aldred, of Glasgow, an old associate of Sir Walter's, and by his permission we print it, as containing a great deal that touches on the international problems of to-day.

"A quarter of a century ago the late Sir Walter Strickland, life-long traveller and student of politics and contemporary thought that he was, foresaw and foretold the beginning of problems that would inevitably lead the world once again to the verge of war. This letter, one of the last penned by him, touches on the crux of modern problems."

Elsewhere in the same issue, the editor of our contemporary commented on "Sir Walter Strickland's Last Message":—

"In this issue we publish a most interesting letter written by the late Sir Walter William Strickland, the Yorkshire Baronet who became famous for his wanderings over the world. Sir Walter was more than a wanderer for the sake of wandering, he was a thinker and a student of peoples. A quarter of a century ago he saw that the Versailles Peace must inevitably lead Europe to the verge of another conflict, he then foretold that Germany would not for long be content to remain disarmed and dismembered.

"Sir Walter's letter, written in December of 1937 from Java, where he died, was almost his last message, and it contains a great deal of interest in the light of international events of the past few months. He believed that the world's scientists and scholars alone could bring about lasting peace, if they had the determination to do so. Sir Walter was never a lover of politics or diplomacy, and was forever asking that secret diplomacy should be abolished; otherwise wars were bound to continue."

In its issue for May 20, the Messenger published a "life" of Walter Strickland from our pen. All comrades interested in Strickland's thought and activity should write direct for copies of these papers to The Malton Messenger, Messenger Office, Malton, Yorks. Each issue costs 3d., post-free.

Strickland's last letter, slightly abridged, was reprinted in The Varsity, The Cambridge University Newspaper, for May 13, under the heading, "This March of Homicide."

WHEN DOLLAN RESISTED

The front page article records the result of Lord Provost Dollan's appeal—when he was a Councillor and a C.O.—to the High Court of Justiciary, at Edinburgh. From Forward for June 2, 1917, we cull the following report of the police court proceedings:—

COUNCILLOR DOLLAN HANDER OVER.

Deputy Town Clerk's Interest.

"The trial of Councillor P. J. Dollan was robbed of much of its interest because of the refusal of the Stipendiary to pronounce upon the contention of the lawyer for the defence that the importation of a stipulation into Dollan's exemption that he must work 50 miles from Glasgow was illegal. That question is to be fought out in a higher court. Meanwhile Dollan is fined £2 and sent to the non-combatant corps at Hamilton Barracks.

"The trial was long and mostly technical, but there were some interesting intervals, as when Lieut. Young from Bath Street declared he had gone out to post the calling-up notice himself; and when Lieut. Sellar—no, plain 'Mr.' Sellar, Depute Town Clerk, and Clerk to the Tribunal, admitted that he had written to London asking how Dollan's case stood, as he Dollan, was still attending Corporation meetings. He had written this letter because Dollan's presence in the Municipal Buildings after he had been turned down by the Tribunal was a matter of comment in the Municipal Buildings.'

"And again, when Dollan, in giving evidence, spoke of some period during which he had been ill, Mr. Sellar was observed to signal over to a policeman and hand him a list of Dollan's municipal activities, which document was promptly taken up to the Fiscal. All this anxiety to secure Dollan's removal 50 miles from Glasgow surely proclaims the Municipal Buildings as a place from which every eligible has already volunteered. But we are none too sure of that. The Stipendiary, while finding that Dollan was technically an absentee, was doubtful if he had been properly arrested, but that in view of the military urgency, it was not desirable that proceedings should be narrowly construed. The Police Court was not competent to review decisions of the Central Tribunal. He agreed to a stated case for appeal."

CONSCRIPTION IN NEW ZEALAND

In 1912, the Manchester Guardian opened its columns to a very full discussion on "Conscription in New Zealand and Australia." The correspondence was published in the following issues:—June 19 and 26; July 1, 2, 5, 10, 11, 12, 13 16, 18, 20. The complete debate might be worth re-reading at the present time. Below are some points made against the Conscript Act.

INTERNAL PASSPORTS.

The Defence Act compelled the conscript to carry his Military Manual. This book contained the youth's history, age, birthplace, employment; his people's history, character. He could not leave the district in which he was registered anytime without first obtaining a passport from his chief officer. An offender against the conscript law could not get a situation, as he had to produce his Military Manual. Resisters, apart from suffering recurring imprisonment, lost their right to vote—for life, according to the first terms of the Act.

MORALS OF MILITARY TRAINING.

The moral aspects of military training should be studied by every woman. Books to read are:—The Queen's Daughters in India, by Dr. Elizabeth W. Andrew and Katherine E. Bushnell, issued by the British Committee for the Abolition of Vice; and Personal Reminiscences of a Great Crusade, by Josephine E. Butler, issued by the Friend's Purity Association. Also, study Cantonment Arrangements in Gibraltar and elsewhere.

NEVILLE ANTICIPATED.

Chamberlain's method of introducing conscription, after pledging himself to the voluntary system, was anticipated by Sir Joseph Ward, the Prime Minister of New Zealand. The Evening News, Christchurch, N.Z., on November 14th, 1911, published a long "leader," headed:—"Our Phantom Army." It quoted Sir Joseph Ward's opinion, "that the people of New Zealand would never stand Compulsory Military Training." The "leader" commented that, Sir Joseph well-merited the title given him of "The India-Rubber Prime Minister" as he subsequently introduced and carried the Defence Act, without a mandate from the people.

During the election at the end of 1911, which resulted in the defeat of the Ward Government, prosecutions under the Defence Act were dropped.

JUDGING CONSCIENCE.

The Defence Act provided that "those whose religion forbids them engaging in military service" might substitute some other form of public service.

Under this clause, a magistrate decided that a young man who objected to military service on religious grounds, as a Christian, was not a conscientious objector within the meaning of the Act, because some Baptist Ministers acted as chaplains to the forces. This excluded the Baptist religion and the objector went to prison.

NATIONAL SERVICE LEAGUE.

The Defence Act was a triumph for the National Service League. On page 174 of The Briton's First Duty, issued in 1901, this organisation avowed that its aim was the formation, under compulsion, of a "Pan-Britannic Militia, consisting of all able-bodied Whites throughout the Empire."

In the Round Table, for May, 1911, it was pointed out that the New Zealand National Defence League was modelled on the lines of the National Service League of Great Britain. The Australian National Defence League came from the same source.

IMMIGRANTS NOT TOLD.

Immigrant were not told. The free official circular issued by hundreds of thousands to the emigrants from Britain, said nothing on this question. The Emigration Information Department, at 34 Broadway, Westminster, was ashamed of over-seas conscription.

What He Did During The Great War!

SCOTS M.P.'s CHARGES AGAINST GLASGOW'S LORD PROVOST

ONE MUST RESIGN

AN OPEN LETTER TO
THE RT. HON. P. J. DOLLAN, Lord Provost of Glasgow.

My Lord Provost,

I have published the facts concerning your attitude in 1917, when you were conscripted for military service. You obtained total exemption from combatant service from the Central Tribunal, and conditional exemption from non-combatant service. You stressed your conscientious objection to war. At that time you were a Councillor and Chairman of the Glasgow Labour Party. You were of military age, and you declared that you had no country for which to fight. The Glasgow papers, which published reports of your case in the Central Police Court, Glasgow, and the High Court of Justiciary, Edinburgh, in adjoining columns published portraits of Glasgow men who had responded to recruiting appeals and had gone to their grave as to their bed in consequence. Your 1917 Anti-Militarism preserved you for the position of Militarist Lord Provost in 1939.

Harry Lauder was recruiting in 1914-1917, and you were bitterly opposed to him. Sir Harry Lauder is recruiting still, and you are associating yourself with him on the recruiting platform. Now you are over military age, you are busy persuading the youth to enlist. By your conduct, you paved the way for conscription in 1939, as did Lord Kitchener and Lord Derby in the first stages of the Great War of 1914-1918. As you escaped danger by asserting your conscientious anti-militarism in 1917, so you are securing honour by stressing your vigorous militarism in 1939. Sir, your conduct is a scandal. It disgraces you as a citizen. And you would be saluted as First Citizen.

My Lord Provost, if the only terms on which you could secure election to the position of chief magistrate were that you forswear your principles and betray your past, you ought never to have been elected. You had no right to pay such a price: and your duty now is to play the man and surrender the honour. Give up your dreams of a knighthood and resign your magistracy. What is the value of a knighthood if one enjoys the title and has no knightliness of soul, no sense of worth or chivalry? The title is barren and the honour unseemly. The salutation is a satire. Its mention turns the citizens from gravity to comedy. They do not smile but guffaw, until they remember the dead of 1914-1918 and witness the parade of youth to be sacrificed to-morrow. Then their humour grows more sober and turns to anguish and to anger. My Lord Provost, in disregarding the feeling of the common people, and their reaction to the knowledge of your contradictory conduct, you are playing with fire. As Abraham Lincoln so well remarked, the people will not be fooled all the time. Events are good schoolmasters, and calamity is a great teacher.

Suppose, my Lord Provost, the impossible and the unthinkable: suppose your recruiting is right to-day, suppose war and militarism are causes we should espouse in the twentieth century of the Christian era; your position is untenable still. You should be humble and not aggressive. You should stand before the Cenotaph and recall your conduct in 1917. Apology, not aggression, should be your attitude. War means that so much of the youth of the nation shall be sent to its doom. What right have you, who declined to respond to the recruiting call in 1914, who evaded the war-demands made upon you from 1914-1918, to assist in persuading the youth of a later generation to go to its doom to protect you in your honours? Your resignation as Lord Provost should be demanded by every citizen, whether conscientious objector or militarist, whether Socialist or Conservative. I ask the Labour movement of Glasgow, and I ask every citizen of Glasgow, whether inside that movement or not, to unite in that demand. The conscientious objector of 1917 should have remained the conscientious objector of 1939, or he ought to have retired into private life.

At Kinning Park, on Sunday, May 28, 1939, you invited Sir Harry Lauder to come forward and appear on your recruiting platform. You left the meeting together, elated with your success. You did this, knowng the part played by Sir Harry Lauder in the Great War, and how bitterly opposed to him you were at that time.

For many years you have been associated with "Forward." You were connected with that journal during the war years, during that period when Thomas Johnston was making his Clydeside reputation with his "War Points."

"Forward" for June 1, 1918, headed a part of the editor's "War Points" as follows:—

"HIS NAME WAS HARRY LAUDER."

This was set out in bold type. Below this heading your colleague, editor Thomas Johnston—who had no idea at that time that he would become a Cabinet Minister and Rt. Hon.—wrote:—

"Mr. Harry Lauder, the Scots low comedian, has been airing his views upon the war at a swell gathering in Ferguson & Forrester's swell restaurant in Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Harry has made quite a bit of money out of singing about the 'Bonnie Lassie up at Tobermory,' and 'Row Me in the Heather,' and in telling stories about landladies and sausages. So he has become what is called 'a National Asset,' and he has recently been doing War Aims propaganda in America. The 'National News' (3/3/18) assured us that a great patriot then in America doing his propaganda bit for us was being remunerated by the British Treasury at the rate of £1000 per week, or, as we figure it out, at £66 per oratorical hour.

"If this patriotic hero was Harry, he is by no means the 'Saftest o' the Faimily' or the 'Simple Johnnie Raw'."

Remarking that, "anyhow, Harry is back," Thomas Johnston complained that Lauder's speech at the F. and F. gathering was not reported in the Glasgow daily papers, although the speech defined the British war aims. The "Evening Times" for May 25, 1918, reported the speech, however, under suitable sub-headings. Here is an extract:—

"KILL EVERY GERMAN.

"We are not fighting the Kaiser and his Junkers; we are fighting the whole German nation; and the man in the street is just as bad as the Kaiser is, and there would be no peace until we killed them all. (Applause.) There would be no peace, and they were not going to parley for peace. We are going "TO KILL THEM ALL."

Thomas Johnston commented:—

"The bloody-minded auld Herod!

"All the German babies are to be food for the wee skean dhu in his tartan stocking.

"Liebknecht, we suppose, is to be murdered in jail. Lichnowsky is not to be spared. The women buddies — yes, he would kill them too. All. All. Strike and spare naught.

"They put the Clincher temporarily in a restraining institution for less than that.

"But how is it to be done? What if the heathen Huns object?

"Will Harry sing them to their long sleep?

"Will he tell them rib ticklers so that they get lock-jaw through immoderate laughter?

"The craziest of the Pan-Germans, the Huns, do not propose to kill all the British women and children."

You approved of this criticism, my Lord Provost. You know that Harry Lauder never replied to Johnston's charge that he was receiving £1,000 per week income for this kind of oratory. You know that the oratory Johnston condemned is the disgraceful "stuff" that earned Lauder his title of "Sir Harry." Why did you, knowing this, invite him to the platform at Kinning Park to speak by your side, on May 28, 1939?

I pass to another and more serious charge, made by William Gallacher, M.P., the member for West Fife, that you were not genuine as a conscientious objector, and that you advocated and defended the war until conscription came. It was then that you turned pacifist and C.O., says this M.P.

I have no admiration for Willie Gallacher, who made munitions during the war, and atoned for this conduct by delivering Socialist lectures in the dinner hour. "Dinner-time Marxism" does not fascinate me. Since November, 1935, Willie Gallacher has represented West Fife in Parliament, when he captured the seat from Willie Adamson. He polled 13,462 votes and defeated Adamson by 593 votes. He may have obtained his votes by trickery, but do not all M.P.'s do the same? In any case, he is a representative person under the system whose honours you enjoy. He charges you with cowardice, and he ought to be answered.

Since his return to Parliament, Gallacher has spoken repeatedly in Glasgow under the auspices of the Glasgow Trades and Labour Council. If his charges are correct, you have no right in public office. If his charges are not correct, the Glasgow Trades and Labour Council ought to repudiate him, and the Fife miners should demand his resignation from Parliament. Either Gallacher ought to resign his seat in Parliament or you should demit office as Lord Provost. It is the business of the entire Labour movement, both in the East and the West of Scotland, to demand the fullest enquiry, and the resignation from public life of the one who is in the wrong.

GALLACHER'S ACCUSATION.

When William Gallacher made the charge against you, he was not M.P., and had no immediate thoughts of becoming one. He has never withdrawn the accusation, and you never asked him to do so. He still maintains that his charge is true. You were a Bailie at that time. Gallacher made his accusation in the columns of "The Worker," the Clydeside organ, for August 26, 1922, under the heading—

"THE BAILIE."

Gallacher opened his article with four paragraphs that condemn both you and himself. He wrote:—

"What a wretched organisation the I.L.P. has become. In the midst of all the poverty and suffering that is pressing so heavily on the working class, the only concern of this one-time Socialist organisation is to get its representatives returned to the local Council or to Parliament if an election should come upon us.

"Hibernating for long enough, it now wakens into life with the approach of November, and decides to launch a most respectable campaign in the hope of snaring a thoroughly respectable vote when the Municipal elections take place.

"What a gang of candidates, each one more orthodox than the other. Petty, trivial, little reformists, they will do nothing to stir the workers into protest against those who oppress and exploit them; sufficient for the I.L.P. if they can wheedle votes out of them; sufficient for them if they can get their 'careerists' helped on towards their goal.

"It would not matter just as much if those who are responsible for inaugurating this so-widely advertised campaign were not so indiscreetly scrapping everything they have hitherto stood for. It seems to be inevitable, that when a Socialist one goes back on his faith in order to play up to bourgeois respectability, that nothing can stay his downward course, until he hits right down at the bottom.

"Take the case of Maxton and P. J. Dollan, a truly weird combination"

Gallacher then comes to his charge against you. He writes:—

"But Dollan, ye gods: what a man since he became a bailie! When the war started, Dollan believed in force all right. He was a 'war' man, was all out for the smashing of the Germans (by proxy, of course) till Conscription was introduced, and that in P.J.'s opinion was going a bit too far. When it came to Pat having to do a share of the fighting, he thought it time to wind up the trouble. From being a stay-at-home warrior he became a pacifist, and got packed off to Wakefield detention camp. This, to Dollan, was the greatest crime ever committed. The enslaving of the workers as a class was as nothing compared to the imprisoning of Dollan.

"He became the most ferocious of ferocious revolutionaries. In all the discussions that took place in Wakefield he outdistanced everybody as an extremist. He was of opinion that the workers ought to arise and bomb, bayonet, or otherwise get rid of the wicked Militarists and Imperialists who had laid P. J. by the heels.

"But now—well, he's a Bailie with prospects of a Parliamentary constituency; and, of course, that alters things. Force might be of use to the workers, but it obviously isn't of any use to one who has his mind built up on a Parliamentary career."

Gallacher proceeds to attack you for sitting "on the bench administering capitalist laws," and concludes:—

"We want a campaign—we want a campaign badly —but it must be a live, inspiring campaign that will direct the workers to the goal of Revolution, not an insipid vote-catching dodge such as is contemplated by Dollan and Company."

If you tell me that Gallacher should take his concluding words to heart himself to-day, I will agree. But that does not refute the charge he makes against you., I ask you: Is that charge true? Is it a fact that you were a "war" man until conscription came, and that you then became a C.O.? If it is not true, please refute the charge and let your refutation be circulated throughout West Fife. If it is true, resign your position as Chief Magistrate and First Citizen of the City of Glasgow. That is your duty.

As Chief Magistrate of the City, on Sunday, June 25 last, you received the members of the Commissionaires Corps. You congratulated Capt. Cameron, Commander of the Corps, on the efficiency and excellent appearance of the men. You praised up discipline and presented five medals to members of the Corps. Your speech was reported in the Glasgow "Evening News" and "Evening Times" next day.

What right had you, as a conscientious objector during the Great War, to review these men and to make such a speech?

The Corps of Commissionaires were founded in 1859 by Capt. Edward Walter, K.C.B. Its principal object was to provide employment for men who had served in the Crimea War or Indian Mutiny. Each year its role augmented steadily, and its ranks are composed to-day of time-expired soldiers and sailors mainly, with, perhaps, a few ex-policemen.

If Gallacher's charge against you is true, you had even less right reviewing these men than if you had opposed the Great War from the beginning. If the charges are not true, let the Labour movement, to which you belong, demand an explanation or apology from the member for West Fife, or drive him from so-called public life, for slander. He has labelled you a coward. Refute the charge, and I promise the widest publicity for your refutation. It will give me pleasure, despite my criticism of your present activity as war-recruiter, to be able to state that when you were a war-resister, your inspiration was Socialist idealism, and that your conduct did not proceed from cowardice. But you must either reply or resign.

My Lord Provost, you would be news. Your conduct has made you history. Your immortal epitaph:—

"We do want to lose you,
And we think you ought to go!"

I am,

Yours faithfully,

GUY A. ALDRED.

COUNCILLOR DOLLAN, 1917.

On Tuesday, May 15, 1917, Councillor E. Shinwell was acquitted at the Central Police Court, Glasgow, by Stipendiary-Magistrate Neilson, on a charge of having, on April 14, 1917, at the entrance door of Charing Cross Halls, Sauchiehall Street, assaulted Francis John Logan by striking him on the body with a piece of metal gas pipe or similar instrument. The hearing of the case occupied the greater part of two days. John Scanlon gave evidence for the defence and was described as a plater. This meant that he was pretending to do National Service as an alternative to conscription. Scanlon stated that the meeting at the Charing Cross Halls had been called by the National Council of Civil Liberties for the purpose of considering National Service as possibly leading to Industrial Conscription.

Evidence was also given by James Maxton who was described as a plater's helper; William Shaw, described as delegate from the Glasgow Trades Council; and Councillor P. J. Dollan, Chairman of the Glasgow Labour Party, who stated that he organised the meeting.

The meeting was described in the Glasgow Evening Times report as "Ramsay MacDonald meeting." Immediately beneath the report appeared the following paragraph:—

"COUNCILLOR DOLLAN.

"Arrested As An Absentee.

"Councillor P. J. Dollan, who was a witness at the Central Police Court, Glasgow, to-day, in the case in which Councillor Shinwell was charged with assault, was arrested at the close of the proceedings by Detective McGimpsey on a charge of being an absentee under the Military Service Act."

The Police Court proceedings were reported in the Glasgow Herald for Thursday, May 24, and Friday, May 25, 1917.

The Thursday report was as follows:—

"MILITARY SERVICE.

Councillor Dollan Charged As Absentee.

"Evidence was heard at the Central Police Court, Glasgow, yesterday, in the case against Councillor P. J. Dollan, Glasgow, who was charged with being an absentee, or deserter under the Military Service Act. A plea of not guilty was tendered. The evidence by the military representative was to the effect that Mr. Dollan had failed to comply with the conditions laid down by the Central Tribunal in granting him exemption from combatant service, and that he had failed to appear at the recruiting office on April 30 to answer to a calling-up notice issued on April 28.

"Mr. Dollan stated in his evidence that the grounds of his exemption were that he was to undertake work of national importance under the direction of the Committee on Work of National Importance. He wrote suggesting five different forms of occupation, but the Central Tribunal refused him permission to undertake any that he had offered. In a note to a letter he had received from the Committee on Work it was stated that the conditions laid down by the Central Tribunal were that work be obtained in a district at least fifty miles from Glasgow. This seemed to Mr. Dollan like a sentence of deportation, and he had only heard of such things being done under the Defence of the Realm Regulations. He stated to Inspector McGimpsey that he was still in communication with the Central Tribunal at the date of his arrest.

"Stipendiary Neilson postponed his decision until to-day."

The Friday report read:—

"MILITARY SERVICE.

Decision Against Glasgow Councillor.

"Councillor P. J. Dollan, Glasgow, was found guilty at the Central Police Court, Glasgow, of being an absentee under the Military Service Act. In his judgment, Stipendiary Neilson stated that this process had been raised in consequence of Mr. Dollan having failed to join the colours.. He was not sure that the apprehension of Mr. Dollan was in perfect accordance with the military instructions issued. Perhaps it might have been better had Mr. Dollan been summoned. In any event, Mr. Dollan was now before him competently charged at the instance of the Procurator Fiscal with the offence of being a deserter, or absentee without leave. It seemed to him that that Court was not a competent place to over-rule the procedure of the Central Tribunal. It was Mr. Dollan's duty to appear for non-combatant service, for which he was liable, seeing that he had failed to undertake work of national importance under the direction of the committee to which he was referred for that purpose. As it was Mr Dollan's duty to present himself to the military authorities, it was equally the duty of the military authorities on his so presenting himself to give effect to the exemption from combatant service.

"Mr. Dollan had established no sufficient excuse within the meaning of the Act. The judgment of the Court was that Mr. Dollan, being a person liable to non-combatant service, was guilty as an absentee without leave as libelled.

"The magistrate imposed a fine of 40 shillings, with the alternative of seven days' imprisonment, and allowed 60 days in which to pay the fine. An agent intimated that it was Mr. Dollan's desire to ask for a stated case with a view to appeal. Mr. Dollan was then taken in charge by the military."

It is interesting to note that the issue of the Glasgow Herald containing this report also carried, under the heading "Entertainment," the following notice about Harry Lauder:—

"Harry Lauder retained for another week at Empire. Enormous success of revue. 'Three Cheers.' The Great Whitehall scene. Including a squad of discharged soldiers. The boys who have done their bit."

This was the sixth week of Harry Lauder's revue at the Empire.

Councillor Dollan made desperate efforts to secure his release. The following is extracted from the Glasgow Evening Times, 6th edition, for Wednesday, May 30, 1917:—

"THE CASE OF COUNCILLOR DOLLAN.

"Liberation Refused.

"An application was presented to Stipendiary Neilson at the Central Police Court this morning on behalf of Councillor P. J. Dollan who was dealt with by the Court last week for being an absentee under the Military Service Act.

"An appeal against that decision has been taken to the Court of Justiciary, and the application made to-day was for the interim liberation of Mr. Dollan, who is at present detained by the military authorities. After having heard Mr. George Phillips, Mr. Dollan's agent, on the application, and the Procurator-Fiscal, Mr. McIntyre, in reply, Stipendiary Neilson refused the application on the ground that Mr. Dollan was not in custody on a commitment made directly by the Court and that the applicant had been unable to show that the Court had power to grant liberation from the custody of the military authorities."

Despite this ruling, the Home Office released Councillor Dollan pending the hearing of his appeal.

The following report of his appeal appeared in the "Evening Times" of Glasgow, for Friday, August, 31, 1917:—

"COUNCILLOR DOLLAN.

"Important Points at High Court.

"National Service.

"Conscientious Objector's Position.

"The Appeal Dismissed.

"EDINBURGH, Monday. — At a sitting of the Justiciary Appeal Court in Edinburgh to-day, before the Lord Justice General, Lord Scott Dickson, and Lord Cullen, Councillor P. J. Dollan, of Glasgow Corporation, and Chairman of the Glasgow Labour Party, appealed against his conviction as an absentee without leave.

"THE CASE.

"Mr. Gentles, Counsel for Appellant, said this was a case in which the appellant was a conscientious objector, and in accordance with procedure under the Military Service Act he was exempted from combatant service only, and he also got exemption from the Central Tribunal, subject to a condition—viz., that he should, within a specified period, undertake work of national importance that was in accordance with the direction of a certain National Committee. The question was whether he had complied with that condition, and whether, if he had not, it was because, although he had offered and been willing to comply with it and did everything he could, he was prevented from complying with it by the National Committee because they over-ruled the terms of the Tribunal's exemption by adding a condition of their own for which there was no warrant in the Statute. The appellant did not wait for the National Committee to specify the work he was to undertake. He went about and looked for work and approached them again and again offering to do work which he had ascertained had been approved as of national importance in the case of other people. The National Committee said: 'We will not allow you to take any of these jobs. We will only agree to you taking work more than fifty miles from Glasgow.' That was not in the judgment of the Court, and when the certificate came to be issued afterwards; that was not in the certificate, and the question came to be whether the Tribunal, who had jurisdiction in the matter, ever imposed such a condition, and whether, if they did, they had any power to do so.

"Lord Cullen—Did the Central Tribunal endorse the decision of the Committee?

"Counsel — There is nothing to show that they ever did. Under the Statute the conditions have to be set out in the certificate, but they had no certificate by the Tribunal that any such condition was ever imposed by the Tribunal at all. He had complied with the conditions so far as they had been possible, and he had been prevented from getting the work which he was, under the Statute, compelled to undertake, not by any fault of his own, but by the unreasonableness of an outside body, which went beyond its rights and powers. His contention, accordingly, was that it was not a good conviction. Conscientious objectors were not considered desirable to have associated with the colours, provided real good useful national service could be got out of them elsewhere.

"Lord Cullen—The National Committee professes to communicate one of the established conditions of the Central Tribunal.

"Counsel—That is to say, it was a general condition unanimously applicable. In fact, it was not, because the evidence of the appellant was that he found these jobs were being filled by Glasgow people, conscientious objectors, and he said: 'If they can get these jobs, why does it cease to be work of national importance when I am willing to take them?'

"APPEAL DISMSSED.

"At the close of Mr. Gentles' speech, and without calling on Counsel for the respondent, the Court unanimously dismissed the appeal.

"The Lord Justice General said the certificate was a certificate of conditional exemption from non-combatant service. It appeared that when the Central Tribunal issued their decision on January 10 they made it quite clear that the man must obtain employment in work of national importance, subject to the condition of the Committee and of the Central Tribunal. On January 29, and again on February 10, they explicitly said that whatever work he obtained must be outside a radius of fifty miles from Glasgow. That was a very reasonable condition to impose, and in many circumstances an essential necessary condition. At all events, it appeared to His Lordship to be well within the Statutory powers of the Central Tribunal to impose such a condition. The appellant did not challenge the finding of the Central Tribunal. He did not, for he could take no exception to it. He obtained, or professed to obtain, certain work which he knew would not be sanctioned by the Central Tribunal and accordingly, it appeared quite plainly on the face of the documents, that the finding in fact in the special case, behind which they could not go, that the condition mentioned in the certificate of exemption had not been complied with. Accordingly, they must answer the first question — Were the objections to the case rightly repelled? — in the affirmative. Question No. Two—Was the notice to appellant to join the colours a competent requisition which he was bound to obey? The answer was in the affirmative. The Third question — Had the magistrate any right or any duty, to review the conditional exemption founded upon or the procedure adopted in the giving thereof? The answer was in the negative. The Fourth question—Was the appellant rightly convicted of the offence charged. The answer was in the affirmative.

"The Lord Justice Clerk and Lord Cullen concurred.

"£7 7s. Expenses Allowed.

"The respondent was allowed seven guineas expenses.

"FUTURE PROCEDURE.

"It is understood that Councillor Dollan was released by the Home Office pending his appeal and that in the event of its being decided against him he was told to hold himself at the disposal of the Home Office Committee dealing with conscientious objectors.

"A demonstration demanding his release is to take place on Glasgow Green on Sunday, and, although the magistrates have prohibited the demonstration, it is the intention of the promoters to carry through the arrangements."

There were other reports of the appeal to the High Court of Justiciary published in the Glasgow and Edinburgh press. The report that appeared in the Glasgow Daily Record on Saturday, September 1, 1919, was set out somewhat differently from what appeared in the Times.

Reporting Mr. Gentles' opening speech for Dollan, the Record report sets out the following statement by Counsel and discussion with the Court:—

"Mr. Gentles—If a conscientious objector did his bit, what was the sense of not allowing him to do it in one place and compelling him to do it somewhere else?

"Lord Cullen—I suppose that the idea is that a conscientious objector might have a certain established sphere of influence which it was not desirable he should exercise, and that he should remove to some place where he was a stranger.

"Mr. Gentles—I think your Lordship has put your finger on the crux of the case. Is this the proper procedure to secure deportations? It amounts to deportation.

"What is Deportation?

"The Lord Justice Clerk—What do you mean by deportation? Every man who has to join the colours has to leave his wife and family.

"Mr. Gentles—A soldier cannot serve in combatant service without leaving his wife and family, but of course one who is not doing combatant service can do his work as well in one place as another."

It should be explained that the Lord Justice Clerk referred to in this report is mentioned in the Times report as Lord Scott Dickson. The Record described the dismissal of the appeal in much the same terms as those employed in the Times. The following extract from the Record's summary of the Lord Justice General's speech makes very clear reading:—

"The Lord Justice General said the appellant was of recruitable age and otherwise eligible. After some procedure, the Central Tribunal granted him a certificate of exemption from combatant service on the ground that he was a conscientious objector. That certificate was absolute; but it further proceeded to say that, if within seven days of the date of the certificate, April 2, 1919, the appellant undertook work under the direction of the Committee on Work of National Importance and the Central Tribunal, he should also be exempted from non-combatant service. That, his Lordship took it, was a certificate of conditional exemption from non-combatant service."

The following excerpt is from the Glasgow Daily Record and Mail for Monday, September 3, 1917:—

"COUNCILLOR DOLLAN.

"Speeches having for their main theme a condemnation of the action of the Military Authorities with regard to Councillors P. J. Dollan and George Smith were delivered from two platforms at Nelson's Monument, Glasgow Green, yesterday afternoon.

"As the gathering was held despite an order of prohibiton from the magistrates, the names of those actively participating were taken by the police.

"The resolution, which was carried unanimously at both meetings, called upon the Government to release both men."

The back page of the Record carried a picture of the huge gathering on the Green, headed "Gathering of Sympathisers with Councillors Dollan and Smith."

Forward, for October 6, 1917, published an account of what was happening beneath a big caption as follows:—

GLASGOW COUNCILLORS AND MILITARY SERVICE.

"In connection with Councillor Shinwell's case, some technical mistake has been made in the proceedings, and Shinwell has been summoned for a re-hearing. The following letters shew the sort of evidence that the Tribunals gaily over-ruled when turning Shinwell down. . . .

"Mr. James O'Grady, M.P., a member of the Central Tribunal, has written to Mr. Geo. Galloway, the Secretary of the Govan Labour Representation Committee, stating he was present when Dollan's exemption was granted, and there was then no 'Fifty Miles' condition spoken of. In fact he 'knows nothing about it.' Presently Dollan is ill, the result of prison treatment, and has been ordered by his doctor to do nothing for a month, but along comes the Home Office and says he must go to Wakefield, whether he is ill or not. When the Central Tribunal interviewed Dollan in prison, the chairman informed him they had not imposed the fifty miles condition. Who imposed it?

"An amusing feature of the Dollan case is that the Home Office people have asked him to refund £2 12s 3d, being the amount expended on his railway fare and maintenance, on the journey from Wormwood Scrubbs to Glasgow. This request will take some beating for audacity.

"Councillors James Welsh and James Walker, who did not appeal for exemption, were rejected on medical grounds."

In our next issue we shall deal with Lord Provost Dollan, 1939; his National Service parade in Hyde Park, his Paris visit and speech, and his activity in New York.

"CONCHIES" — 1916-1918

Full records of those who resisted the Military Service Acts, 1916, were never secured. The following under-statement was issued in June, 1918:—

Number resisting	5459
Number Court-martialled	4884
Court-martialled once	3623
Court-martialled twice	604
Court-martialled thrice	464
Court-martialled four times	181
Court-martialled five times	12
Number discharged (Medical)	362
Number accepting Non-Combatant Service or F.A.U. after arrest	291
Number dead since arrest	22
Number working H.O. Scheme.....	2951
Number exceptionally employed (H.O. Scheme)	209
Number disappeared	220
Number at liberty	124
Number imprisoned	1179

The "Daily Mail" for June 15, 1918, reported the proceedings of the South Yorkshire Appeal Tribunal the previous day:

Lord Wharncliffe (to conscientious objector)—Do you enjoy the privileges of a British citizen?
The Appellant—By God's grace I do.
Lord Wharncliffe—Oh, leave that out.
The Appellant — I cannot; I am subject to God first.
Lord Wharncliffe—You are going into the Army. They know how to deal with silly boys like you.

With our next issue, we shall introduce cartoons and illustrations.

HYDE PARK CASE.

The Dollan exposures have compelled us to hold over the reports of the Hyde Park case and the expenses incurred. Although we conducted this case in person, both in the Police Court and the High Court, we have to pay the expenses of the other side. Our own expenses were insignificant. The total expenses we have to pay the Crown are £40.

Full reports of the Hyde Park Free Speech struggle were intended to be published in this issue. They will appear next month. Meantime readers can help. Our intention is to establish the right to circulate literature and take collections at public meetings in Hyde Park. Every sympathiser should contribute to our fund now.

EMRYS HUGHES' STAND

When Conscription was introduced into Britain in 1916, Emrys Hughes, the son of a Nonconformist minister, was a school teacher and member of the I.L.P. He became Secretary to the Aberdare No-Conscription Fellowship and a member of the South Wales Anti-Conscription Council. In due course, he appealed, under the Military Service Act, to the Mountain Ash Local Tribunal. He was asked no questions as to his principles but was quizzed by the Tribunal because of his association with the Merthyr Pioneer. His appeal was dismissed and he appealed to the County Tribunal. His appeal was dismissed by the County Tribunal also; and he was arrested, brought before the local magistrates at the Abercynon Police Court. Sitting on the Bench were the Chairman of the Local Tribunal, the Military Representative, and another member of Local Tribunal. These persons had neither the decency nor the justice to retire from the Bench. They sat, literally in their own cause, to uphold their own decision, and fined Hughes 40/- and costs, to be deducted from his army pay! What magistrates!

Hughes was taken to Cardiff, under military escort, with three other conscientious objectors, Smith, Morgan, and Kendall. They were taken to the recruiting office. Here Sergeant-Major Ashton called out their names. Each replied: "Here." Ashton said: "We'll teach you to say "Here, sir; you b—."

They were taken upstairs to the stripping room, where they gave names, addresses, and other particulars about themselves. They were ordered by Sergeant-Major Ashton to strip for medical examination. They refused. Whereupon Ashton called them: "B— swine." Several times Ashton used foul and indecent expressions to them and egged privates on to do the same. One soldier said to Smith: "Before God, if there were no one else present, I would tear you limb from limb."

Major Lucas was sent for, and the situation was explained to him. He said to Hughes: "You will have hell at the depot, and will be fed on bread and water."

Encouraged by the attitude of Major Lucas, Sergeant-Major Ashton, the private soldiers, and a civilian clerk also abused Smith, Morgan, Kendall, and Hughes.

After this, they were taken into the doctors, who were courteous. Major Lucas was present at the ordered medical examination and he was courteous here also. One doctor took charge and said it was a request and not a command. Hughes replied that he did not view it in this light. He added: "Without any disrespect to you personally, I refuse to obey military orders."

The doctor forgot what he had said about a request and not a command. He told Hughes that he was liable to be shot, and Hughes replied: "You can bring in your firing party."

This took the doctor back a bit and he asked the four "Conchies" to go downstairs and think it over. At the end of that time they saw the doctor again, and explained that it was their intention to refuse to obey military orders. An armed escort of 16 men, carrying fixed bayonets, escorted them to the depot where they were treated both civilly and courteously.

On April 25th, 1916, Smith, Morgan, Kendall, and Hughes were marched to the recruiting office, under escort. Ashton again was present and used abusive language. They were ordered to strip and attest by Major Lucas. As they were leaving under escort, Sergeant-Major Ashton remarked: "I hope you will get shot." Hughes replied: "We will meet again."

In reporting this conversation, Ashton said that Hughes added: "If I do not do you in someone will do it for me."

The case of Emrys Hughes was reported in the Merthyr Pioneer for May 20, 1916. A fuller report was published in that journal the following week. Hughes admitted two charges of refusing to obey military orders. He denied the third charge of using threatening language to Sergeant-Major Ashton. Evidence in support of this denial were given by Kendall and Morgan, who were present when the alleged conversation occurred. The utterance can be dismissed as untrue, without such evidence, for two reasons:—

(1) The statement is entirely untrue to type. We had met Hughes just before his arrest in the office of the Merthyr Pioneer and we had discussed his opinions and approach to life with his closest intimates. The expression did not fit in with his ideals or conversation.

(2) The words said to have been employed do belong to the daily conversation of Sergeant-Major Ashton, and are true to type. The Sergeant-Major was an ignorant and uncultured person; incapable of truthful report yet not intending always to report falsely; unable to stand contradiction; and given, under such unusual conditions to brooding. Contradiction he regarded as an outrage. Hughes delicate phrase "We will meet again" would sound sinister to his ears, and would suggest assault and battery unto death. The phrase suggests retribution. Ashton's statement was false, but the falsehood may have been less deliberate than it seems on the surface.

The President of the Court Martial objected to Hughes describing how he came to be in a situation where he was made subject to military commands and so compelled to disobey them. Hughes contended that the recital of these events formed the background of the charge against him.

Captain Cremlyn conducted the prosecution. He cross-examined Hughes.

CAPTAIN CREMLYN: "Your statement is an admission of the charges, barring the third, in which you are accused of using threatening language? Do you deny having used the expression, 'If I don't do you in, someone else will do it for me'?

HUGHES: "Most decidedly I do; I never use such Billingsgate."

CAPTAIN CREMLYN: "With the exception of that particular charge, you admit that you refused to obey military orders?"

HUGHES: "I do."

In his opening statement to the Court Martial, Hughes said: "I hold that all war is detrimental to the interests of the working class."

In his later defence, Hughes thanked the Court for its courtesy towards him.

"Not being a lawyer I have felt handicapped in defending myself, but I must say that I have been treated with more toleration than at the Mountain Ash Tribunal, the Appeal Tribunal, or the Police Court.

"As to the first two charges, I admit having disobeyed military authority. I had intended doing so.

"The inevitable result of Conscription was to make a soldier of me, but I was not prepared to become a soldier under any circumstances whatever. When the law declared I was to be a soldier, I could do nothing but disobey the law. I did so and intend to do so. I am one in a minority: a minority which is unpopular. I am not perturbed about it.

"In all the warring countries of Europe men of my persuasion are opposing the military machine. Dr. Liebknecht and his comrades in Germany; the Socialists in Russia; the Socialists in Italy; and the minority among the Socialists of France are taking up this attitude of opposing war. I am taking the same attitude in this country.

"I am not going to be a soldier. Whether it means being sent to your prisons; whether it means a dark cell or irons, or any other of the new methods of torture which are being revived; whether it means being sent to France to be shot for disobeying orders, I am prepared for it."

Hughes denied the third charge and stated that Ashton had used violent language throughout. Hughes added:

"The whole atmosphere of the recruiting office was one of bullying and cowardice. The stripping-room was a den of bullies, blackguards and liars."

PRESIDENT: I am not sure whether the two first charges matter more to you than the third.

HUGHES: The third matters more to me because it is an attempt to vilify me in the movement with which I am connected.

PRESIDENT: Do you deny the charge?

HUGHES: I do.

Captain Cremlyn closing the case for the prosecution referred somewhat ambiguously to the third charge. Without wanting to admit its falsehood, he seemed to think it was rather thin. He asked for a conviction on the two charges of disobeying military orders.

Captain Cremlyn said:—

"The first two charges are admitted by the prisoner, and his own defence only confirms the case against him. The Court had a full opportunity of listening to him. He is an educated man, fully aware of what he was saying. He admits to deliberately attempting to propagate his Socialistic and other opinions even in defiance of the law of the land. . . .

"I must ask the Court to take a serious view of this case. No matter how sincere, how honest, the prisoner might be, these people cannot be allowed to resist the law, because history shows that revolutions are easier to promote than to control; and revolutions had nearly always been promoted by misguided and fanatical people who believed they had a mission to perform."

The sentences on Smith, Hughes and Kendall were promulgated publicly from the Barracks Square, Cardiff, on Saturday, May 20, 1916:—

Gwlym I. Smith (22), school teacher — 2 years' detention, commuted to 6 months.

Percy Kendall (23), platelayer — 2 years' hard labour, commuted to 6 months.

Emrys Hughes (21) — 2 years' hard labour, commuted to 9 months' detention.

Beth Morgan's sentence, made public the same week, was 6 months' detention.

LONDON U.S.M. APPEAL

As the Great War of 1914-18 exposed the corrupt Second International leaders and bankrupt parliamentarians, so the new 1939 war crisis revealed once more to the working-class movement, the hopeless political bankruptcy of the Labour Party and the Communist Party.

Taking the form of Anti-Fascism, the new war psychology has brought in its train a wave of patriotism that will eventually lead these two parties into becoming the chief recruiting sergeants of the National Government.

As Labourism, supported by the careerists of Westminster outdo each other in crying for more and more armaments to defend "democracy," so do the Stalinists of the C.P. wave their Red Flag and shout louder for democratic A.R.P., democratic territorials, and collective armaments to defend capitalist democracy. "Defend Britain's Honour!" "Bomb-proof Shelters!" "Youth for the Militia!" These, and many similar slogans, are the battle-cries of the degenerate C.P. This political hypocrisy is directly the outcome of Stalinism, the complete abandonment of the Class Struggle in favour of the alliance of Imperialist governments to oppose the Rome-Berlin-Tokio axis.

No longer do these chauvinists rely on the power of organised labour; no longer is it a question of "turning imperialist war into civil war"; but they are prepared to sacrifice the workers to justify Stalinism and "Socialism in One Country."

We who refuse to be stampeded by these tricksters, we who believe in Socialism through the Social Revolution, will stand firm by our principles, resolute in our determination to fight this perversion of Socialism and we will build a movement of workers pledged to overthrow Capitalism, Parliamentarism, and the bureaucracy of Social-Patriotism. Our cry is "End Capitalism and so end Fascism and War."

LAW, CONSCIENCE, AND THE MILITIA

Famous United States Case

The written constitution of the United States of America but defines the unwritten Constitution of the United Kingdom. It is important to recall this fact in connection with the famous Brief on Behalf of the Plaintiffs-in-Error, Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman, against the United States, Defendant-in-Error, presented to the Supreme Court of the United States, October Term, 1917, by Harry Weinberger, Attorney for Plaintiffs-in-Error, 261 Broadway, Borough of Manhattan, City of New York. Case No. 702.

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT.

The preliminary statement of this Appeal set forth the indictment against Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman. We abridge the indictment and eliminate legal repetition in order to simplify reading.

The indictment charged the defendants, (described in the appeal as Plaintiffs-in-Error) with conspiracy as accessories before the fact for violation of the Draft Act. This Act was similar to the Military Service Acts of Great Britain passed in 1916, and fundamentally the same as the Military Training Act of Great Britain of 1939. There is an age difference which is immaterial. In each case the Act replaces a voluntary army with a conscript militia. In his argument for the Supreme Court, Attorney Weinberger deals with the constitutional importance of this difference and its relation to the rights of citizens. The argument is both brilliant and fundamental. It applies equally to Great Britain as to the United States and merits careful study.

THE INDICTMENT.

"The Grand Jury of the United States of America, within and for the 'Southern District of New York' on their oath present that:"

(1) On May 18, 1917, the President of the United States issued the Proclamation, as provided by the Act of Congress he had approved that day, entitled "An Act to authorise the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

(2) This Proclamation gave notice to all persons subject to registration in the several States and in the district of Columbia, in accordance with the said Act, that the time and place of such registration was between 7 a.m. and 9 p.m. on June 5, 1917, at the registration place in the precinct wherein they may have their permanent homes.

(3) Those who had attained their twenty-first birthday and who had not attained their thirty-first birthday, on or before June 5, 1917, were required to register, excepting only officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the National Guard and Naval Militia, while in the service of the United States, and officers in the Officers' Reserve Corps, and enlisted men in the Enlisted Reserve Corps, while in active service.

(4) Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman, both late of the City and County of New York, from May 18 to June 15, 1917, when the indictment was filed at the Southern District of New York, unlawfully, wilfully, knowingly, and feloniously did conspire together and agree between themselves, and with divers other persons whose names were unknown, to commit an offence against the United States, the divers unknown persons being male persons between the ages of twenty-one and thirty, both inclusive, subject to registration for military service.

(5) The defendants conspired to aid, abet, council, command, induce and procure divers unknown persons, male and subject to registration, unlawfully and wilfully, to fail and refuse to present themselves for registration and to submit to regulations made by the President under the Draft Act.

(6) The defendant, Emma Goldman, on May 13, 1917, addressed a public meeting in the Harlem River Park and Casino, Second Avenue, New York. She began her address with the words: "We don't believe in conscription."

(7) The defendant, Alexander Berkman, on June 1, 1917, published in New York, a periodical, entitled The Blast, Vol. 2, No. 5, in which he attacked conscription.

(8) The defendant, Emma Goldman, on June 2, 1917, at the office of the No-Conscription League, 28 East 125th Street, New York, gave to James A. Hegarty, a copy of the periodical Mother Earth, Vol. 12, June, 1917, No. 4. This paper attacked conscription.

(9) The defendant, Alexander Berkman, on June 4, 1917, addressed a public meeting at Hunts Point Palace, Southern Boulevard, New York, against conscription. He began with the words: "Comrades, friends, and enemies." He ended with the words: "You know that after all, the cause of the soldiers and of the workers is a common cause."

(10) The defendant, Emma Goldman, addressing the same meeting in company with the defendant, Berkman, began her address with the words: "Men, don't you know the soldiers came here to disturb the meeting?" She ended with the words: "And you will all raise one mighty voice just going to drown militarism."

The indictment concluded: "Against the peace of the United States and their dignity, and contrary to the form of the Statute of the United States in such cases made and provided (ss 37 and 332 U.S.C.C. and s. 5 of the Act of May 18, 1917)."

Weinberger's brief commented on the indictment: "Nowhere is there any allegation of an actual violation of the Draft Act or of any principle who may have violated the act."

This comment is very important as a foundation for the Counsel's argument that conscription was used for the purpose of suppressing free speech and the constitutional right of discussion generally, without the State being called upon to make specific accusation.

ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

The official report of the original charge seems to have been an extensive volume, running into several hundred pages. The "Assignments of Error," or objections taken in law, are stated in extenso on pages 534-539 of the transcript of record. Their nature is indicated by the arguments put forward in the Brief of Error. These arguments may be summarised under the following four points:—

(1) No crime charged in the indictment. This argument is that although conscription has become law the citizen has a constitutional right to attack conscription and cannot be charged with causing people not to register as conscripts merely because he seeks to overthrow the act and makes clear his personal opposition.

(2) No evidence of the defendants' guilt under the indictment. This point defines the application of the first point. The Counsel argues that a person cannot be charged with inciting another to evade or to refuse obedience to the conscription act merely by making a general attack on the principle of conscription or even of the act introducing conscription. The charge must be specific and the prosecution must produce a person who is able to declare without committing perjury, that he would have registered as a conscript but for the accused person molesting him and inciting him not to register or to obey.

(3) Conscription is unconstitutional. The Counsel in this case based his reasoning on several amendments to the United States Constitution. As stated in the precise terms of the American amendments, this argument does not apply in Britain. But the constitutional law defined in those amendments to which appeal is made, does operate in Britain. Fundamentally, therefore, the appeal is to the same principle. The argument is that conscription implies involuntary servitude; and deprives the citizen of life, liberty and property, without due process of law. The Counsel also argues that in practice conscription prohibits the free exercise of religious belief, because it sets up peculiar concepts of conscience invading the right of the individual to decide.

(4) If conscription is unconstitutional, no citizen can be charged with a conspiracy to violate it. The activity, therefore, of the No-Conscription League, and of its speakers, was constitutional and expressive of their citizen rights.

THE EVIDENCE.

The evidence upon which Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman were convicted, and upon which the Counsel relied for his appeal on the ground of error, were stated concisely by him in support of his second point. They are abstracted and stated separately here by way of introduction because their actual recital does not affect the argument. If the reader has them before him he can follow the reasoning better.

Mother Earth and The Blast were published on two different floors at the New York address already mentioned. The work of the No-Conscription League was done mostly from the office of The Blast. The League was a voluntary association of which Goldman and Berkman were members. Berkman was editor of The Blast and Goldman edited Mother Earth. Berkman edited Mother Earth up to November, 1915, and subsequently published The Blast in San Francisco. In March, 1917, he transferred the paper to New York. The No-Conscription League was formed on May 9, 1917, before the Draft Law was passed, to protest against its passage. The League published a manifesto, which formed a Government exhibit in the trial. The protest meeting held on May 18, 1917, at the Harlem River Casino was arranged before the Draft Act became law. Both defendants spoke at this meeting, which started at 8 and ended at 10.30 p.m. No one at the meeting knew that the Draft Law was passed and the defendants had not seen a newspaper or announcement that the Draft Bill had become law until after the meeting was held. The meeting was called "the No-Conscription meeting," and the Government admitted that it was not a "no-registration meeting."

On May 23 1917, an informal meeting was held of the No-Conscription League. Emma Goldman was not present but sent a letter from Springfield, Mass., which the Prosecution exhibited. This letter was against advising people not to register and specifically added "but what I do with myself on behalf of my ideal is quite another matter from what I would suggest to you to do; I cannot and I will not take the responsibility for your lives, your liberty."

When the Government raided the defendants' offices on June 15, 1917, the detectives seized a typewritten copy of the original letter.

William H. Randolph, a patrolman of the New York City Police, who was also a shorthand reporter, attended the meeting at the Harlem River Casino. He took down and transcribed Emma Goldman's speech. He stated that she said: "We are going to support all the men who will refuse to register." He also testified that she said: "We believe in violence and we will use violence."

Helen Boardman, a psychological research worker for the Bureau of Educational Experiments, testified that her forefathers came to America in 1640 and that her views were American. She was present at the Harlem River Casino meeting and she heard Emma Goldman say that she would not advise people not to register, as she was not subject to registration herself, and she considered it a matter for each individual's conscience. Emma Goldman did not say she believed in violence and did not threaten to use it. Similar evidence was given by Anna Sloan; Minna Lederman, a graduate of Barnard College; and several other witnesses unconnected with the socialist or labour movement.

A large part of the trial was taken up with contentions as to the reference to violence at this meeting on May 18, and to supporting men who refused to register. The judge, in his charge to the jury, said the question of violence was not germane. He declared that the phrase "we believe in violence" was no part of the Government's case; and that the meeting on May 18 was inadmissable, as the Draft Act had not been signed when the meeting was convened. He charged the jury that everything that was said at this meeting could not be considered as an overt act.

To an ordinary person this would mean that the whole case for the prosecution fell. But, whilst ruling that it was inadmissible, the Court treated its own ruling as casual and so actually left an impression with the jury that the very evidence it had ruled out was before it for consideration.

Charles Pickler, Counsellor-at-Law, a member of the Bar of the State of New York, and of the Federal Bar, an expert shorthand reporter for twenty-five years, officially reported and transcribed the speeches of Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman at Hunts Point Palace at the request of the No-Conscription League. Whereas Mr. Pickler stated that Emma Goldman spoke 200 words a minute, John C. Dillon, a stenographer in the employ of the New York Police Department testified that she spoke 125 words a minute. The point of this difference was that if Pickler was right the evidence of the witness Randolph was perjured.

Lincoln Steffens, reporter, correspondent and magazine writer, testified that he reported the first speech Emma Goldman made in America and had heard her talk often. He had had several private discussions with her and had never heard her advocate violence. As a matter of fact she was opposed to violence, war and militarism.

Paul Munter, public stenographer and official stenographer for the Referee in Bankruptcy, and Court Stenographer for the Supreme Court, Westchester County, stated that he had reported Emma Goldman's lectures and speeches regularly since 1914. She spoke not less than 150 words a minute. Usually 200.

Mary Ealoner Fitzgerald spoke to the reading of the letter Emma Goldman sent from Springfield. The stand of the defendants and of the No-Conscription League was "not to tell people not to register."

Bolton Hall, lawyer and writer, said he had known Emma Goldman for more than twenty years and she had never urged violence.

The Court eliminated the meeting of May 18 from the case and charged the jury that before the act passed on that date any person could discuss in the fullest possible manner the provisions of pending legislation and use the most vehement language. The Court nevertheless refused the motion of the defence to dismiss the Government's case on the ground that there was no evidence before the Court at all.

The Prosecution did not dispute the defence reporters account of the Hunts Point Palace meeting and agreed that the people were not advised or urged not to register.

The evidence showed that the defendants were arrested on June 15, 1917. The defendant Berkman was suffering from a severe injury to his leg and experienced great pain whilst in jail awaiting trial. He was released from jail Monday night, June 25, at 5 p.m., and ordered to appear for trial on the Wednesday morning.

The jury returned their verdict at 6 p.m. Emma Goldman's request that sentence be deferred for a few days and that the bail of 25,000 dollars cash each be continued was denied. The judge said that the defendants, who were in custody, could make application for bail to the Circuit Court. As the defendants were in custody, and as the Court was in recess and it was necessary to find the judge to whom to make the application, such application was impossible.

The Court proceeded to pass sentence: two years' imprisonment and 10,000 dollar fine on each defendant. Defendant Goldman stated that they intended to appeal the case and the judge said they could have ninety days in which to sue out the Writ of Error. No facilities were given them, however, to consult Counsel, and at 7 p.m. they were taken to the Marshal's office to await trains for Atlanta and Jefferson prisons respectively.

In our next issue we shall publish the brief of the Counsel, Harry Weinberger, setting forth the case against conscription from the standpoint of the constitutional right of the citizen.

ONCE CALLED A HERO!

WAR VICTIMS—AND VETERANS

The case of soldier Thomas Parker, recorded in our last issue, is typical of the treatment of war veterans. Sir Ian Hamilton asked the B.B.C. to let him make a "Week's Good Cause" appeal on behalf of the South African Veterans' Association. He was refused.

Sir Ian Hamilton attended the conference of the British Legion in Scotland, held at Aberdeen, on Saturday, June 24, 1939. In his speech he said:—

"People forget war veterans very quickly. If we have another war it looks as if the British Legion itself will be overwhelmed. The poppies will all be sold on behalf of the new lot."

General Sir Ian Hamilton is the Grand President of the South African War Veterans' Association. He was unable to attend their annual conference at Salisbury, because of his Aberdeen engagement. But a message was read from him, explaining that the appeal to the B.B.C. was signed, among other officials, by at least a dozen famous generals. He declared that the appeal was made on behalf of

"some ten thousand old soldiers, many of whom, at the average age of 63, find themselves without employment, and two years to go before they can claim the Old Age Pension."

Soldier Thomas Parker was literally done to death by neglect in June, 1933. Sir Ian Hamilton's statement proves that the neglect of the war veterans is continuous through the years. One may go backwards and forwards and find instances galore of the neglect of, and contempt for, the ex-serviceman. Kipling made this neglect the theme of his poetry and so attained immortality. "Once Called A Hero" could be inscribed over many a neglected pauper's grave.

Lance-Corporal John Albert Cross, of Bow, served in the Sussex Regiment during the Great War of 1914-1918. Before enlistment, he was a car-man and enjoyed splendid health. On enlistment, the medical authorities certified his physical development as excellent. He was discharged from the army with shrapnel lodged in his thigh. He walked with a limp; had pains in his leg; and could not fully extend his knee. Under the pension scale partly exposed in our last issue, his disablement was assessed at 25 per cent. He was awarded a pension of 4/8 per week.

Cross was wounded in January, 1916, and remained in the hospital till March of that year. In July, 1916, he was taken back to hospital for treatment of the old wound. In August, 1916, he was discharged from the army on account of this same wound. He continued to suffer from this wound for five years but received no treatment for his sufferings. In 1921, an abscess formed in his leg, and he developed kidney and lung trouble. Christmas of that year saw him back in hospital for the removal of the shrapnel. He was found to be suffering from tuberculosis of the lungs. On March 30, 1922, Cross returned home very ill and died on April 3, 1922. His doctor certified:—

"I am quite satisfied that the tuberculosis originated from the gunshot wound of six years ago.

"I have had a large experience of similar cases in India, and have frequently found that a wound was the origin of tuberculosis disease even after some years of freedom from any symptoms. The wound was quite healed at the time of his death. The post-mortem examination revealed: (1) Signs of tubercle in the lungs, caseating masses and nodules, no cavities; (2) disease of the aortic valve, with much cardiac dilation and hypertrophy (weight of heart, 18 oz.); (3) old entry and exit wound scars on the inner aspect of the right thigh, obviously due to a gunshot wound; (4) liver and spleen much congested, kidneys also congested.

"In my opinion, the cause of death was pulmonary congestion following pulmonary tuberculosis and heart disease, originating in debility following the gunshot wound."

The doctor added:—

"I have had considerable experience, both among British and Indian troops, of similar cases. In India I was in charge of a large number of tubercular cases, every one of whom had been a perfectly healthy man before receiving a gunshot or shrapnel wound. I therefore had no hesitation in forming the opinion which I stated at the inquest."

The doctor proceeded to describe how, owing to wounds, it had been impossible for Cross to work, and how, owing to his small pension, he had suffered from continuous malnutrition.

Two years later another case came to light. The News of the World for October 26, 1924, published the following item:—

"V.C. DIES IN POVERTY.

"Guardsman Who Attacked Machine-Gun Post Single-Handed.

"Almost penniless, Thomas Whitham, V.C., who won the honour when a private in the 1st Coldstream Guards, has died of peritonitis at Oldham Royal Infirmary. Whitham won the Cross on July 31, 1917, the opening day of the Battle of Ypres. His battalion were storming positions on Pilckem Ridge, and were held up by enfilade fire from a machine-gun post. He attacked the gun crew single-handed, and his bravery enabled his comrades to advance. Deceased leaves a widow and six children. Prior to his admittance to the infirmary he had been out of work, and had to raise money on his medal."

Now for another aspect of the treatment meted out to war's victims. During 1917, Philip Snowden, not then expecting to be a Viscount, courageously and persistently exposed such practices at the Front as the shooting of the for "desertion in the face of the enemy." Thomas Johnston recorded the story in Forward, for November 17, 1917, as follows:—

"SHELL-SHOCKED KILMARNOCK BOY"

"We have seen the letters in this case, the broken-hearted boy writing to his parents describing the pains in his head (from previous shell-shock) and how on his way to the trenches again, a shell burst close to him and destroyed what small nervous control he had left, and how he walked away, and how he was now awaiting court martial. 'Don't forget to send a parcel and I will let you know what I get in my court martial. . . . Your ever loving son, Stanley.'

"We have also seen the official intimation to the parents that the 'sentence' was duly executed on the 29th day of August."

Poor Stanley was persuaded to enlist by the recruiting appeals of Harry Lauder! When he enlisted he was a "hero," like John Albert Cross, and Thomas Whitman.

On behalf of the War Office, Mr. Macpherson declined "to interfere with the discretion of the Army Command in such cases." Let this fact be be told to every recruit, to every conscript.

print what you will, as long as the authorities do not decide that it constitutes sedition? For these are the "traditional" democratic rights of which we are so jealous.

Surely even a cursory examination discloses that this Democracy is, alike with the Fascism which it is to oppose, merely a phrase of the same Capitalist system. Is it not obvious, therefore, that if there must be war, it should be a war, not to protect these pseudo-democratic rights, but a war to overthrow the system which is responsible for all war? It should not be an internecine war between the workers of different nations, but a war in which they stand shoulder to shoulder, and refuse to be any longer the victims of Capitalist exploitation.

That may be at present only an idealistic vision. But a strong, organised and determined opposition to war is not only a possibility but a certainty—if we can only make sure that all those who are opposed to militarism, from whatever viewpoint, are prepared to stand together. If, having made sure of that, we can bend our efforts towards making others realise the horror and folly of war, and the fact that it is within their power to stop another war if only they will say: "I will not fight."

It is on that determination that we must make our stand, refusing to be misled by any side-issue, secure in the knowledge that the case for Conscientious Objection is clear and irrefutable. And if cries of "cowardice" and "irresponsibility" are levelled against us, it is only because our detractors know that they have no real answer, because they know that it is the Conscientious Objectors, and not they, who have reason to be proud of their beliefs.

A Matter Of Conscience

(By ANNESLEY G. ALDRED)

In these days of almost breath-taking development in every field of science it is difficult to credit the mentality of those people who, throughout the ages, laughed at, abused, stoned and burnt the pioneers of thought and progress. We are horrified when we read that Bruno was burnt at the stake for stating what any school child now knows to be the truth. We are amazed when we read of the stoning of the first trains and the wrecking of the machines that presaged the coming of the machine age. And we marvel at the incredible folly of those who thought that by such actions they could dam the flood-tide of human progress. Thinking thus, we smugly pat ourselves on the back and think how much more intelligent, how much more tolerant, we are!

It is, indeed, an easy matter to lull ourselves into the feeling that the need for pioneers no longer exists; to feel that the spade-work has been done and that it is now only a matter of patience, whilst progress pursues its inevitable course, and then we will find ourselves living in an ideal state of society.

A beautiful dream, But unfortunately without pioneers there is no "inevitable" course of progress. Unfortunately the "incredible fools" of the middle ages not only have their counterparts in our midst, but are still in a majority.

And so, with the War drums beating again with an insistence that, one fears, will not be denied, it becomes ever more urgent for us to pioneer the cause of peace, once again, and to challenge, and finally overthrow, the system which, whilst it exists, will always result in wars.

A little over twenty years ago there was a War. A "war to end war." Countless millions of workers, of almost every race and creed, lost their lives to make the world "safe for democracy." And when it was all over, those who were left heaved a sigh of relief. The soldiers returned from the front and vowed "Never again." And because peace was temporarily necessary to the capitalists as well as to the workers, pacifism was allowed to become popular. It became fashionable to state one's pacifist beliefs. And at one "memorable" demonstration in the Albert Hall, London, the public were overwhelmed with an array of speeches on the subject of Disarmament, from the mouths of the Right Honourable James Ramsay MacDonald, the Right Honourable Stanley Baldwin, and the Right Honourable David Lloyd George. And we were all able to sleep soundly in our beds secure in the knowledge that three "Honourable" Prime Ministers of England had assured us that never again would we be dragged into an armaments race.

Then we woke up one morning and found a most shocking story on the front pages of the daily press. The Oxford Union had affirmed a decision not to fight for "King and Country." Immediately they were labelled "cowardly," "contemptible" and "irresponsible." An anonymous "hero" sent them a consignment of white feathers. And eventually the Minute containing the decision was torn out of the book and destroyed, as though that would alter the decision.

But the damage had been done. We realised that this solid peace front was not so solid. It was, in fact, a mirage. It was still fashionable to talk vaguely of peace, but it was taboo to state clearly, "I will not fight." The first step towards the next war had been taken.

Since then we have moved step by step, with increasing rapidity, into the shadow of that war, until now we stand right on the brink. Munition factories are working at full speed in a feverish race to produce ever more terrible weapons of destruction. War fever and hysteria have been worked to such a pitch that Conscription has been introduced into this country almost without opposition. Conscientious objection is no longer a theoretical question but an immediate practical issue, not only to those who are receiving their "Calling Up" papers, but to every man and woman of the three generations who will be called upon to actively participate in the war.

Three generations! The first: the tattered remnants of those who fought in the last war, who, most of all, should realise the full hideousness of the mockery which is represented by the Cenotaphs to the "glorious" dead. The second: to whom war is, so far, only a childish "nightmare," but none the less horrible for that. The third: to whom war is but a chapter of their history books, possibly even retaining some of the glamour of a "glorious adventure."

It is probably because of this last factor that it is the last generation who have been selected for the first onslaught of conscription. To some extent, therefore, it is a hopeful sign that even two per cent. of those called upon to register should have done so as Conscientious Objectors. But it does bring home in very definite terms the still urgent necessity for propaganda.

Killing, even in individual cases, can find no justification on religious grounds, and very little justification on ethical grounds. But whilst there is a good case for euthanasia; and whilst there can be some understanding, if not sympathy, for a murder committed, under extreme provocation, in the heat of the moment, the mass killing of one's fellow workers cannot possibly have any justification or excuse whatever. Whether one is a Christian or, like myself, Agnostic, there is no gainsaying that the biblical command stands clear and unchallengeable, "Thou shalt not kill." And no amount of rhetoric from the pulpits will ever convince me that the Capitalist struggle for world markets constitutes a justifiable exception.

And yet, in spite of this, we find that only one in fifty of the youth of this country are prepared to make a definite stand against war. Even in this "enlightened" age only one person in fifty is prepared to translate their realisation of the horror and futility of war into a definite opposition and resistance to militarism.

What, then, of the other forty-nine? Do they want war? Or, isn't it the truth that, hating and dreading the thought of war, they are yet permitting themselves to be hoodwinked into believing that war is inevitable and that only by participating in it can they hope to save themselves. The "cannon fodder" is being mobilised. Everything is the same as in 1914 except that the weapons are ten times more deadly; except that the slogans have been brought up to date.

Then you were asked to fight for "King and Country," and later it became a "War to end War." Well, in spite of the press-boosted popularity of the present King and Queen, the first slogan has been "de-bunked." Too many Monarchies have fallen in the last few years for any person, even of average intelligence, to fail to realise that Kings are merely paid State Officials. As for the other one, the time is not yet ripe to use it again. Hence the new war cry: "Fight for Democracy against Fascism."

What a wonderful slogan!—from the Capitalist viewpoint. A brand new "bogey man" created, which at one stroke stampedes those who were wavering, and even sidetracks some of those who were prepared to resist. That has already forced not only the very pale pink Parliamentary Labour Party, but even some of the more genuine sections of the Socialist movement, into the position of giving their support to the Conservative re-armament programme under threat of being accused, if they did not do so, of refusing to challenge Fascism.

In other words, the so-called leaders of the Socialist movement have allowed themselves to be deluded, one can only hope that it was unwittingly, by a slogan which could not bear a moment's analysis.

Wherein lies this Democracy which we are to defend? Is it in the right to choose between two or three political candidates, all of whom are equally pledged to uphold the present system? Is it in the right to freedom of speech, provided that the nearest policeman does not take exception to what you are saying? Or is it in the right to

MARCUS GRAHAM

On March 25, 1938, President Roosevelt declared that since 1789, the United States of America has served as an asylum for political refugees from all over the world, and that it is his intention that the country shall continue to be a haven for political dissenters. The President's boast justifies reference to the 19-year-old persecution of Marcus Graham and the four years' persecution of his paper, "Man."

GRAHAM'S ARRESTS.

April, 1919, Paterson, N.J. — Imprisoned in County Jail two weeks. Denied non-meat food, although it was known that Graham was a vegetarian on principle. Taken to Ellis Island and imprisoned a further two weeks. Again denied non-meat foods. Charged with possession of literature expounding the philosophy of anarchism. Ordered deported to Canada. Canada refused to accept him.

February 21, 1921.—Main Public Library, New York City.—Taken to the "Bourt Squad." For refusing to give his address, was given a 24-hour "third degree." This treatment shocked even the doctors at Ellis Island when viewing his body. Present Police Commissioner Valentine of New York participated in this 1921 arrest and also the "third degree" brutality. "Detained," which means jailed, at Ellis Island six months. Government unsuccessfully renewed attempt to execute 1919 deportation warrant. Commissioner Have of Ellis Island granted Graham's request for non-meat food

July, 1930, Yuma, Arizona. — Arrested by an immigration inspector for possessing two copies of his own book, "An Anthology of Revolutionary Poetry" — a volume representing 400 renowned poets of twenty countries and obtainable in leading American libraries. Graham had published this work in 1929. Incarcerated for two weeks in the jails of Yuma, Arizona, El Centro, San Pedro and Los Angeles, California. Denied non-meat food in all four jails.

October, 1937, Los Angeles, Calif.—Thrown into county jail and forced to sleep on a bare floor for eight days. Home raided, October 6, 1937, by Mr. Henderson, an immigration inspector, with three assistant inspectors, without a search warrant. Property and MSS. seized. In handcuffs, Graham was paraded forcibly through the streets. Charged with being editor of an Anarchist monthly, "Man," since its inception.

Jan. 14, 1938, Los Angeles, Calif. — Sentenced by "liberal" Federal Judge, Leon R. Yankurich, to six months' imprisonment for "contempt of court" for refusing to testify against himself in the Immigration Department's attempt to execute the 19-year-old deportation warrant. Imprisoned over a week. Released on a $1000 bond on the 1919 deportation charge, and on another $1000 bond, pending a decision of the Ninth Federal Circuit Court of Appeals upon Judge Yankurich's sentence.

October 28, 1938—Six months' sentence reversed by Appeal Court, upon sole ground of self-incrimination. Appeal Court upheld rulings of lower court on central issue of case—enforcement of 1919 admittedly invalid deportation warrant. Remanded case to lower court, to determine which questions were self-incriminating and to hold Graham in "contempt of court" if he still refused to answer questions not held to be self-incriminating.

June 26, 1939, Los Angeles, Calif.—Sentenced, a second time, to six months' imprisonment, for refusing to testify against himself in the Labour Department's attempt to deport him.

In his speech before Judge Leon R. Yankurich, before sentence, on January 14, 1938, Graham traced the history of his persecution and stated his reasons for refusing to testify against himself. One passage reads:—

> "In Canada, during the last world war butchery, I spoke against Conscription and I am proud for having done so."

Patriotic Communists

The war crisis of 1938 discovered in Herbert Morrison a patriot whose love for his country, so far as oratory could express it, was only equalled by the great war speeches of the late Horatio Bottomley. Not to be outdone by the Rt. Hon. leader of the London County Council the Communists also have gone in for love of country. When conscription was passed, in more than one place they paraded with the Union Jack, the French Tricolour, and the Hammer and Sickle. In Glasgow, on May Day, 1938, they bravely paraded their patriotism as part of the Labour Day celebrations. Said "Forward," in its issue for May 7, 1938:—

"PATRIOTIC COMMUNISTS.

"The Communists (said the programme) are intensely proud of their country: 'We glory in the 'Land of brown heath and shaggy wood;
Land of the mountain and the flood.'

"And to prove it they carried banners telling the workers about the glorious history of their country, not forgetting the Stone of Destiny, 'Historic crowning stone of Scotland's kings,' and including portraits of well-known members of the proletariat like Sir Walter Scott."

These facts draw attention to the article written by W. Gallacher in "The Worker" for May 23, 1925, when he denounced Herbert Morrison for betraying the class war and attacked Ramsay MacDonald for repudiating the Red Flag. To-day this article makes excellent reading. Gallacher opens in his usual vainglorious, tuft-hunting style, that reminds one of the late H. M. Hyndman. It is the style of the man who knows everybody, who is somebody for five minutes, and is nobody for very long. It is the style of the man who manages to continue in a movement for some years without principle and without adding any note of value to the work or ideals of that movement. Says Gallacher:—

"I had a debate the other night in a Local Labour Party with the well-known anti-Communist, Herbert Morrison. . . .

"'We,' said Herbert, 'are out to emancipate the Duke of Northumberland as well as to emancipate the worker.' Who Herbert was speaking for when he said 'we' is not at all clear, but I am positive he wasn't speaking for Wheatley, Maxton or Kirkwood. . . . That's exactly the sort of thing that Lloyd George used to specialise in.

"You will notice that 'we' are not going to emancipate 'ourselves.' Oh, no; 'we' don't need emancipation. But the aristocracy and the workers! Truly these are unfortunate creatures, and 'we' must do something for them.

"Now, as 'we' are not the aristocracy, and as 'we' are not the workers, the question arises—Who are we? Get the answer to that and you get the cause of the rotten leadership of the Labour Party."

Gallacher then declares that while Morrison wished to abolish the working class and the aristocracy, Sidney Webb and the middle-class Comrade Baker, M.P., wanted "to give everyone the opportunity of becoming what is meant by the phrase 'an English gentleman.'

Gallacher pretended that there was a great deal of difference between the approach of Morrison and that of Baker, and asked them to make up their minds. He then asked them to solve the irritating porblem: "Can a Scots worker become an English gentleman?"

From this point Gallacher proceeded to attack Ramsay MacDonald for his objection to the words and music of "The Red Flag." He said:—

"You could never expect 'an English gentleman' to sing them. Just try to fancy Sidney Webb, Philip Snowden, Lord Olivier and the Great One (meaning Ramsay Macdonald) rendering a quartette —'With heads uncovered swear we all to bear it onward till we fall; come dungeons dark or gallows grim'! You can see right away it isn't the thing. You would never ask them to do it.

"'COME PALACE BRIGHT WITH GILDED CHAIRS.'

"Our leaders are 'nice' men, and there are all kinds of 'nice' people coming in to take charge of our movement for us, so naturally we must get a 'nice' song with 'nice' music—and what is more to the point, we must get a 'nice' emblem. For just as the song 'The Red Flag' is proletarian and jarring on sentitive, highly-strung people, so also is the flag itself—red, plain, glaring red; nothing artistic about it. Nothing 'nice' about it. The Union Jack is a much more artistic effort than the flag of revolution. A new song and a new flag—that is all Macdonald asks for. . . .

"Already the I.L.P. has issued a hymn-book wherein 'The Red Flag' appears minus the following verse:—

'It suits to-day the weak and base
Whose minds are fixed on pelf and place
To cringe before the rich man's frown
And haul the sacred emblem down.'

Then we have the significant fact that at the Manchester May Day turnout the Union Jack flew high and free on the I.L.P. lorry, while the Red Flag hung limp around its pole. . . .

"First the Communists are attacked, then the Red Flag has got to go, following which it will be the turn of the Left-wing to receive attention."

Perhaps Gallacher would explain the difference between the patriotic love of Empire now expressed by the Communist Party, and its new-found love for the Union Jack, and the Imperialist attitude of Herbert Morrison, or the patriotism of certain members of the I.L.P.? Is not the truth that parliamentarism, whether it calls itself Socialist parliamentarism or Communist parliamentarism, must end in Imperialism and patriotism?

It would be worth Gallacher's while to look back through the columns of the "Workers' Weekly," the Communist Party organ that was published in 1925. In that journal for April 6 of that year, the late Arthur McManus contributed an article attacking "Official I.L.P. Hypocrisy and Bluff" in the matter of British Colonial policy. McManus was dealing with the agenda of the 1925 National Congress of the I.L.P. and the report of its N.A.C. McManus points out that the action of the Conservative Government in Egypt and the Sudan against which the I.L.P. then protested, were initiated and carried out by members of the I.L.P. in the First Labour Government. McManus then comments:—

"One can imagine the enslaved millions of Indian workers reading the I.L.P. resolution and remembering at the same time MacDonald's threatening speech on the assumption of Government last year. Mayhap they will be just a little bit amused . . . when they further reflect on the bombardment of the Arabs in Iraq to the tune of the I.L.P. pacifism of Mr. Leach."

It should be recalled that Mr. Leach was a conscientious objector in 1916, and defender of bombing in 1924, when in office.

McManus concludes:—

"The whole sum and substance of the matter is that the I.L.P. has long since ceased to be a working-class party. If it had the slightest pretence even of appearing as such, it would remember just exactly what this British Empire is. It would reflect that it is nothing more or less than a gigantic colossal slave plantation; that the only thing which holds it together is not any bond of race or kinship, nor of tradition, but merely exploitation; that capitalism and the Empire are inseparable; that freedom for the enslaved millions and the retention of the British Empire are impossible; that the I.L.P. policy pursued by the Labour Government when in power, with reference to the colonies, was not a working-class policy, but was an imperialist policy; that the Lord Olivier document had for its main feature the emphasising of the fact that the policy of the Labour Government would in no way be a departure from that of Montagu, Olivier's predecessor."

This statement still stands. Its accuracy is a measure of the decline of the Communist Party when it pursues an Imperialist policy. Since the British Empire "is nothing more or less than a gigantic slave plantation," obviously the worker should not be asked to fight for it and there should be no talks of supporting a pact between that Empire and the Soviet Union, if the Soviet Union is supposed to represent working-class democracy. How can "a gigantic slave plantation" be a democracy?

Vol. 1. No. 5. OCTOBER, 1939. Price : TWOPENCE

THE WAR, Johnston and McGovern

On August 26, 1939, it was announced that Thomas Johnston, M.P., had been appointed Regional Commissioner for the Scottish Civil Defence Region. That is to say, he became head of the Civil Defence of Scotland. Such an appointment, notwithstanding Johnston's place in the Labour Government, could not but shock those who recalled his "War-Points" in Forward, during the Great War of 1914-18. Apparently, John McGovern, M.P., was affected this way. He engaged in what Johnston terms as "some rather malevolent comments."

Repudiating McGovern's suggestion that he is "a war profiteer, in fact," Johnston adds that anyone who knows him and McGovern will be able to assess McGovern's allegations at their proper value. A few years ago, Dollan wrote in similar terms in reply to McGovern. This is the custom. Whether deserved or not, one fact emerges. When McGovern broke with Anti-Parliamentarism some years ago and rejoined the I.L.P. and Labour Party, the disparagement was not so noticeable. As regards the war, whatever his faults, McGovern's present attitude is more consistent with his past and with the principles of Socialism, than is the attitude of either the Lord Provost of Glasgow or Regional Defence Commissioner for Scotland.

Johnston wants it to be known that his attitude is dictated by no desire for gain. That is the best that can be said for it and the fact should be related. Here is Johnston's own statement culled from Forward for September 23, 1939 :—

"(1) When I accepted the task of Regional Commissioner for Civil Defence (I accepted it with considerable reluctance) I expressly stipulated that I would not take a penny of the salary attachable to the post;

"(2) Although my financial relationship with my insurance employers are a matter solely between them and myself, I think I ought to say that I have always insisted upon returning to them any balance of my Parliamentary salary, after expenses were paid. I have not, therefore, in fact taken any Parliamentary salary; and

"(3) I have written no press or magazine articles since the war emergency began. I have not got the time. Perhaps I should add, articles for "Forward" are written without fee or reward."

Let us deal with the third point. Quite apart from the question of time, Johnston is wise not to write articles at the present juncture. He would have to deal with profiteering on all fours with that which he lampooned and attacked in Forward during the Great War. That would not be pleasing to his new-found friends. Would it, Thomas?

Writing in Forward for January 1, 1916, Thomas Johnston attacked the London Times for its sneers at the poor. Here are some extracts from Johnston's comment :—

"The ex-workhouse paupers, says the London 'Times,' are enjoying good times outside during the war, and they know 'that when the good time is over the old comforts of pauperism are awaiting them.'

"The fish-blood who wrote that wrote it at Christmas.

"The latest news from Conscriptionist circles is that Capital is not to be Conscripted. So far, Capital has suffered no casualties. It is fatter, more prosperous, and more thriving than ever."

After giving details of the shipping racketeering, Johnston proceeds :—

"Even the 'Morning Post' says that the Moneybags of the Stock Exchange have not exhibited much patriotism.

"There have been, says the 'New Age,' casualties among the lives lent to the State; there have been no casualties among the sums of money lent to the State: on the contrary, they are to be returned unimpaired after the war plus interest.

"Single lives that hang back from the National Register are to be compelled to come in.

"Investments in America that the British Government wants control of urgently — in order to prevent the depression of the exchange against us —are not to be compelled to register. Oh, dear, no! They are to be bribed in for two years at an interest of ½ per cent. above the present dividends.

"The shipowner who is caught for 50 per cent. taxation on his excess profits can afford to laugh if his profits are 200 per cent. He is still 100 per cent. on the right side. And he hasn't been caught —not by a mile. The London 'Times' (Dec. 27th) exposes a trick being practiced, whereby British vessels are being chartered, not sold, to subjects of neutral countries. The subjects of neutral countries, of course, escape the excess war profits tax, and the charter is carefully arranged at a figure that nominally only yields the owner 6 per cent. profit."

"This is still British patriotic ownership."

Johnston proceeded to quote from Tit-Bits an encouraging text for Christmas for "our soldiers and sailors" sent by the Rev. A. Henderson, D.D., T.D., Crieff, Hon. Chaplain to the Territorial Force in Scotland. The text was from Dan. xi., 32. "The people that do know their God shall be strong and DO EXPLOITS."

Dr. Henderson saw no blasphemy or obscenity in making God the father our author of carnage. Johnston commented :—

"High up among those specifically referred to in Dan., who do exploits (or, to be more explicit than the Scripture, exploitations), are 39 individuals who do a draw annually of £180,700.

"These individuals are Archbishops and Bishops, who organise and supervise the spiritual advisers of the people—said spiritual advisers laying special stress upon the Sermon on the Mount and such texts as 'Blessed be ye poor.'

"The Archbishop of Canterbury draws £15,000, and he of York draws £10,000. The Bishop of London draws £10,000, the Bishop of Durham £7000, the Bishop of Winchester, £6500; the Bishops of Bath and Wells, Oxford and Salisbury, £5000 each; the Bishop of Ely, £5500; other five draw £4500: still other fourteen have £4000 or over; three have £3500; four have £3000; one has £2500; two have £2000 each; and one has £1500. The wives and daughters of these worthies do not excite angry comment when they purchase furs or jewellery.

"Eighteen leading bankers have published a statement that the one thing needed now is money. Very well. With a heavy heart we hereby announce our willingness to agree to the Conscription of wealth."

Johnston does not write in this strain to-day. The profiteering carries on to-day as it has done in all previous wars, and Johnston remains inarticulate. The ex-editor of Forward is too busy to protest. He cannot even recall the words spoken in the House of Commons, on May 8, 1854, by W. E. Gladstone :—

"The practice obtaining in all former wars has been . . . no less distinguished for the opportunities it afforded to contractors than for the opportunities it afforded to heroes. It afforded to heroes an opportunity for ensuring an immortality of renown, and it afforded to contractors an opportunity for erecting colossal fortunes."

For his silence, and his dignity, the capitalist press praised him as it praised Ramsay

The actual discharge certificate is nearly double this size. The "caution" is printed in red ink. The discharge means that the editor was a conscientious objector, and that after 4 Court-martials, he received an absolute discharge as an evidence of his resistance. In later issues, the story of the editor's trials and Court-martials will be told.

MacDonald in 1924, and even more in 1929. Wrote Johnston in Forward, for February 2, 1924, when Beaverbrook and Rothermere praised MacDonald:—

> "Praise from such sources is disquieting, but need not be taken too seriously. We live in hope that the new Labour Government will so conduct itself as to earn the abuse and not the flattery of the enemies of the people."

Johnston's practical conclusion was wrong. Parliamentarians always decide wrongly in moments of crisis. Careerism is not adapted to face issues of import. Like Ramsay MacDonald, whose aim and purpose he misunderstood so thoroughly and so miserably, Thomas Johnston has gained the whole world of respectability and comfort and lost his own soul. That is, if a parliamentarian can have or retain a soul. Which we doubt. Johnston is respectable and established. He has arrived, because he has forsaken. He has condemned the working-class to debacle and collapse, his own reputation unto utter worthlessness. He has betrayed the workers who gave him a parliamentary career.

This fact is made clear by no less an authority than Lord Provost Dollan, writing as "Myner Collier," in the Labour Leader, for December 26, 1918. Surveying the election in Scotland, Dollan wrote:—

> "Scotland, at any rate, is now divided into two political camps—Labour versus the Capitalist Coalition. . . . The 51 Labour candidates in Scotland fought for Socialist principles at home as well as abroad. At all their meetings they put a People's Peace in the forefront, and opposed, in the frankest manner, the Jingo policy of their opponents. They concentrated attention on the 'Huns' at home, pointing out that the peoples in Central Europe would be able to deal with their own 'Huns' if we rendered our own powerless for harm. . . . Where Cabinet Ministers could not get a hearing for militarist views, Pacifists like Maxton and Regan could gain the sympathetic ear of approving audiences.
> "The election campaign has discredited militarism entirely, and proved beyond a doubt that the workers in Scotland want no more war and desire to live in peace with the world. This was demonstrated by the support given to the Conscientious Objectors who stood as candidates, and one of the fine experiences of the campaign was the spectacle of a former admirer of Sir Edward Carson extolling a 'Conchie' at a meeting in an Ayrshire town, which had not yielded an objector during the whole war.
> "The reaction against war has come amazingly fast in a country which boasts of a military victory. . . . The election proved that the humble folk are done with Militarism in every form. Those of them who have voted Labour have voted consciously for a Peace based on disarmament as the only safe guarantee for the protection of the world. . . . Thus the Labour voters in Scotland have voted for a Peace based on the abolition of armed force as the arbiter of dispute between nations. This involves the immediate suppression of Conscription in this country as a surety that we are really anxious for an enduring Peace. . . . The Labour Party may well be thankful to the I.L.P. for the heroic stand it has made, for, if that stand had not been taken during the war, there would not have been anything like 51 Labour candidates in Scotland. Without presuming too much, one might claim that the I.L.P., in saving the Labour Party from extinction, has also saved Europe from reaction."

The Lord Provost of Glasgow should recall these words to-day. The working-class of Scotland are opposed still to the criminal folly of war. It is an indictment of parliamentarism, of Labour organised careerism, and of the careerists themselves, that a vote given for the cause mentioned by Dollan in his Labour Leader article should lead, inevitably and automatically, to conscription and war, the writer of that article being foremost in his pleas for National Service. What satire of reality!

Johnston's official position has prevented him from attacking profiteering, although the truth is that profiteering is just as bad in 1939 as it was in 1914. The New Statesman published a list of articles that have increased in wholesale price owing to the war. These include: Hosiery 24 per cent., furniture 20 to 25 per cent., furnishing fabrics 20 per cent., cane chairs and baskets 15 per cent., cheap electric fires 35 per cent., rubber boots 15 per cent., handkerchiefs 18 per cent., carpets 60 per cent., paint 15 per cent.

These wholesale increases are added to by the retailer and the result is that we once more witness what has been termed the disgusting race between prices and wages. The tendency is for prices to rise and wages to decline, so that the standard of living of the common people becomes not merely lower but aggravated by the setting. The profiteering mentality is the same in all wars. Only to-day Thomas Johnston is applauded by these people, whereas, in 1914, the desire was to suppress his writing. This fact will explain Thomas Johnston's absence from the Keir Hardie unveiling at Old Cumnock. Lord Provost Dollan and Arthur Woodburn, Scottish Secretary of the Labour Party, now turned militarist, were conspicuous also by their absence. In pre-war times, they would have aspired to have been the big noises at such a gathering. Time will show that pro-war, recruiting and semi-recruiting attitude is a criminal folly. The 1939 war is even more futile and more absurd than its 1914 predecessor, which gave us the Versailles Treaty, and a heritage of further slaughter for the generation of those who died murdering each other in the great war debacle.

Lord Provost Dollan, Regional Commissioner Thomas Johnston, unelected emergency-appointed M.P.-to-be Arthur Woodburn and Arthur Greenwood, speaking for the Parliamentary Labour Party, declare that the 1939 war is a war to end Hitlerism! The 1914 war was a war to end Kaiserism! Viscount Castlerosse caps the folly, and actually expresses the feeling that inspires the common people responding to recruiting appeals, when he writes in the Sunday Express for September 17 last:—

> "I wonder what the Kaiser is thinking. Can it be that he realises that, whereas the war of 1914 put him off the throne, the war of 1939 may well put him back there again? Indeed a Hohenzollern is the obvious alternative to a Hitler."

If this should happen, perhaps the Dollans, the Johnstons, the Woodburns, and the Greenwoods will tell us for what the dead of 1914 to 1918 died?

It would be interesting to learn how Johnston reconciles his present official war-position with the terms and tone of the letter he sent to the secretary of the Dundee Trades Council, on February 9, 1928, commenting on the local dispute which led to the severance between the local Labour Party and the local branch of the I.L.P. He stated that as the local I.L.P. had definitely disaffiliated from the Trades and Labour Council he would not accept nomination at the hands of some other organisation affiliated to the local Trades and Labour Party, because, in so doing, he would appear to renounce the I.L.P. "of which I have been an active member since I was little more than a boy; to the service of which I have given the best years of my life, and to whose membership I owe so much."

Johnston proceeded to state that he did not intend to be nominated as candidate for the representation of Dundee at the following election.

This letter was published in Forward. Various statements were published in the capitalist press that he had been offered a seat in Glasgow. He denied these rumours as sheer invention and gave the impression that he was a man adopting a self-sacrificing stand of principle because of the I.L.P. tradition to which he adhered. It is none the less the fact that his loyalty did not prevent his return to parliament at the following election. It is equally certain that the promises he gave when returned for Dundee were never redeemed. That is another story. His pose of self-denial saved him from an accounting.

During the passage through the House of Commons of the Military Training Act, and, later, of the National Service Act, where the Labour members sacrificed every worker on the altar of jingoism, John McGovern made excellent speeches in opposition to conscription and war. Some of these contributions to anti-militarist propaganda have been popularised by the Forward and the New Leader. Others are buried for the time being in the unreadable columns of Hansard. It is not to these speeches that we wish to refer in this reply to Johnston, but to a more piquant incident.

Arthur Greenwood sympathises deeply with Thomas Johnston for being attacked and misrepresented by John McGovern, because the Member for Shettleston treated even Greenwood to a sample of his malevolence.

In the House of Commons, on Saturday, September 2, 1939, Arthur Greenwood, on behalf of the Labour Party, which also means the official Trade Union movement, supported war. There was no suggestion of socialism or class struggle in his speech. This fact is important to note because, however little the Labour Party may succeed in expressing the realities of the class struggle, Labour members of Parliament and the well-paid secretaries and organisers of the Trade Union movement owe their social status and their comfortable positions to the fact that they have, on occasion, made a pretence of expressing the conflict of economic interests that divide the rich and the poor. Greenwood's speech showed no realisation of the fact that in Britain and in France there are two different peoples existing, not the British and the French, but the rich and the poor. Beaconsfield, who was a Conservative, described the rich and the poor as two different nations. Perhaps Greenwood might have gleaned more Socialist understanding from the great Conservative leader than he seems to have obtained from his Labour Marxist text books. The chief sentence in Greenwood's speech was:—

> "If we march I hope we shall march in complete unity, and march with France."

When one considers how the government of France is organised and the fact that women who represent at least half of the population have no economic nor political rights in that boasted land of democracy, it is easy to realise that Greenwood spoke without the least regard to democracy. This fact did not prevent his speech being received with approval by the Tory press as well as by the Tory members of Parliament. The Sunday Mail described his pandering and time-serving mass of platitudes as "a moving speech," and proceeded to state that "he was given an ovation almost without parallel in recent years. Members of all parties cheered him and shouted 'Speak for England'."

Greenwood made this plea for unity with France, "when," says the Sunday Mail, "there was a dramatic intervention by Mr. John McGovern." The Mail continues:—

> "Turning round and facing the crowded Socialist benches, Mr. McGovern shouted: 'You people don't intend to march, not a damn one of you.' "

The press praises Greenwood for remaining cool and implies that McGovern displayed bad taste. There are Labour careerists who distinctly complain that this intervention was in the worst possible taste. Perhaps it was. But if McGovern continues to show bad taste of this type for the duration of the war he will have rendered some service for the working class struggle, notwithstanding his parliamentarism.

We do not doubt the bad taste of this intervention. We do rejoice in its absolute truth and its prophetic vision. McGovern spoke in the House of Commons on September 2. Thirteen days later the war-mongering Labour Party, Trade Union Congress, more than half-capitalist owned Daily Herald published the following enlightening paragraph:—

> "The T.U.C. General Council is asking that the schedule (of reserved occupations) should be amended to reduce the age (of Trade Union officials) from 30 to 25 and also that the definition of 'Trade Union official' should be extended to cover executive, administrative, supervisory and organisational grades."

Here we have an official confession that John McGovern was right. At the outset of the last war the Czar made a patriotic declaration that Russia would fight to its last Moujik. He never intended it to fight to its last Czar. Now the Trade Union and Labour leaders are prepared to sacrifice the British working class to the last worker, to the last Trade Unionist, to the last rank-and-file member of the Labour Party. They have no intention that the Labour M.P. or Trade Union organiser shall earn the Victoria Cross or even a Distinguished Conduct Medal. They are satisfied to remain in safety at home, to legislate away the liberties of the people, and, at the end of the war, to retire from public life with titles, honours and pensions.

BEFORE THE TRIBUNAL

Section 12 of the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939, suspended the operation of the Military Training Act 1939, until the end of the present emergency. Which clause suggests that conscription will survive the war even though the greater part of the population does not. This means that the decisions of the Military Training Tribunals are as important as will be those of the tribunals to be set up under the National Service Act. No apology is needed for reviewing the decisions of these tribunals.

The first Tribunal under the Militia Act was that held at Birmingham, on Thursday, July 27, 1939. The next were the Cardiff and Bristol Tribunals. Cardiff was held on Wednesday and Thursday, August 9 and 10. Bristol lasted three days and concluded on August 11. The Inverness Tribunal was held on August 31. The last was held at Edinburgh and terminated abruptly on September 7, because the Training Act had been superseded by the National Service Act.

Birmingham, Inverness and Edinburgh Tribunals treated objectors civilly and courteously, but not fairly. These Tribunals ignored entirely the fact that the real conscientious objector is an absolutist and that part of his objection to conscription is to the denial, which conscription involves. He objects to war without hesitation and without apology. He objects to combatant duty because that means direct participation in murder. He objects to being registered in the Military Training Register, because that means not merely being registered for murder but being asked to take part in the destruction of life without knowing the why and the wherefore and without having any voice in the decision as to the necessity or otherwise of such action. As his attitude proceeds from conscience and is without apology, he objects to industrial conscription also. He denies that the individual is the slave, subject, or creature of the State. This claim to the right to liberty is an essential part of the anti-war or anti-militarist cause. The Acts imposing conscription rule that where a conscientious objector is genuine in his absolutism, and where his objection goes to the root of war and conscription themselves, he is entitled to total exemption. In such a case, the Statute directs "that he shall, without condition, be finally registered in the register of conscientious objectors."

The three Tribunals mentioned made no effort to understand the Act or apply it correctly. They never attempted to discharge their chief function, namely, to discover the nature of the individual objection. Their one concern was to find out if the applicant was performing work of national importance instead of deciding first if his claim entitled him to be registered conditionally or unconditionally as a C.O. The question of the applicant's occupation only arises if the decision is conditional. In this event, if the applicant's work is work of national importance, then he becomes conditionally exempt from the six months' training prescribed by the Act. The business of a Tribunal is twofold:

(1) It must make a finding in fact, as to the nature, extent, honesty of the objection.

(2) It must make a judicial order, without discretion or bias, appropriate to its finding in fact.

The Tribunal may make an error in its conclusion in fact, but it has no right to make an error in its legal finding, based on its conclusion in fact. A person is entitled to claim absolute exemption. If conditional exemption does not meet his claim, and the honesty of his claim is sustained he must be granted absolute exemption. If his claim is not honest it should be rejected, not compromised. A very simple truth, not understood by the lawyer-chairman and the learned and "socialist" members of the Birmingham Tribunals. The great idea of this Tribunal was that all persons not engaged in work of national importance must be sent into "concentration camps" for training—i.e., for a kind of prison-like industrial conscription.

I.—THE BIRMINGHAM CASES.

The Birmingham Tribunal was composed of the chairman, a very respected and able lawyer and jurist, by repute, Judge Longson, County Court Judge for Derby; A. H. Gibberd, a Trade Union secretary, who claimed to speak with technical knowledge on work of National Importance; Councillor E. Purser, ex-alleged Socialist Mayor of Nottingham, a Labour Party representative who questioned the C.Os. more adversely than any other member of the Tribunal; Professor J. G. Smith, Vice-Principal of Birmingham University, who questioned rarely; and Mr. J. T. Lee, former Town Clerk of Derby, who showed no desire to question at all. This Tribunal dealt with 460 objectors.

The first case to be heard was that of William Ernest Lewis, a Christadelphian, living at Watford Road Hall Green, Birmingham. He declared that military service was not compatible with the teaching of Christ. He was placed on the register of C.Os., on condition that he remained on the work that he was doing—the manufacture of street lamps. A similar decision was given in the case of William Ebetts Judd, of Barrow's Lane, Yardley, an employee of Birmingham Gas Department, who objected on "ethical and Christian grounds." It is obvious that conditional exemption ought not to have been given in these cases. Both applicants were entitled to absolute exemption.

The conduct of this Tribunal in the case of another objector, named Shears, was even worse. Shears stated most emphatically that he was not prepared to undergo training for work of national importance. His appeal was never considered, and he was sentenced—that is what it means—to a training camp, which was precisely what he was objecting to, and for which he was seeking exemption. If the claim of Shears was not considered genuine he should have been placed right away on the Military Register. He stated that he had no intention of accepting this decision of the Tribunal. Which means that he would reach the army by two steps instead of one and have to make his stand for conscience under military orders just the same. When Shears objected to the decision, the chairman said, quite wrongly and quite illegally, that his objection was no concern of the Tribunal. Shears' objection ought to have been the Tribunal's chief concern if the chairman and his colleagues had intended to administer the Act.

The Birmingham Tribunal knew that it could grant absolute exemption. It exercised this power at the first day's hearing by granting one total exemption. In considering this case let us note that in four other cases, because the applicants refused to take part in any war work they were ordered to go to Ministry of Labour training camps. Two other applicants were persuaded to join the R.A.M.C. Five other objectors were put on the register of conscientious objectors because they were engaged in armament work and agreed to stay at their jobs. This is not conscience but industrial conscription imposed and accepted under fear of military conscription.

The one objector to be granted total exemption by this Tribunal was Norman Wart, 20 years old, of Elindale Crescent, North Field, Birmingham. He was led before the Tribunal by his father, a brisk, hollow-backed soldier. When the chairman began to read the applicant's statement the father stated that he had written it. Thereupon the chairman stated it was unnecessary to read any more. The part read by the chairman was as follows:—

> "I am the only son of a disabled ex-service man. I was born after his discharge from the Army, and my condition is due to his injuries. I have suffered hell for a lifetime. I am an innocent victim of the Great War. . . ."

At this stage the father said that he was deaf somewhat and that his son practically altogether deaf. Mr. Wart rapped loudly on the desk to draw his son's attention. He took him by the shoulder and held him over the desk to hear the judge. The Tribunal deliberated. Suddenly Mr. Wart drew three medals from his pocket and banged them on the table. The chairman looked up and said:—"The Tribunal's decision is that Mr. Wart shall be registered as a conscientious objector unconditionally." Neither father nor son heard the decision. The judge signalled to a member of the public to tell them. The father then stood up, smartly clicked his heels to attention, marched out of the room, leading his son, without saying a word.

What a record! One Unconditional Exemption for conscience, because the applicant was stone deaf! What a Tribunal!

II.—THE BRISTOL TRIBUNAL.

The South-Western Tribunal met in the Senate Room of the University, in Bristol. The chairman was Judge Wethered, of Bristol County Court; other members were Dr. Cyril Bailey, Mr. A. L. Hobhouse, Mr. C. P. Brown, and Alderman F. Sheppard. The area covered by this Tribunal was Gloucestershire, Somerset, Devon, Cornwall, Wiltshire, Dorset, Hampshire, and Oxford. Eighty-six applications were dealt with. Unconditional exemption was given in 26 cases. Eleven applicants were sent to the Non-Combatant Corps.

The chairman revealed the fact that the latter would be given training in:—

(a) Foot drill, without arms;
(b) Physical training;
(c) Passive air defence;
(d) Anti-gas;
(e) Decontamination of rearward areas;

irrespective of the Corps to which they are posted.

At the Birmingham and Cardiff Tribunals this fact was suppressed, but it was stated at Cardiff that conscientious objectors posted to the Non-Combatant Labour Corps would be required to perform, in addition to normal administrative duties, special labour duties such as:—

(a) Construction of recreation grounds;
(b) Improvement of camping sites;
(c) Drainage of training areas;
(d) Agricultural work, i.e., the growing of crops for consumption by the troops;
(e) Filling-in of trenches.

One of the persons placed on the conscientious objectors' registers unconditionally at Bristol was Harold Oliver Phillipson, a Gloucestershire market gardener. Judge Wethered described his statement as most interesting.

Phillipson handed in a long written statement, in which he stated that he had been attracted by Oriental philosophy, based on the teachings of Buddha, for the last four years, though he had never lived in the East.

Phillipson objected to military service on religious, ethical and political grounds. He quoted Buddha's words, which were uttered 500 years before the time of Christ:—

> "He who wishes to attain to the joy of living in harmony with the universe shall deceive no one, entertain no hatred for anybody, and no wish to injure through anger.
> "He shall have measureless love for all creatures, even as a mother has for her only child—whom she protects with her own life.
> "Up above, below and around him he shall extend his love, which is without bounds and obstacles, and which is free from all cruelty and antagonism. While standing, sitting, walking, lying down, till he falls asleep, he shall keep his mind active in the exercise of universal goodwill."

Phillipson refused to undertake civil work in forestry because he would be doing something he was ordered to do by the State.

III.—THE CARDIFF TRIBUNAL.

The South Wales Tribunal met in Cardiff City Hall. The chairman was Judge Frank Davies of West Wales County Court; other members included Oliver Harris, Welsh Miners' Secretary. Twenty-five applications were dealt with. In only one case was complete exemption granted. Applicants were asked to take the oath before stating their case.

With the one exception, in which the applicant stated his case very firmly and very fearlessly, this Tribunal objected to all claims for absolute exemption. During the first day's hearing, it pressed objectors to join one of the four non-combatant corps. On the second day it urged them to join labour camps under civilian control. The chairman made one extraordinary statement. Frederick Price objected to doing any service in the labour corps because he had a conscientious objection to accepting any orders of the government in war time. "But you can't have a conscientious objection to work of this sort!" retorted the incredulous chairman.

Robert B. Cox, railway worker, Crumlin, stated that he was unwilling to nurse back to health a soldier, who would be returned to hell, in order that he might send ten more men to hell. He was granted total exemption. Obviously his attitude convinced even the Cardiff Tribunal.

Reginald H. Dart a 20-year-old Cardiff bricklayer, who adopted exactly as sound an attitude as Cox but was more defiant in his behaviour, was accused of impertinence, and ordered to be enrolled on the Military Register.

"I object to military training and also to going on the land for forestry work," said Dart. "Any timber I help to produce might be used to make huts for the Militia."

When asked by the Tribunal to give a further explanation of his objection, Dart said, "You brought me here. You ought to know."

Mr. Harris, "If an enemy came across here, would you defend yourself and family?"

Dart—"I have no enemies."

Mr. Harris—"Your attitude does not indicate that spirit. You are a law unto yourself."

Dart—"Yes, I am."

"You must not cross-examine us," complained the Chairman at one stage.

"But you are cross-examining me," replied Dart.

"We must enquire into the objections made by young men and we are entitled to ask why you are an objector," said the chairman. "We are doing a very unpleasant and difficult job."

"That is just a matter of you using your tongue and me not," replied the applicant.

"That is impudence of the worst description," was the chairman's comment.

Dart may have wanted courtesy and tact. Did it follow his attitude was just impudence? Might it not have been nervous unfamiliarity with the proceedings? Was there not some truth in his crude complaint that Tribunal required subservience from him? Ought not the Miners' Secretary to have helped him instead of putting pro-war, pro-capitalist questions? Did "impudence" justify the conclusion that he had no conscientious objection?

Dart was told he could appeal.

THE SONG OF THE GUNS.

I sing the song of the great clean guns
That belch forth death at will!
Ah, but the wailing mothers,
The lifeless forms and still!

I sing the song of the billowing flags,
The bugles that cry before!
Ah, but the skeleton's flapping rags,
The lips that speak no more!

I sing the clash of the bayonets and
Sabres that flash and cleave!
And wilt thou sing the maimed ones, too
That go with pinned-up sleeve?

I sing acclaimed generals that
Bring the victory home!
Ah, but the broken bodies
That drip like honeycomb!

I sing of hearts triumphant,
Long ranks of marching men!
And wilt thou sing the shadowy hosts
That never march again?

HARRY KEMP.

WHEN THE BOYS RETURN.

The Bishop tells us: "When the boys come back
They will not be the same; for they have fought
In a just cause; they led the last attack
On anti-Christ, their comrades' blood has bought
New right to breed an honoured race,
They challenged Death, and dared him face to face."

"We're none of us the same!" the boys reply.
"For George lost both his legs; and Bill's stone blind;
Poor Jim's shot through the lungs and like to die;
And Bert's gone syphilitic; you'll not find
A chap who's served that hasn't found some change."
And the Bishop said: "The ways of God are strange."

GREAT WAR C.O.'s MUST NOT FORGET

WHEN A. CREECH JONES, M.P., WAS COURT-MARTIALLED.

A. Creech Jones, M.P., has made an excellent stand in Parliament against militarism, war and emergency powers, although there are some occasions when he seems to have missed the opportunity of making his anti-war stand clear. Perhaps when we consult Hansard fully these failures will be explained.

In 1916, A. Creech Jones was Secretary, Camberwell Trades and Labour Council; Secretary, Dulwich I.L.P.; Member National Union of Clerks, and Member of the splendid Dulwich branch of the No-Conscription Fellowship.

Turned down by Tribunals, handed over by the Magistrate, Creech Jones duly faced District Court-Martial. Here is his statement made before a District Court-Martial August 31, 1916:—

"I plead 'Not Guilty' to wilful disobedience. I cannot obey any military order because I cannot recognise the authority of the military. I may be 'deemed to have enlisted' by Act of Parliament, but I do not consider myself a member of any military organisation. I have taken no oath, have refused to sign papers and have obeyed no military orders, and my refusal stated in the charge is but a continuation of the position the Camberwell Tribunal placed me in by failing to administer the Military Service Act and by refusing to grant that form of exemption provided in the Act for persons holding devotedly the views I hold.

"The Tribunals have admitted I am a genuine Conscientious Objector, and even refused to hear testimonials and evidence, on the grounds of their complete satisfaction with my sincerity and long consistency.

"I cannot obey military orders, on religious and moral grounds; I believe in human brotherhood and in the 'common humanity' and common interests of the peoples of all nations. I believe in the co-operation, and not competition to the death, between individuals and nations. I view war as merely a test of might, resulting from dynastic ambitions, commercial rivalries, financial intrigues, and imperialistic jealousies. It is a stupid, costly and obsolete method of attempting to settle the differences of diplomatists, in which the common people always pay with their blood, vitality and wealth. I believe there is a different and better way.

"For many years I have given the whole of my leisure in earnest work to uplift my fellows: to change the social system so that life may be made a more splendid and noble thing. I cannot, therefore, on moral grounds, form any part of any military organisation.

"Besides, these considerations are very deep religious objections. I believe God lives Himself through the whole human race. I believe in the inherent worth and sanctity of human personality, and that humanity is bound together in spiritual unity. I cannot, therefore, participate in any military organisation, every part of which is designed to make the machine of militarism efficient, and the method of which is the destruction of human life.

"Hate is engendered by the use of force. Love and goodwill alone will conquer the hearts of mankind. Humanity is my first allegiance. I claim liberty of conscience, and therefore cannot obey military orders. If humanity is to be delivered from the horrors and ghastliness of war, man must remain true to the ideal of fraternity and love and peace.

"I am before you because I remain faithful to my religious and moral convictions. If you deliver judgment against me, I claim to be dealt with by the civil authorities. I could do no more than I have done—to have obeyed, would be against the highest spiritual and moral welfare of this nation."

HOSEA BIGLOW, "CONCHIE"

Es fer war, I call it murder—
There you hev it plain and flat;
I don't want to go no furder
Than my Testyment fer that;
God hes said so plump and fairly—
It's es long es it is broad—
An' you've gut to git up airly
Ef you want to take in God.

'Taint your eppyletts an' feathers
Make the thing a grain more right;
'Taint afollerin' your bell-wethers
Will excuse you in His sight.
Ef you take a sword an' dror it,
An' go stick a feller thru
Guv'ment aint to answer for it,
God'll send the bill to you.

Wut's the use o' meetin'-going
Every Sabbath, wet or dry,
Ef it's right to go a-mowin'
Feller-men—like oats and rye?
I dunno, but wut it's pooty
Trainin' round in bobtail coats,
But it's curus Christian duty
This 'ere cuttin' folks's throats.

I'll return ye good for evil
Much es we frail mortils can;
But I wun't go help the Devil
Makin' man the cus o' man,
Call me coward, call me traitor,
Jest es suits your mean idees,
Here I stand a tyrant hater
An' the friend o' God an' Peace.

WAR TIME PATRIOTISM

Feed the Enemy and Suppress Free Speech

I.—FEEDING THE ENEMY.

Events of the Great War of 1914-1918, defined the reactions of the patriots in war-time. Speaking in the House of Commons, on February 11, 1915, Mr. Denniss, M.P., denounced the entire indifference of shipowners to the "general public welfare" and quoted the case of certain shipowners who had written, threatening that, if the Government dared to interfere with ships:—

"They have been able to collar the railways, but they shan't collar our ships. We will boycott the United Kingdom and will carry goods for foreigners."

Mr. Denniss quoted from an American newspaper to show why the British shipowner wanted to carry for foreigners:—

"It is pointed out that freights from America to Europe have gone up 900 per cent. . . . No wonder the British shipowner is anxious to carry goods at such a price. They have only gone up 650 per cent. from the Argentine to England, so he prefers to carry at 900 per cent. increase for a foreigner to carrying at 650 per cent. increase for Great Britain. From New York to Liverpool the increase is 500 per cent.; from New York to Rotterdam the increase is 900 per cent.; and cotton from New York to Bremen, 1,100 per cent."

Patriotism and 650 per cent. increase were not good enough for the shipowners. But the sorrow and agony of sacrifice in the great desolation were good enough for the common people.

Mr. Denniss proceeded to quote from the Morning Post and Shipping Gazette the following declaration of the shipowners:—

"Why should we not take advantage of our present opportunities to make as much money as we can? War is but a temporary incident in the life of a nation."

The British, Foreign, and Colonial Corporation, Ltd., Investment Bankers, 57 Bishopsgate, London, E.C., issued a pamphlet eulogising the war in these very clear terms: "The British shipowner is one of the few fortunate individuals to whom the war has proved an unmixed blessing."

In another callous announcement, this firm explained this statement and showed how terribly true was its claim:—

"Reference must also be made to the depletion of the merchant service by the depradations of submarines. These losses are, of course, covered by the insurance; and while the owner is recouped for the loss of steamer, these are not at present being made good by the launching of new tonnage, OWING TO THE FACT THAT THE SHIPBUILDING YARDS ARE PRACTICALLY ALL MONOPOLISED BY THE ADMIRALTY FOR SPECIAL WORK. THUS, AS TIME GOES ON, STEAMERS WILL BE SCARCER, AND THE DEMAND FOR THEIR USE WILL CAUSE FREIGHTS TO GO CORRESPONDINGLY HIGHER."

Note "the depletion of the merchant service," which meant death and sorrow.

The terrible struggle in the Dardanelles closed the Black Sea Market. In April, 1915, the same British, Foreign, and Colonial Corporation commented upon the possible success of British Arms and the re-opening of the market:—

"If freights have reached their present high level in spite of the fact that the Black Sea markets have been closed, it would seem that the opening of this fresh outlet for the shipowners' energies must result in an all-round accession to rates of freight throughout the world."

On May 6, 1915, this British, Foreign and Colonial Corporation issued another circular to its clients, stating: The longer the war lasts, the longer is the present state of affairs in the shipping world likely to continue."

For profits, the shipowners, who demanded the conscription of human beings to feed the guns, were prepared to boycott the United Kingdom, and to carry goods for foreigners; they welcomed the war as "an unmixed blessing"; and rejoiced in submarine warfare, with its toll of death.

Mr. Houston, M.P., in the House of Commons, on February 11, 1915, discussed the case of the "tramp" owners. He said:—

"I know one who fixed four of his steamers from the Argentine on open charter at 16s. per ton; the charterer of one of these boats has re-let that boat at 65s., and made £14,000 profit."

Some months later, on December 23, 1915, Mr. Goldstone, M.P., told the same House:—

"I want to quote one instance, given upon excellent authority, that one ship sailing from San Francisco was chartered for £80,000."

Here are some more quotations showing the reaction of the patriotic ship-owning fraternity to the war:—

"The opportunities now open to British shipping are obvious. There are no more cut rates by subsidised German vessels. German ships being swept off the sea, we have now no serious competitors in carrying trade of the world"—'Journal of Commerce' (Nov. 27, 1914).

"The net earnings in the (shipping) trade are estimated to have risen from 20 millions in 1913 to 250 millions in 1916. The profits are so great that a steamer is reported to pay for her entire cost in two voyages." — "Daily Mail," London (Feb. 5, 1916).

"The report of the White Star Line shows that the profit for last year, after providing a very large sum for excess profit tax and other contingencies, amounted to the enormous figure of £1,968,285. Dividends amounting to 65 per cent. have already been paid."—"Daily Chronicle," London (May 17, 1916).

"The Dulcia Steam Shipping Company, in a period of about ten-and-a-half months, made a profit of £50,449 on an issued capital of £50,000; and indications point to at least that rate of profit being fully maintained on the paid-up capital during the next financial year." — Statement issued by the Dulcia Shipping Co., Ltd. (May 26, 1916).

In the Yorkshire Factory Times for May 11, 1916, Mr. Myers pointed out that the Tempus Shipping Co., Cardiff, with only five boats, made £100,000 profits on their previous year's working, after setting aside £80,000 to meet excess profit tax, and placing £30,000 to reserve. The total profits for the previous year were only £15,488. To this firm, the war was a matter for rejoicing.

Mr. Myers, showed that, for the first three months in 1915, eight shipping companies made in profits, £1,201,795. In the first three months of 1916, the same eight concerns made a profit of £2,140,598—an increase of 77 per cent. on their previous year's tremendous trading.

Closely connected with the shipping industry are the coal, iron, and engineering industries. Everyone who has considered the treatment meted out to the miner since the war will appreciate the extent of the coal-owners' love of country and regard for the well-being of his fellow-citizens. The Board of Trade inquired into the increase of the cost of production at the mine, and concluded that, on a high estimate, it had not risen more than one shilling per ton. It declared that the rise in price "is considerably above the increase in cost of production and distribution which can reasonably be put down to the war."

The Gas and Electricity Departments of the Birmingham Corporation were paying, in 1916, at least £200,000 more per year for coal than they paid before the outbreak of the war. The same was true of every municipality in the kingdom. The navy was treated in the same way. Speaking in the House of Commons, on July 27, 1915, Sir Arthur Markham, M.P., said:—

"At a certain period this year, the Admiralty were paying for coal for Admiralty purposes from 10s. to 12s. a ton above prices prevailing in 1913-14."

And the Board of Trade knew that the cost of production at the mine had risen less than 1*s.* 0*d. per ton*!

We do not wish to distress the reader with lists of figures showing the shipping, coal, iron, and engineering profits of the opening years of the Great War. It is necessary, however, to take a glance at the profits of the tea concerns. The following eight comapnies nearly doubled their profits on the year:—

Company	Profits 1914	1915
Ceylon Proprietary Tea Co.	£12,720	£25,721
Imperial Ceylon Tea Co.	5,207	17,995
Standard Tea Co. of Ceylon	16,141	28,811
Scottish Ceylon Tea Co.	7,366	13,486
Dimbula Valley Ceylon Tea Co.	33,472	54,191
E. India Tea & Produce Co.	2,092	17,354
Eastern Produce & Estate Co.	71,724	122,760
Ceylon Tea Plantation	108,300	163,899
Total Profits	£256,022	£474,217

Naturally the profits soared higher in 1916.

In his book, The Triumph of Nationalisation, Sir Leo Chiozza Money explained these huge profits on tea, without specifically referring to them. He mentions the enormous exports of tea from the United Kingdom during 1914-16 to European countries, and adds:—

"This increase was due to the fact that Germany, being cut off from coffee, very naturally bought all the tea she could get from her neutral neighbours. Members of the British tea trade carried on a business with European neutrals which they knew to be abnormal. The trade knew well the populations of the little countries to whom it was sending the tea and how little those countries normally consumed. At last the traffic was stopped owing to the energetic action taken by the present writer. Hence the very different figures of 1917. Thus also it was with tobacco and other articles."

To this statement, Sir Leo appended the following footnote:—

"It was not until the latter part of 1916 that I carried my proposal to prevent the re-export of tea, tobacco, etc., from the United Kingdom."

On April 4, 1916, Sir Leo presented a memorandum to the War Trade Committee, entitled "Tobacco and the Enemy." This document opened with the following words:—

"I once more urge very strongly that it is of great importance to use every possible effort to restrict the enemy's supplies of tobacco. Several months have elapsed since I brought the matter seriously before the Committee, but nothing has been done, and in the interim an enormous further amount has gone to Germany and to Austria. Largely through the aid of our own commercial men and our own shipping, and under the protection of the British Navy, German soldiers in the field are being comforted by supplies of a commodity of peculiar value to the soldiers."

Two days later, Sir Leo presented another memorandum on "Tea, Coffee, and Tobacco," because the Government was not alive to the situation, after seventeen months of war. We quote:—

"As to tea, what was perfectly obvious is at last admitted — after two more weeks of war, costing millions a day. Tea is being supplied to the enemy for his military purposes by our tea merchants, and the trade is, in my opinion, deplorable in the circumstances."

In the end Sir Leo Chiozza Money's view was accepted. With what real reluctance the sequel proves.

Thomas Johnston, M.P., mentioned Sir Leo Money's charges in the House of Commons on February 12, 1925, when he questioned the Rt. Hon. Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister, K.B.E., M.P., then President of the Board of Trade, about the conduct of certain British Capitalists during the war, in attempting to sell to countries adjacent to Germany, British reserve stocks of Food Stuffs.

The President of the Board of Trade in the Tory Government took the extraordinary view that Sir Leo Money had described "the trade as callous, wicked, and abnormal," but had stated nowhere that it "was illegal."

Correspondence occurred between him and Sir Leo Money

Writing from the Board of Trade, under date February 19, 1925, Sir Philip Cunliffe Lister defended this traffic with the enemy in the following terms:—

"The essential point is that traders were carrying on in the years 1914-16 a trade which was, for the most part at any rate, not contrary to the law and which was ended, not by prosecution, but by the imposition of a prohibition of export of the commodities concerned except under licence."

Sir Leo Money replied on February 28, 1925, very much to the point, as follows:—

"As I interpret your answers, you seem to make excuse for the merchants on the ground that their action in exporting to neutrals adjoining Germany was not strictly illegal in many cases, but merely amounted to driving a coach-and-four through inefficient war regulations."

In other words, even in 1925, a Tory and patriotic Cabinet minister, defended British merchants, using British ships, British ports, and the British navy, to make a profit legally — and an excessive profit — while feeding the enemy, and from feeding the enemy. At the same time, poor shell-shocked youths, who had been through mire and murder, were executed for desertion in face of the enemy by their own comrades, because their nerves had given out. Those who escaped this fate were returned to "Blighty" and starvation.

II.—STARVING THE HERO AND HIS FAMILY.

The starvation and neglect did not wait until the end of the war. In some cases it commenced at once, whilst the war was half-way through its course.

The "Herald"—then endeavouring to be some kind of a general Labour paper—in its issue for June 10, 1916, gave some typical examples of the treatment meted out to working-class "heroes" in war-time:—

"Here is the case of a sailor who was on active service during 1915-16. He was invalided to a naval hospital owing to a nervous breakdown, discharged on May 11, but as he was so ill he could not be sent home. Pay to his wife was, however, stopped from that day. Subsequently the woman was informed that her allowance could only now be 10s. a week on which to keep herself and her child. . . .

"A shoeing smith, who for many years was a foreman, and if now in health could easily earn £4 a week, was wounded in 1915, kept until 1916 teaching boys, then he was discharged. He had one leg shorter than the other, is still under the doctor; some days cannot work at all. He has been granted a pension of 10s. 9d. a week. He has a wife and seven children, the eldest of whom is 14 and the youngest three weeks' old. . . .

"A private in the A.S.C. has a wife and four children dependent, eldest 14, youngest 11 months; discharged as medically unfit in February of this year. Suffers from general debility following from concussion of the brain and a strained back caused from an accident in France, where he served for over nine months. He left the Army with a gratuity of £2 and 17s. 7d. to buy civilian clothes. He made repeated applications for a further grant, and on April 27 received a letter from Chelsea Hospital saying he had been granted a pension of 4s. 8d. a week for six months. The doctor says if he is ever to recover he must have special nourishment and constant care. Does anyone imagine that on 4s. 8d. a week this is possible? . . .

"In another case a man was discharged in August, 1915, with his left arm shot through, shattering the muscle. He was granted a pension of 5s. 3d. a week for six months, from February, 1916. He has a wife and four children dependent on him. He tries to get work, but is unable to do so because he cannot lift. The family is in a very pitiable state. . . .

"Another man served twelve years in the Army, five of which he spent in India. He has an exemplary character and the Indian medal; went through the South African War, got the South African Medal, 1889-90; had malarial fever when he served in India, and re-enlisted in Reserves in November, 1914. He was discharged in 1916, applied to Chelsea Hospital, and has received a pension of 4s. 8d. a week. He is now in the London Hospital very ill indeed, and has a wife and five children, the eldest of whom is 15 and the youngest five months. They are being supported by the Board of Guardians. On May 8 this man received a letter to say the pension would be increased to 7s. . . .

"A man in the Royal Marines joined in 1915; served in Gallipoli and Egypt; was invalided out in 1916 after suffering enteric fever; has a wife and five children (all under 14). He is just a nervous wreck. He has been granted a pension of 11s. 3d."

Trading with the enemy was good for the tea companies, the tobacco companies, the shipping companies, and, of course, the allied heavy industries. Since it prolonged the struggle, it was not so good for the men who risked their lives in the struggle; and whose agony, and the agony of whose families, required that the struggle end. The profiteers were prepared to prolong the struggle, whilst mouthing patriotic slogans, by enemy trading, and mercilessly exploiting the people at home. In 1916, 2½d. of the price of the 4-lb. loaf was represented in freightage.

The minutes of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee, June 3, 1915, included a report on the difficulties experienced by various Town Councils in renewing municipal coal contracts:—

"The various Committees of the Glasgow Corporation are buying for immediate needs only, as if they were to place their contracts for a year at present prices it would mean an increased charge of £400,000 as compared with last year's prices for the same quantity and qualities of coal.

"The gas department is now in the market for 750,000 tons, and if compelled to pay present prices the extra charge on this lot alone, according to the manager, would be £300,000. Because of the high prices of coal the cost of household gas is to be raised from 1s. 11d. to 2s. 6d. per 1,000 cubic feet.

"Last year the tram department bought 50,000 tons of coal at an average cost of 10s. 8¾d. per ton. Offers were recently invited for a six months' supply, and the quotations recommended for acceptance averaged 17s. 10½d. per ton, an increase of 67 per cent. compared with last year."

III.—SUPPRESSING COMMENT.

Desire to save the face of this profiteering under cover of patriotism led to the suppression of Free Speech in Glasgow Town Council. "Forward" told the story in its issue for January 1, 1916, in an interesting report of the proceedings of the Town Council, at its last meeting in December, 1915. Our contemporary's headings were:—

FREE SPEECH.

No Prussianism Here.

STIRRING PROTEST AT GLASGOW TOWN COUNCIL.

Eleven Labour Members Suspended.

The letterpress recalled that the sub-committee of the Town Council, that dealt with the letting of public halls, refused, by six votes to five, the use of St. Andrew's Hall for an Anti-Conscription meeting to be addressd, it was expected, by Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., and John Dillon, M.P.,

The report next reproduced the minutes of the Glasgow Finance Committee for November 30, 1915.

These minutes came before the Council and led to the suspension of 11 members. Councillor Taylor was denounced by the chairman for defying the authority of the House, because he insisted on protesting against the meeting being banned. The "Forward" report continues:—

"Bailie Maclure, seconded by Bailie Morton, proposed the suspension of Mr. Taylor.

"Mr. Dollan moved non-suspension, and this was seconded.

"The result of the vote was 54 for suspend and 24 for not suspend. Mr. Taylor left the meeting without comment. . . .

"The suspension of Bailie James Stewart was then moved and agreed to by 55 votes to 15.

"Councillor Dollan rose to protest, and on the Chairman asking him sharply if he was going to sit down, pretended to be deaf. So he, too, was voted outside."

Councillor Izett, who subsequently became a Moderate and was attacked bitterly by the Labour men, next rose to protest. The Town Clerk complained: "Oh, I say, this is getting stale." Which proved the elegance and diction of the Town Clerk. A Moderate shouted: "He wants to be suspended." Bailie Maclure moved suspension. Councillor Izett declared that this was not the way to carry on the business of the city. The suspension was carried despite this protest, and Izett refused to leave the chamber, when asked by the chairman, and when approached by two Council officers. Whilst Izett was protesting, Bailie Roderick Scott, who sat next to him, kept up a loud moaning noise. Izett thereupon slapped his face and the moaning stopped.

This scene took place, and commanded big reports in the local press, because the authorities wanted conscription forced upon the people without protest. The war-profiteers did not want discussed the treatment meted out to Private Tommy Atkins, and they did not want discussed their profits.

"THE CONQUEST OF VIOLENCE"

This book, although worthy of study at any time, should be read during this present war period by every sincere opponent of war and militarism. The young man of to-day, faced for the first time with a crisis that affects him primarily as an individual, and who has decided that he and the war machine have nothing in common, will find in this work by Bart de Ligt, not only encouragement and inspiration, but also the basis for the struggle in which he is about to be engaged through passive resistance.

Passive resistance has, too long, been regarded as a mere matter of "turning the other cheek." Now it must be recognised that passive resistance has two wings: the first, passive passive resistance; the second, active passive resistance. The battle against war requires understanding and active passive resistance. "The Conquest of Violence" not only supplies the understanding but also informs one how to employ effective resistance.

De Ligt traces the theory of violence from ancient to modern times and proves that the the result of war has been always to lower the economic and cultural level of the people. Particularly during the period of capitalism is the futility and wantonness of war exposed. With the scientific methods of murder, millions of people are maimed and killed all for the sake of adding a few more profits to the already over-flowing coffers of those who have.

The world to-day accepts the necessity of violence. The minority, as well as regarding it as entirely unnecessary, see in it the path by which civilisation is to be destroyed.

De Ligt does not propose to sigh about the horrors of war and then sit back and let militarism do its worst. In opposition to war he places active resistance and now that war is upon us we, who have survived Bart de Ligt, must bring that resistance into practical existence.

Many instances are given of the effectiveness of non-violent resistance. Although recognising the weakness and compromising nature of Gandhi, de Ligt cites him as one of the most outstanding personalities in the passive resistance movement. Despite the severe imprisonments and persecution meted out to the followers of Gandhi, their struggle went on and in many instances triumphed. A most telling example in the effectiveness of non-violent methods is shown where de Ligt states:—

. . . . the British Army of Occupation in India recruits chiefly from among the Sikhs. These people, whose religion goes so far as to forbid them to lay down their sabres, had a serious quarrel with the Government during the period 1922 to 1924 on the subject of the control of certain properties belonging to some temples. Unable to solve the matter by violence, they decided to try direct, non-violent action. Proud and immovable, the sword at their side, but their arms crossed, they put up with the most brutal behaviour on the part of the British police and army without offering the slightest physical resistance, until they had obtained what they wanted."

Passive resistance is not confined to questions of religion. In the struggle against war, passive resistance is the only weapon the workers possess, and passive resistance in the form of a complete general strike until war is ended and outcast is the one sure means of bringing war to an end immediately.

The violence of revolution is also criticised by de Ligt, whilst pointing out the fact that the people being trained in methods of violence always the surprise is not that violence is committed but that during revolutionary periods it is so slight in comparison to that engaged in during normal periods. But even here de Ligt insists that non-violent methods would be more effective.

Many persons seem to believe that if the violence of say, Hitler, were not met with counter violence, the hordes of Nazism would sweep into Britain and impose its doctrine upon the people. But here again it is proved to us conclusively that the passive resistance of an anti-dictator, liberty-defending people would triumph. I leave to the reader of de Ligt's work the pleasure of reading and enjoying for himself de Ligt's arguments in this instance.

Perhaps de Ligt pays too much tribute to various individuals for their supposed anti-war attitude. Obviously he had a great admiration for Arthur Henderson who was presented with the Nobel Peace Prize. Perhaps he was not aware that Henderson was a member of the 1914 War Cabinet and was partly responsible for the death of James Connolly.

Again de Ligt was prepared to work to the extent possible within the League of Nations. The impossibility of this is now too well-demonstrated to require any further criticism.

The faults in the book are few and the weaknesses slight. It should be read and studied. For it is by non-violent methods that the people will conquer war. The conquest of violence is an ideal—an ideal that is being fought for to-day by those young men who have said "I will not fight."

At the end of the book a plan of campaign is presented for opposition to war. Besides individual refusal to participate in war, there are enumerated a hundred and one ways in which we can play our part in civil life by refusing to assist in mass murder at the behest of the ruling-class.

GLASGOW'S SENIOR MAGISTRATE

Glasgow's Senior Magistrate, Bailie Thomas A. Kerr, has not forgotten that he was a C.O. and imprisoned during the last war. He has taken his stand against the official party, and expects political victimisation in due course. He joined the Glasgow N.C.L. as soon as it was formed, to prove his allegiance to the cause of the young men who are standing, in 1939, for the principles that he upheld in 1916. He has spoken vigorously against war in Glasgow, and demands a Socialist, united, anti-war platform and policy. He is opposing, with all his energy, Arthur Woodburn, the official Labour candidate in Clackmannan, because he feels that democracy must end the Labour-Tory truce, and assert the right of the people to voice their opposition to slaughter.

War has closed the ballot-box when it is most meet and right that the ballot-box should be open. War asserts the people's obligation to slay and to die. It denies their right to think. Tom Kerr wants this to end. He is a parliamentarian who believes in parliamentary rights in war-time, when the official parliamentarians have decided to sacrifice democracy.

In the past, Lord Provost Dollan has complained that the anti-parliamentarian criticism of parliamentary and municipal Socialism is doctrinaire futility. Anti-parliamentarism means direct-action and certainly is not futile. To-day, the Lord Provost has a splendid opportunity of proving that he can use his position to uphold the cause he once maintained in opposition to previous Lord Provosts. He dare not use his opportunity. He is cowed by office and capitalist responsibility.

Not so Tom Kerr. The Senior Magistrate is making his voice heard uncompromisingly against war, and is using his position as a point of vantage against the forces of destruction and reaction. He is setting the Lord Provost a splendid example.

The Labour Party may disown and attempt to discipline its senior magistrate. The workers will be driven to respect and endorse his stand finally. It is to his honour that in 1939 he recalls the stand he made in 1916, and decides that, so far as he is concerned, there can be no surrender to war and militarism.

BLACK OUT, 1939

The war of 1939 has conscripted the mind of the common people. Responsibility for this rests more with the Labour Party and the Communist Party than even with the National Government. Attlee, Greenwood, Pollitt and Gallacher have even more to answer for in this respect than Chamberlain and his colleagues of the National Government. The purpose of the war is to destroy fascism, more popularly termed Hitlerism. In reality it has developed an anti-democratic inertia, fatal to all progress and to all possibility of an early and rational cessation of hostilities. The man who opposes war is shunned like a criminal isolationist Because he will not take his brother's life he is deemed to be a modern Cain, a monster of evil, standing apart from his fellows, and cynically enquiring: "Am I my brother's keeper?" His conventional despisers do not understand, in their Christian charity, that it is precisely because he feels he is his brother's keeper and declines, therefore, to take his brother's life, he refuses to participate in murder. For this sin of the great refusal he is banished from the company of his fellows and becomes the outcast of a grotesque, blacked out, fear-ridden civilisation. His fellow-citizens feel that they have been forced into the mire and muck of murder. They object to this strange being who speaks their tongue but refuses to become part of the brutal spectacle. Chairmen of Tribunals suggest that if he is recognised at all he ought to do some penance for his attitude, make some apology to his fellow-man in the sight of heaven. Yet the man who opposes war does so because he is most sensitive where his fellows are most calloused.

It is true that, at the time of writing, the war merely dribbles on. This easy development of homicide cannot continue for long. It must either be arrested or it will turn into a world massacre. Commonsense must either isolate promptly the present conflagration or it will embrace every continent and rage in every ocean. If there should be some who survive the memory of the disaster it will haunt them to their dying day. It is useless to expect diplomacy to arrest the war it did not prevent. Diplomats prepare and speed war. Only the common people can end war.

The United States armament manufacturers supplied war planes to Germany and then armed America for defence against Germany. They discovered that Britain was America's geographical shield against Germany, and so proposed to supply planes to Britain as a matter of principle, policy and strategy. All this was done in the name and to the interests of America's plutocrat democracy.

When war was declared, the British Government substituted almost decree for law, and all the nations blacked out their normal life. In London, Edinburgh and Glasgow we were afraid of the Nazi bombs. But Berlin and Vienna were blacked out also. They were afraid of Britain's democratic bombs. The black out was common and mutual. It expressed nothing more and nothing less than the panic and menace of war, equally wrong on both sides. The declaration of war destroyed chivalry. Respect for human rights, for the individual soul of man, for democracy, for freedom, for speech and thought; for law and civilisation and honour all was blacked out. The war of 1939 gave us the great symbolic black out in Europe. There could be no better symbol or description of war than this—the black out. In our cities by night, in our streets, our stairways, and our transport we bear the mark of war. Our lives become strained and uncertain. Darkness develops our nerves and makes us afraid. It enters into our lives. We cannot think and we are not allowed to think. In this war there are to be no great war correspondents. From military necessity, that good old official expedient for suppressing popular knowledge, we are not to learn at first hand description the facts of the struggle but are to be spoon-fed on what official bureaucracy pleases to tell us. Our lives are good enough to be blacked out. Our minds are too poor to function. Our consciences must not operate. In the twentieth century of the Christian era we have become, body and soul, the property of the State. To believe that our decisions belong to us, that we possess an individual responsibility of manhood and womanhood, that our destiny is with our nature or has some link between the invisible soul of man and its invisible god, is counted treason and sedition by the Church of Christ and by the State that prosecuted Richard Carlile a century ago for refusing to believe that the law of England was based on Christianity.

Versailles made Hitler; and the statesmen who dictated Versailles as a satiric comment on the sacrifices of the dead of 1914-18, are still active demanding the sacrifice of the second generation. The twenty years' armistice was ended when the Soviet Union cynically double-crossed the British Government and signed the peace pact with Germany. We do not say that the Soviet Union has a common interest with Germany. We do allege that it wanted its own particular slice of Poland. British diplomacy has some blame for the massacre and disaster in Poland. War could have been averted even without socialism. Thousands of Polish dead would have been enjoying life. Instead they have gone to their graves—for what? Even under capitalism a second peace conference should have been called and the miseries and shoddy wrongs of Versailles undone.

The war opened by giving extraordinary emergency powers to the government. As we write the National Register is with us. We are to be tabulated once more under an internal passport system. We are to carry identity cards and be challenged by the police at the street corner. All this is the wake of the black out with is innumerable paid A.R.P. workers. In many instances these persons have been moved not by patriotism, not by belief in war, but by funk and the meanest of mercenary motives. Under capitalism so many people go to church and so few possess a soul. The extraordinary powers taken unto itself by the government will not be returned to the people in the days to come without a struggle. Democracy has lost the war for the time being, whatever government may win the war. It is as though the gods really do make mad those whom they would destroy. The common people played at socialism with their parliamentary democracy. Their leaders betrayed socialism and to-day socialism, like Christianity and others idealisms, is but a name without meaning, a shadow of things hoped for without body or substance. Revolution has not come from the people. By some strange trick of fate it would seem that those in authority are determined to force war and violence and tyranny upon the people in order that changes that might otherwise have come peacefully shall be forced upon them, not from the left but from the right, not by the peaceful method propaganda but through the violent turmoil of war and bureaucratic invasion.

The sin of governments, the march of homicide, hide themselves behind a convenient disguise: the magic official description, emergency. To those in all lands responsible for this emergency which impresses us not by its grandeur but by its sorrow, we have one declaration to make: the future of working class youth is on the top of the soil—not beneath.

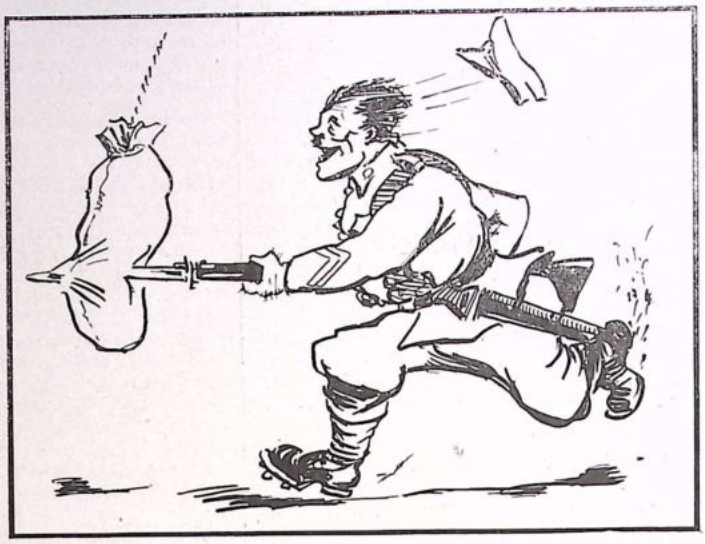
EMERGENCY HOLD-OVER

Owing to the war situation and the immediate struggle of the conscientious objector and war-resister, it has been necessary to hold over some of the matter that we had planned for this issuue. We particularly regret holding over the case of the National Union of Packing-Case Makers, Sawyers, and Millworkers. The victimisation of the members of this Union by the Building Trades Federation is a scandal of the Trade Union movement. We delayed dealing with it only that we might make our exposure complete. We have been compelled also to reserve the Dollan article and the Hyde Park matter. These will all be dealt with in early numbers of the paper.

ANDREW WOODBURN went to jail during the last war as a conscientious objector. To-day he is a war-coalition candidate. Dr. Alfred Salter, M.P., and Cecil Wilson, M.P., who have never opposed an official Labour candidate before, feel compelled to take their stand against him. Labour must oppose war.

THE SPIRIT OF THE BAYONET

In our May issue, we re-printed a Military address on "The Spirit of the Bayonet." This cartoon illustrates the point. In the 20th century this is what raw recruits in all countries learn to do —imagining the potato sack to be a human being.



POLLITT ON WAR

In 1934, the Communist Party of Great Britain published a twenty-four paged pamphlet, entitled, Labour and War. The author was Harry Pollitt, whose pro-war utterances are a feature of the present crisis. Pollitt was perturbed in 1934 about the statement on "War and Peace," issued by the Joint Council of the Labour Party and the Trades Union Congress. He complained that it was a tremendous change-over from Labour's traditional anti-war attitude.

Pollitt quoted extensively from Labour Party resolutions and speeches made at Labour Party Conferences by prominent M.P.s and leaders of the T.U.C. He warned his readers to examine the catchwords that are used in war propaganda. He wrote, in contrast with what he says to-day:—

"There are no such things as defensive or aggressive wars under capitalism. Wars are caused by the rivalries of the various capitalist Powers struggling for the domination of the world market, fighting for new empires, new places where they can invest at greater rates of profit their capital, fighting for places where they can obtain cheaper raw materials and cheaper labour supplies.

"Wars are not caused to protect 'bleeding little Belgium from Germany'; wars are not caused in order 'to end wars'; these are the deceitful stock-in-trade propaganda cries that are always brought out when war is declared.

"We saw them in full operation in the last war of 1914-1918. And we saw the Labour leaders use these shameful lies more than the capitalists, in order to persuade workers to go out and murder other workers with whom they had no quarrel."

Pollitt stressed very ably the fact that workers are never told the true causes of war. He added:—

"Oh, no. Every engine of propaganda is turned full steam ahead pumping out lies, atrocity stories about the other side 'being the aggressor'; Press, Church, wireless, Labour leaders, all are brought in to play their part in mobilising the masses by means of lying war propaganda to give up their lives, in order to secure new markets and new sources of profits for the ruling class of this country. This goes for every capitalist country. It's always 'the other country' that is the aggressor. Never Britain. Never America. Never Germany, as the case may be. Always the other country, and 'we are always on the side of the weak,' we are always 'on the side of those who are too helpless to defend themselves.' Pure bunk."

Pollitt made it clear that he was stating the official Communist Party policy in relation to the concrete war situation. He wrote:—

"There is now no longer the fear of a war situation developing. . . . The war is at our very doors. Every hour, every day it is being prepared. All pretence is flung on one side. . . .

"These are the facts which are plain for all to see It is no longer a situation in which war is a matter of years ahead, but a situation in which it can take place at any moment. War is being discussed in every street, factory, tram, bus, tube. The masses feel the deadly menace and the imminence of war.

"It is in this situation that the leaders of the Trades Union Congress and Labour Party overthrow every declaration of policy of struggle against war which has been made since 1918. A campaign prior to the Trade Union Congress and the Labour Party Conference against this policy must be carried into every factory, trade union branch and every local Labour Party.

". . . The fight against war is a hard fight. It becomes a thousand times harder when war actually breaks out, but we can fight against war, and we can be successful in that fight, when once the clear line of anti-war struggle is carried out by every section of the working-class movement. The complete repudiation of the Joint Council's statement will be a big step in that direction."

Pollitt defines the Communist attitude towards all war and all wars thus:—

"Our position in regard to defensive and aggressive wars as workers in a capitalist country is clear. We fight against all wars, try to retard and prevent them, and if we fail to, try to turn the imperialist war into a war upon the capitalist class by the utilisation of every method which lies in the power of the working-class movement. And this applies whether there is a Tory, Liberal, National or Labour Government in power."

The T.U.C. and the Labour Party have sustained the position to which they renaged in 1934. The Communist Party has joined them—and outdistanced them. Which must be rather disturbing for the true Lenin-Stalinist disciples and apologists. Still, when father turns, all Communists must turn.

"You are old, Father Stalin," the Communists said,
"And your flag has begun to turn white:
How, in welding this most contradictory line,
Are you still so infallibly right?"
"'Tis simple, my son," said the bureaucrat lord,
"To negate my negations each night,
By my own dialectic I stand on my head—
A truly magnificent sight."

"But what would you have us Communists do?"
Leader Pollitt asked in dismay,
"'Gainst Germany shall we see the fight through,
And drive Hitler's Fascists away?"
"When I see Hitler's camp fires, in Germany burn," Joseph Stalin replied in disdain,
"I think, for myself, yet another new turn
And move to a far higher gain."

GEORGE ARTHUR DUNN

George Arthur Dunn, 74-year-old founder of the firm of Dunn & Co., the hatters, and father of six war-time conscientious objectors, died at his home, The Aubreys, Redbourn, Herts., on August 14, 1939. Food reformer and vegetarian, George Dunn retired from the business many years ago and transferred all financial interest to his managers.

He made a fortune out of the 3/9 hat, but none of his sons would go into the business because they objected to the killing of animals—and rabbit skins were used for hat making. Five of the six were granted exemption from active service in 1917. The sixth, Gilbert, was refused exemption. All said they objected even to killing an insect.

GLASGOW N.C.L.—Public Meeting—ST. ANDREW'S (GRAND) HALL, Sunday, October 15th, 7 p.m. Doors open at 6 p.m. Speakers:—ANDREW STEWART; T. A. KERR; JOHN McGOVERN, M.P.; Chair, GUY A. ALDRED. Silver Collection. Questions.

OUR LETTER-BOX.

Dear Comrade, — Congratulations on your strong anti-war stand. Have just been in Holland among Pacifists and Esparantists. There are stout comrades there. We are not alone.
Cardiff, August 28. E. C. HAIGH.

Dear Sir,—During May I received a copy of THE WORD. Although I thought it a splendid paper, I decided I could not support it as a Christian pacifist because the article on Spain sounded revolutionary and violent. However, whilst waiting for a bus in Glasgow a few weeks ago I noticed the war pictures in Bakunin Hall and noticed that THE WORD was being sold there. So I bought the paper. Was it just coincidence, or was I intended to support the paper?

I cannot agree with your suggestion in the May issue that the alternative to war is boycott. Although the economic blockade does not immediately murder people it starves them, and I am afraid that that is as bad. As a Christian I cannot agree to violence against the people. (Mrs.) FLORA COLLAR.
Boston, Lincs., August 21.

Dear Guy,—Thanks for THE WORD. I had two splendid meetings last Sunday. At the start the crowd was very rowdy and inclined to be pro-war. The meeting ended very enthusiastically. If the war comes this week-end, my usual meeting place on the front will be closed down. I suppose that all meetings in opposition to the policy of the Government and the pro-war Labour Party will be suppressed under the E.P.A. I have a strong feeling, however, that our propaganda has not been all in vain. There is a stronger, if more sullen working-class, opposition to war this time than there was during the last war in this town. I suppose that this is representative of the feeling all over the country. Nevertheless our movement is in a terrible state. There are only 20 C.O.'s in Southend, and they are all religious. Although the chairman and secretary are anarchists. When the older men are called up they will take their stand for socialism and conscience. Events have shown Bolshevism up in its true light as the real counter-revolution and, as the war develops, the exposure will become greater. I would rather deal with fascists than with the communists. Of the two, the fascists are the more reasonable and the more honest.

Your articles in THE WORD are just the right kind of stuff for the younger generation, and recall your activity in THE SPUR during the last war. You have published history the workers will not find elsewhere. As this struggle develops, if you are not driven completely underground, you will be reaching new readers. Why not publish accounts of your own trials, or bring your old autobiographical pamphlet up to date? It is necessary to do this work now. More power to your elbow.
Southend, August 29. MATT KAVANAGH.

Dear Comrade,—As a revolutionary poet and critic, of whose work a leading American poet and critic recently said, "It is my conviction that you started the whole revolutionary trend in poetry in Great Britain and remain its most significant example—if not its only significant expression, which I believe you are as far as Great Britain is concerned," permit me to congratulate you on the most interesting and valuable copies of THE WORD which have reached me, and to offer my most cordial and comradely greetings for the continuance and development of the paper and the U.S.M. generally.

I agree in particular with your castigations of Willie Gallacher and Peter Kerrigan, and your exposure of the infernal monkey tricks of the C.P. G.B. with regard to Conscription, etc. I have had occasion in recent issues of my own quarterly, "Voice of Scotland," to show up the shameful intellectual incompetence and spiritual bankruptcy of the C.P.G.B. and its auxiliary, the London Leftist group of writers headed by Auden, Spender and MacNeice in belles lettres and John Strachey and the Left Book Club, and the Penguin Books, in political controversy; and my analysis of these elements has attracted a great deal of interest and approval among writers in Wales, Ireland, America and elsewhere.

I am not now a member of the C.P.G.B., from which I was expelled on ludicrous lying pretexts, as, indeed, any one with a scintilla of genuine Socialist integrity is always sure to be.

CONSCIENCE AND THE TRIBUNAL

Sir John Simon's View

In the House of Commons, on Wednesday, January 5, 1916, Mr. Asquith, who was then Prime Minister, moving the first reading of the Military Service Bill, said: "The fourth ground of exemption is a conscientious objection to the undertaking of combatant service."

This statement was received with interruption and cries of "Oh! Oh!"

Rebuking the interrupters, Mr. Asquith said: "I am rather sorry to hear those expressions of dissent, and even of derision from some quarters. Some hon. Members are perhaps unacquainted with the history of legislation in regard to these matters. In the days of the great French war, when Mr. Pitt and his successors were in power, and when they enforced the Compulsory Militia Bill, they expressly exempted the only people who in those days had conscientious objections to Government service—the people called Quakers."

Sir John Simon is the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Second Member of the present War Cabinet which has revived conscription and the conscientious objector question. He opposed conscription in 1916 and sacrificed his Cabinet position rather than support it. Speaking in the House of Commons on Wednesday, January 12, 1916, on the second reading of the Military Service Bill, he said that he was sorry that some members seemed disposed to treat the case of the conscientious objector as a laughing matter when the Prime Minister mentioned it on the first reading of the Bill. He continued:—

"The conscientious objector may not be a popular person, but he is a perfectly genuine person, and I think he is a much commoner case than perhaps is always recognised. By common consent his case has got to be met.

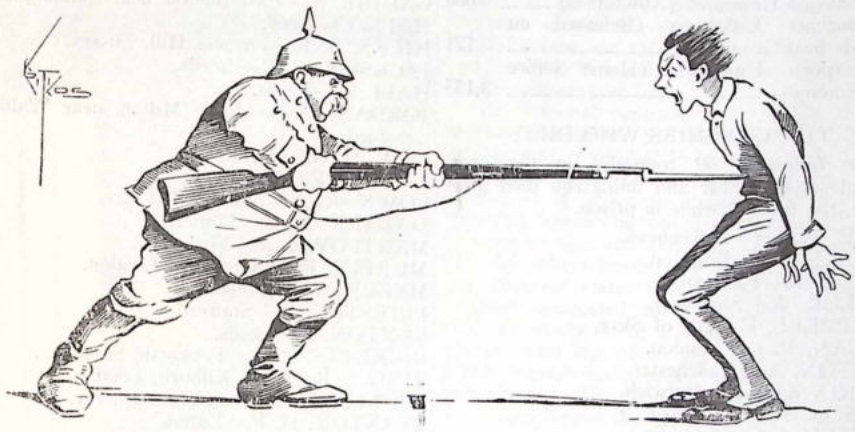
Referring to the effort by the Government to meet the case of conscience by means of Tribunal, Sir John Simon said:—

"I find it very difficult to see how adequate provision is to be made for the genuine and conscientious objector, whilst at the same time you avoid making the meshes of your net too wide . . . The provision for a conscientious objector is a provision, as I understand it, that he may come before a Tribunal, not, I should gather, in order to prove that he has got such an objection and thereby to get his exemption, but in order that, after hearing such evidence as it can, the Tribunal may decide whether he is to have exemption or not. I am bound to say that I do not believe that a provision of that sort will be found in connection with this Bill to work at all. The reason I have occupied a few moments with this case is because, in my judgment the class of difficulty which so arises goes far to justify the contention which many make as to this Bill—namely, that they do oppose it on grounds of principle as distinguished from grounds of expediency."

The principle of Tribunals works no better in 1939 than it did in 1916. Sir John Simon is faced, to-day, with the problem of defending Tribunals that are repeating all the errors of the Tribunals of 1916. He was right then, and the words he uttered at that time, apply aptly to the situation to-day. National Service Tribunals, although constituted somewhat differently, and responsible to a different department of the Government than their Military Service predecessors of twenty-three years ago, are demonstrating daily how incapable it is for such a court to reach a sound conclusion in the matter of conscience. The exemptions, and the refusals of the Tribunals to exempt, have small regard to reason, and little relation to any principle of jurisprudence.

Sir John Simon was right—the first time! To-day, his stand is on the side of error and confusion, which is a matter of regret. Brilliant intellects should seek a better destiny. John Simon possesses one of the clearest jurist minds of his time.

The "Point" of the Tribunal



"If you were threatened with a Bayonet—what would you do?"

The above illustration and letter-press are reprin Tribunal to conchies of that time. A short article, favourite one with members of the Military Servicets from The Spur, April, 1916. Question was a written by the cartoonist, accompanied the article, discussing the expediency of dodging the point!

CONCHIES: 1916-1919

In the August Word we published a very incomplete and most unsatisfactory statement, issued originally by the C.O. Information Bureau in June, 1918, of persons who resisted the Military Service Acts, 1916. The appended statistics correct and extend that list. It includes the final figures obtainable from all sources in 1919. These figures do not include those men who refused to bear arms, but served in the N.C.C.; the Friends' Ambulance Unit; the Friends' War Victims' Relief Committee; or accepted alternative service in the form of "Work of National Importance," as prescribed by the Tribunals or the Pelham Committee. Some "conchies" who refused to obey their calling-up notices were never arrested. Others deliberately evaded arrest.

The grounds on which the conchies of 1916-1919 objected overlapped in many instances. Some Socialists. And some claimed to be both Quakers and Socialists. Few members of the International Bible Students' Association or similar religious bodies remained Absolutists.

From the figures now presented comrades can draw their own picture of the struggle for conscience against war, 1916-1919.

"N.L.1919" means Not Liberated Until Finally Released After the End of the War, in 1919.

EDINBURGH CASES

This is not a full report of the Edinburgh cases. Only a few cases are noted. A full report will appear later.

Saying that he refused to lift the sword to defend Capitalism, A. Dingwall, Inchaffray Street, Perth, told the Tribunal on November 17 that he was a member of the Socialist movement and the "World Brotherhood of Workers."

"Under the present system," Dingwall said, "I will not fight because I have nothing to fight for. Capitalism has never done anything for me."

The Chairman—Your objection is a political one?

Dingwall was, without qualification, removed from the register.

Another objector, J. S. G. Simpson, 14 Glebe Park, Kirkcaldy, said that his conscience was "so tender" that he felt compelled, under conditions of war, to give up his work.

When asked how he intended to live, Simpson declared, "I don't see how I could. I will just have to starve."

Simpson was registered without condition.

The Church of Scotland was criticised by two objectors, for "condoning war."

J. S. Harvey, 2 Ford's Lane, Dundee, based his objection on a "refusal to aid and abet militarism."

When the chairman of the tribunal (Sheriff C. H. Brown, K.C.) asked Harvey if he had any connection with a religious body. Harvey replied—

"I was a member of the Church of Scotland until about six years ago, when, contrary to what I had been thinking, I found that the Church was condoning warfare and giving practically all its support to war. Since then I have not returned."

Harvey was asked what he thought would happen to the country if all the young men had he said that "Scotsmen are being asked to fight for the Empire which is an English concern."

"World peace," he added, "has a greater chance of becoming known if we do not take up arms. When we take up arms we put peace behind us."

The Chairman—What about Czecho-slovakia? They did not take up arms?

"The mere fact that they did not," Harvey replied, "avoided a useless slaughter. The Czechs lost their freedom, but they still have their lives—the most precious possession of all."

A Church of Scotland minister, the Rev. E. S. Towhill, Chalmers Church, Dundee, spoke on behalf of Harvey. Harvey, he said, having failed to find support for Pacifism within the Church had left.

Harvey was registered on condition that he continued to work at engineering.

A similar protest in regard to the attitude of the Church of Scotland was made by J. L. Anderson, Eastbank, Dunfermline.

When asked if he was connected with any religious movement, Anderson said—"I honestly believe that the Church of Scotland of which I was a member, is condoning war. That is why I left the Church. I left the Church on conscientious grounds."

Sheriff Brown praised one applicant, Robert D. Souza, 2 Lorne Place, Leith, for the way he had expressed his reasons for his objections.

"You have got more of the essentials than many another who has come here," he said.

Souza, an apprentice motor engineer, appeared wearing overalls.

The Tribunal placed him on the register on condition that he remained in his present job.

On November 23, Alexander Hoskins, student of the Edinburgh College of Art, told the Tribunal that he was seeking absolute exemption.

In his written application, Hoskins had expressed willingness to undertake work of national importance.

Hoskins comes from Crieff. He appeared before the Tribunal, dressed in dark brown corduroy trousers, a sports' jacket, and an open-neck shirt.

He told the Tribunal :—

"I have changed my mind, and am not prepared to undertake anything that might contribute to the progress of the war."

Professor Galbraith closely questioned Hoskins as to how he had come to change his mind. Hoskins explained :—

"I went through a mock tribunal last night, and realised that the logical consequence of my conscientious objection to war must involve the renunciation of any activity at all."

Hoskins added that he had been invited to attend a "mock tribunal" held by the Society of Friends the night before.

Mr. E. M. Wedderburn, D.K.S., asked whether any other attenders at the "mock tribunal" had been before the Court that day. Hoskins said he knew of one.

A man in the public gallery jumped from his seat at this stage to say he was prepared to speak for the applicant.

Sheriff Brown asked him to come down from the gallery.

The man gave his name as Alexander Bain. Two other applicants for exemption had attended the "mock tribunal." He had known Hoskins for two years. Explaining the "mock tribunal," Bain said :—

"Many a young man cannot express his convictions, though he knows what they are. It was through my influence that this young man was stopped from giving up studies. If you men think as these young men, then you would not be seated there. You cannot judge a man's conscience."

Bain also stated that Hoskins, though he had said he was not connected with a religious body, was interested in a Tolstoy community in England.

Hoskins was placed upon the C.O. register on condition that he undertook agricultural work.

Scottish National supporters sat in the public benches throughout the day waiting for the cases of two Edinburgh youths.

Hector Macpherson, the son of an Edinburgh minister, was the first Scottish Nationalist to appear. His application was based on religious and humanitarian grounds. With him sat three ministers. Speaking as a Scottish Nationalist he said that "Scotsmen are being asked to fight for the Empire which is an English concern."

Macpherson was placed unconditionally on the C.O. register. His friend, George Little, an art student at the Edinburgh University, took a similar stand, but emphasised his Scots Nationalism. He was entered without qualification for military service.

Thomas Lockhead, a student at the Edinburgh College of Art, was registered as a C.O. without condition. He declared that war encouraged immorality and excesses. He would not resist a German invasion.

R. Connell, Link Street, Burntisland, Fife, said he would do nothing to stop the German Fleet from coming up the Firth of Forth. As a Christian, he believed God would bring everything right for humanity and freedom. He would not serve in the R.A.M.C., or accept non-combatant service, because he would be helping wounded men to go back to their death.

Connell was registered as an objector, provided he continued in his present employment.

On Friday, November 24, J. Jackson, 12 Brook Street, Alva, was granted total exemption. His father served three years' imprisonment in different prisons during the great war.

Time, he told the Tribunal, hal softened the bitterness of his experience, but would not obliterate the memory of it. He recalled the "bitterness of public opinion" during the Great War. The local Tribunal granted him absolute exemption, but the decision was overturned by the Appeal Tribunal.

Mr. Jackson added :—

"I can claim to be a pioneer of the C.O. movement. I was one of the first men to be arrested in Edinburgh—in fact in Scotland—during the Great War. It was the stand that the early C.O.s made that secured for those who followed a more humane treatment."

NEWCASTLE CHAIRMAN'S APOLOGY

Because of hissing and booing from people in court, the second sitting of the Newcastle Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal ended abruptly on Wednesday, October 11. The chairman, Judge T. Richardson, had the court cleared and left the bench. The booing occurred after he had said :

"I am certain, as sure as I sit here, that If Christ appeared to-day he would approve of this war."

When he and his colleagues returned to the bench there was a further outburst from the people who had reassembled in the court.

Judge Richardson then said that as the people in court had not obeyed his order he would adiourn the court until the following morning.

D. P. Parry, of West-terrace, Northallerton, whose name was removed from the register, declared he would do nothing to relieve the sufferings of anyone hurt in an air raid.

Sir Luke Thompson, a member of the Tribunal, said if everyone adopted that attitude Hitler would be here to-morrow.

"Would you mind that?" he asked Parry, who replied, "No."

Parry said he would not help his brother if he were wearing khaki.

Judge Richardson :—

"I have never head of such a callous hard-hearted and thoroughly anti-Christian doctrine as put forwar by some of these objectors, and you seem about the most selfish of any we have heard."

Judge Richardson then declared that Christ would approve of the war.

The following day he expressed regret at his outburst :—

"I was carried away to say what was inadvisable in the circumstances.

"It must be remembered that we had been sitting all day listening to the views of what Christ would do given by a great number of conscientious objectors. We were told many times that if Christ were here, whilst he would relieve the sufferings of civil populations, he would not stir a finger to relieve the sufferings of those in uniform.

"Statements such as that irritated me as an individual, but, of course, we, as a Tribunal, are not sitting here to express our own views."

Judge Richardson added that if the Tribunal were satisfied that an objector held views, whether they agreed or disagreed with them, they decided the case on its merits and without prejudice.

Prior to the Parry incident, the Newcastle Tribunal had granted exemptions.

George Herbert Boddy, of St. James' Farm, Pickering, Yorkshire, said that Hitler's time was short and that he would never come to Britain and oppress us. He knew this from the Bible. Boddy was registered conditionally on his remaining in his occupation as a farm worker.

Albert Harbottle, of Ponteland, near Newcastle, asked unconditional exemption on religious and pacifist grounds.

JUDGE RICHARDSON—Then you have no sympathy with the oppressed and persecuted Poles and Czechs, Jews and other races?

HARBOTTLE—"I have every sympathy with them," was the reply, "but I am not prepared for millions of others to be murdered to help them.

"I would willingly see them rescued, but not if it means mass murder and bloodshed.

"I would rather see them left in the hands of the aggressor."

Harbottle was registered without qualification.

SOUTH-EASTERN TRIBUNAL

The South-Eastern Counties' Tribunal sits in London, apparently, at Bloomsbury and Southwark, on different days. Our reports are scanty, but it seems to have considered some interesting cases.

On November 6, Henry Douglas Wassell, West Wycombe Road, High Wycombe, told this Tribunal that he regarded war as a return to trial by ordeal and the settlement of disputes by the boxing-ring instead of the law courts. He was registered as a conscientious objector unconditionally.

Four days later, this Tribunal registered Sidney Desmond Tester, the film actor, as a conscientious objector, on condition that he undertook agricultural work. Desmond Tester appeared as the drummer boy of a Highland regiment, with Sabu, in the colour film, "The Drum."

Tester told the Tribunal that he objected to entertaining the troops or wounded men in hospital, and he would not take part in a film which was of a propaganda nature.

He explained :—

"For me killing is utterly wrong and futile, and so I have refused to do it. I consider that aiding and abetting or helping the Army in any way is equally wrong, as it is just helping the soldiers who are at the front, so I have refused that as well."

Asked if he objected to doing civil work, such as farming, Tester replied :—

"No, although the potatoes I might help to grow might go to the Army, it is a service to the land itself and to civilians."

Asked how long he had held these views, Tester replied : "I have never held any others."

Sir Reginal Kennedy-Cox—If you were offered an engagement to go and entertain the troops professionally would your conscience allow you to do so?

Tester—I think that would be helping really actively in the job of war. To entertain the troops, to keep their morale up, is helping them in their leisure moments to keep themselves happy, to keep on with their particular job, which I don't hold with."

"I am only too willing to entertain the civilians at home, but to entertain those who may have come home on leave, to help them to keep their spirits up, would be rather inconsistent with my views."

Sir Reginald—Would you entertain in hospital?

Tester—That would be a humanitarian service, but they would be going back from hospital to fight again.

Sir Reginald—The answer is No?

Tester—The answer is No.

John G. Lagonna—who had changed his name by deed-poll from Brookes to express his antagonism to the Saxons—provided the Tribunal with a problem on November 15. He contended that the cause of Celtic Independence was his sole allegiance. Therefore he conscientiously objected to fighting for England. His mother is a Celt and he is a Welsh Nationalist.

Lagonna explained :—"It is not right for the Saxons, or English, to tell me what I am to do. I acknowledge no right to anyone except my own people to decide my fate as to whether I should or should not fight in a war."

Judge Davies (the chairman)—If Celtic peoples had their independence and decided to take part in this war and ordered you to take part in it as a soldier, you would have no objection?

Lagonna—I should have no objection at all if the Celtic people were free agents. But I doubt if any Certic nation if free would take part in this war.

Judge Davies adjourned the case to permit Lagonna to produce evidence of character and sincerity.

ABERDEEN TRIBUNAL

Lifeboat Hero Objector Refuses to Assist War.

We have received very full reports of the Aberdeen Tribunal from our comrades, Mrs. Margaret Cumming, Secretary of the local branch of the I.L.P.; R. J. L. Gallie, Acting Secretary of the Aberdeen P.P.U.; and George N. McAndrew, a C.O. who received total exemption from the Tribunal. The reports are outlined in the following account.

The Tribunal consisted of Sheriff Sir G. Morton, chairman; Sir Russell Scott, retired civil servant; Principal Fyfe, Aberdeen University; Councillor G. Duncan, a lawyer; and Councillor L. G. R. McIntosh, Trade Union Secretary (Building Trade Operatives). McIntosh is over 50 years of age, and Duncan is said to be over 70. The others are between 60 and 70.

An observer states that the members of the Tribunal conducted their examinations fairly with the exception of Councillor Duncan, who showed much bias of feeling. Sir Russell Scott leaned towards unfairness. Principal Fyfe was open-minded. The Sheriff was impartial and in some cases helped the applicant. McIntosh was at great pains to help the applicants and to draw out their real objections.

The first three cases were dismissed, rightly, as being hardship cases.

Three applicants, D. J. Watson, R. B. Duthie, and C. M. Rayne, accepted non-combatant service. They stressed that they objected only to actual killing. Watson was represented by W. Sutherland, solicitor, who stressed the point that his client was unconcerned for his own personal safety.

Non-combatant service was the decision given in the case of J. M. Scorgie, Quarryhead, Gight, Fyvie, who was represented by R. S. Aitken, solicitor. At school, Scorgie had concluded that it was his duty to be kind to animals and plants. He decided it was wrong to take life. Scorgie did not object to defending the country, so long as it did not involve him in taking life. He lived with his grandfather on a 100-acre farm and had not shot or trapped animals.

The same decision was given in the case of A. Morroco, a brilliant young artist, 35 Causewayend, Aberdeen, on the second day's sitting. Morroco's application was supported by Mr. R. Sivelle.

Morroco's case, said the Chairman, was rather different from the others. At present his parents were Italian nationals, and he was born here. He had been awarded the Brough Travelling Scholarship of £100 and the Royal Scottish Academy Travelling Scholarship. He had been assisting Mr. Sivelle in the mural decorations at the University Students' Union.

"Your attitude seems to be that you are really not a national of any State but a Cosmopolitan," said the Chairman. "Do you recognise any obligation to any State."

Morroco—I realise I have some obligation to this State.

Chairman—In your view as a Cosmopolitan this is really a civil war?

Morroco—Yes.

Morroco did not object to service under civilian control so long as it was to alleviate suffering. He would do A.R.P. work, but would not make munitions or arms to kill.

"I would not like to take any part in the war at all," he said, "but if it is going on I cannot stand by and do nothing to alleviate suffering, being human."

He would help the wounded of any nationality.

"Please let me give you an example of my objections.

"Another chap and I did two big figures of soldiers for the recruiting rally at the Music Hall. We started to think about it when we had finished the work. We did not think it right that we should be trying to make other fellows do what we would not do ourselves—join the army. We gave the money we received for the work to the hospitals.

"I was in France two or three months ago, and I wanted to go to Italy to study painting, but I would have been conscripted for the Italian Army. I did not want to join any army. I did not go.

"If I was forced to kill, it is the most terrible thing that could be done to me."

Mr. Sivelle said he was present from a sense of duty to the court that they should be fully informed.

Mr. Sivelle continued :—

"This boy is an extraordinarily brilliant student. He is certainly this city's first young artist. I don't know any young man in Scotland who was so highly developed.

"As a member of the Scottish Academy, I consider the developed talents such as this boy possesses are such that we can ill-afford to throw them away. There is such work as camouflage and the post of the official war artist.

"He is an extraordinary young man. Few men of forty are so highly developed as this boy."

Chairman—He is obviously a very brilliant young man. I suppose your idea is that any form of national work that would take him away from his artist's work would be a downright loss.

Mr. Sivelle—It is waste of the money that the country has spent in bringing him to this stage.

Chairman—The statute does not authorise to take that into consideration.

Mr. Sivelle—This young man is not like others. His heroes are not Wallace and Bruce but Leonardo da Vinci and Ghirlandajo.

The first actual case of conscientious objection to come before the Aberdeen Tribunal was that of D. F. Wiseman, 22, marine-engineer, 13 Lodge Walk, Peterhead. He is a young lifeboatman, and a member of the Exclusive Brethren.

Wiseman stated that, in his view, it was an outrage to God to use his body for combatant service. He sought to be clear of the whole machinery attached to war.

Principal Fyfe—You would not even be a stretcher-bearer.

Wiseman—I could not volunteer, sir.

Chairman—Suppose there was an air raid on Peterhead, your services could not be utilised as a stretcher-bearer?

Wiseman—Let me give an illustration, sir. Last month we had a telephone message. A flash was reported at sea. The lifeboat was called out. My father has been in the lifeboat for quite a time.

Owing to the regulations, they were not allowed to fire the gun to call the crew. I had the privilege or the opportunity to be there.

"We proceeded on our course and found it was a torpedoed ship. It shows I would be only too willing if the opportunity arose to render a little service."

Wiseman said he was not to be brought into the military machine, even in the R.A.M.C.

Applicant was registered as a conscientious objector on condition that he continued in his occupation as a marine engineer.

Before Wiseman told his story of the torpedoed ship, he had been asked: Do you find a line in the Bible that says not to fight?

J. G. Thomas, 32 Braemar Place, Aberdeen, registered as a conscientious objector before the war started. He did not take his stand on religious grounds but on his pacifist ideals. He would not, as a pacifist, join in A.R.P. work. The Prime Minister had called A.R.P. the country's fourth line of defence, and the Chairman of the Newcastle Tribunal had said it was definitely a military activity.

Dr. Duncan—But you have no objection to collecting customs to pay for the war?

Thomas—No.

Mr. McIntosh—That is because you have to live and cannot live without it.

Thomas—Unless you make your living as an anti-war propagandist you cannot help assisting the war.

Dr. Duncan—It is not against your ideals to collect money to pay soldiers?

Thomas—I am afraid I am in the position of having a private war within myself. I cannot help participating in the conflict, without getting up against the authorities and being put in prison. That will not help my ideals at all.

[In our view, this reply was not very satisfactory. Our ideals are advanced by imprisonment.]

Thomas stated that he would assist injured in an air raid but he would not join in A.R.P.

Finally, he was registered as a conscientious objector.

G. N. McAndrew, 23 Marywell Street, Aberdeen, appealing for absolute exemption, said :—

"I object to all three sections. I have no right to kill, and I have no right to aid and abet in the taking of life. I shall go to prison, and, if that is not enough, I shall give my life for my ideals.

"My parents belonged to the Labour movement and were also religious thinkers. My views are a combination of their religious and political outlook. I believe in the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man."

Councillor Duncan—If you were employed as a baker, and found that a batch of bread was going to feed the soldiers, would you resign your job?

McAndrew—I understand that the Army makes its own bread.

Duncan—So long as your are helping to keep up the morale of the civil population by being employed as a baker, are you not helping the war?

McAndrew—Yes: but I must live.

Duncan—I thought you would give your life for your ideals.

McAndrew—I would give my life, if I were to be shot; but I do not fancy slow starvation.

D. N. F. Crawford, a bank clerk, 7 Richmondhill Road, Aberdeen, was registered as a C.O., subject to taking up ambulance work under civilian control. Crawford said he could see no occupation that kept him further from participating in the war than his own.

Chairman—I think the banks are rather important for the financial arrangements for the war.

Crawford—That is true, but there is nothing else I can think of that is of less assistance than my own work.

Principal Fyfe—You would not say that banking is a more Christian occupation than tending to the sick?

Crawford—In itself, it is not doing Christian work.

The same decision was given in the case of J. W. C. Hardie, c/o Addison, 19 Martingdon Road; D. Law, 38 Mile End Avenue; R. J. Beattie, "Selma," Cults.

Hardie appealed as a Christian pacifist.

Chairman—Would you go the length of saying that this country should be pacifist if the rest of the world were belligerent?

Hardie—Certainly, Sir.

Chairman—Would you object to being organised to assist the wounded?

Hardie—I would not object to purely voluntary organisation.

Beattie stated that he objected on humanitarian grounds. He would be committing a sin against civilisation if he aided war. The spread of pacifism was the only righteous course.

A. G. Robb, 18 Leggat Terrace, Aberdeen, obtained total exemption. He said that war was wrong and killing was abhorrent to his nature. He was supported by Dr. Bury, President of the local P.P.U. The applicant said he was prepared to be organised on a voluntary basis to aid the civil population. Dr. Bury stated that, within the Act, provision was made for total objection to conscription.

The questions and findings of the Tribunal at the first day's sittings were fairly impartial. On the second day, there was a decided tendency towards misleading and irrelevant questions, in an endeavour to confuse applicants. In most cases, the findings did reflect the cases put forward by the applicants. In the two cases where a lawyer appeared, no questions were asked. It seems strange to bring a lawyer merely to ask for non-combatant service.

The decisions of the Tribunal summarised are :—

CAN WE TRUST HITLER?

By The Marquis of Tavistock

Many persons who are quite ready to admit that national selfishness is a mistake and that something should be done to satisfy the legitimate needs of the German people, feel that constructive peace-making is almost impossible and re-armament and war almost inevitable because in their opinion, Hitler is a man of wholly untrustworthy and criminal character.

In these days of crisis it is above all things necessary that we should avoid passion and prejudice and look on men and affairs with clear insight and balanced judgment. For this reason, the writer desires to submit the following points to the consideration of those who hold with great conviction an opinion somewhat different from his own :—

1. All men, in varying degrees, are a mixture of good and evil, and in the case of certain persons of strong character, the combination of good and bad qualities may present an astonishing contrast. Some years ago a book was published by a girl who had served in the Cossack army. In one chapter she relates how she had witnessed a Bolshevik soldier murder in cold blood an entire family of White Russians. Soon afterwards, however, this same man treated the author of the book with great kindness and courtesy and, when news reached him later of the death of his old mother, he was immediately moved to tears. This Bolshevik soldier was not a hypocrite but an example of the strange contradictions of human nature, which, in some degree or other, exist also in ourselves and likewise in Hitler and Mussolini.

2. Experience of prison work soon teaches that criminals may be divided into two classes—those who respond when treated with practical unexpected kindness, offered, as it must be, without conditions; and those who do not. It is absolutely impossible to tell beforehand to which category a particular man may belong: his past record is no guide whatever, for sometimes the criminal with the worst record proves the most responsive. It is important to remember that our Government has never yet applied a test of this nature to Hitler. Personal conversations with the object of averting a world war; somewhat grudging recognition of what has been done when he has taken by force what may have been denied him through more peaceful and legitimate channels; vague expressions of willingness to confer about economic grievances and other matters, to which conditions have been attached, certainly cannot be included in the category of generous, practical and unexpected offers of help.

3. It is never wise to come to an absolutely final and very adverse judgment of anyone unless you have first heard their side fully and fairly. The case against a man on the authority even of trustworthy witnesses may look as black as night; his deeds may seem to cry aloud to Heaven for vengeance; and yet it is an extraordinary fact that if you take the trouble to hear his side of the case and make yourself acquainted with all the important revelant circumstances, while the deeds in question may still remain indefensible, in nine cases out of ten you will come to feel very differently about the blameworthiness of the man concerned. Many people never learn the very valuable lesson of hearing both sides even when it seems inconceivable that there could be more than one side; nevertheless, it is one of life's most important lessons, albeit one which, even when learnt, it is only too easy at times to forget. Very few of us have heard, or have had the chance of hearing, Hitler's case stated fully and fairly, as he himself or a close friend might state it. If we hear it stated at all, it is almost invariably through the medium of a hostile and most unscrupulous press.

4. People feel it impossible to trust Hitler on three main grounds. First, because he whote certain passages in "Mein Kampf" which seem to show an ambition for world domination; second, because he has treated certain classes of people in Germany, such as Jews, pacifists and Communists, with extreme injustice and severity; third, because, having declared that he did not want to annex non-German territory, he entered and made himself master of Prague.

It should be remembered, however, that because a man in his earlier days, writing under considerable emotional stress due to the condition of his country, declares that he has certain aims in view, it does not necessarily follow that many years later he will try and achieve all those aims. He may conceivably change his mind, or circumstances may make it obvious to him that it is impossible for him to achieve his original objective; and even if he is seen to have achieved his original objective in part, that is not necessarily an indication that he still desires to achieve it in full; it may be that he does so, but also, it may not.

An impartial reader of "Mein Kampf" can hardly fail to be struck by the fact that the writer is a man with a genuine passion for social righteousness of a kind; it may be a very limited and twisted passion, but it is there all the same. It is evident that Hitler has come to identify the Jews with that poverty and suffering of his fellow-countrymen which moved him to justifiable indignation in his younger days, and in fairness to his opinion there is no getting away from the fact that absolutely impartial and competent observers, completely free from the vice of anti-Semitism, tell us that at one time there were in Germany many influential Jews who were persons of a most unattractive and anti-social character. Their crimes do not, of course, in the least justify the persecution of the entire Jewish race, but when we condemn Hitler, we would do well to remind ourselves that our own people are by no means entirely free from the same tendency to unjust and indiscriminate hatred of whole groups and classes of persons, some of whom may be quite innocent. We have only got to remember the vindictive hatred displayed during the war against conscientious objectors, not only by men but also by educated women. A little later a similar spirit was displayed in regard to Communists, during the period when our feeling for the Soviet regime had not undergone its recent remarkable change. English people who disliked conscientious objectors identified all of them with cowardice and lack of patriotism; those who disliked Communists identified all of them with cruelty, class-hatred and the overthrow of orderly government; Hitler, in the same way, identifies Jews with the poverty and exploitation of his fellow-countrymen and immoral influences in society.

With regard to the unfair treatment of smallller nations, the fact should not be forgotten that Hitler is not the only offender. Poland and Great Britain have been guilty in a similar way, the former in respect of the Ukrainians; the latter in respect of Montenegro, the independence of which small allied country the British Government sacrificed after the war, for reasons of Power-politics, in a manner utterly disgraceful. If we expect to be forgiven after we have treated small nations unfairly, we must, in common justice, forgive others and allow them further chances also.

In regard to the breaking of pledges, it is a fact that all statesmen break their pledges when, owing to change of circumstances or for other reasons, they consider that it is contrary to their nation's interests to continue to keep them. The British Government broke its promise made during the war to the Arabs in Palestine, and Mr. Chamberlain has broken his promise with regard to the introduction of conscription before war had been declared. Hitler also had his reasons, based on altered conditions, for changing his policy in regard to the annexation of non-German territory. There was the appeal for assistance in connection with the trouble which arose between the Czechs and Slovaks; the acquisition, by British financial interests, of shares in the gigantic Skoda armament works, armament works out of all proportion to the needs of a small country; and there was the extraordinarily foolish and provocative statement by a French Minister in regard to the suitability of Czech territory as a base from which to conduct bombing raids on German towns. None of these reasons may have been adequate to justify Hitler's change of policy, but they were, at anyrate, reasons of a kind. In fairness also to Hitler, the fact must not be forgotten that on the testimony of no less an authority than the British Admiralty, he kept the agreement for the limitation of naval armaments with scrupulous honesty up to the time when the anti-German alliances which we began to make led him to believe that war with Britain was no longer the impossibility it was held to be at the time when the naval arrangement was first made.

5. It is impossible for Hitler to injure this country by war unless he can first persuade the majority of the German nation that we are their enemies and are determined to treat them unjustly. It is absolute nonsense to argue, as some have done, that Hitler is so complete an autocrat that, with threats of execution and concentration camps, he could drive his people to attack us, even though in their hearts they knew that we were their friends. The whole of Dr. Goebbels' propaganda gives the lie to such a fantastic suggestion. If by practical deeds and not mere words we could convince the German people of our friendliness, Hitler would be powerless to harm us, even if he desired to do so.

6. Hitler, on various occasions, has expressed his desire for friendship with England and made very important proposals in regard to disarmament. His critics will believe that these proposals were insincere, but, even if they were, they afford an absolutely magnificent and hitherto quite unused opportunity of driving a wedge between him and the more reasonable and peace-loving section of Germany. If we called his bluff, if bluff it were, by telling him that we now accept his disarmament proposals on his former terms (subject to mutually satisfactory safeguards in regard to honest execution on both sides), we could place him in an intolerably difficult position if he endeavoured to hedge and, by pursuing a diplomacy which was both clever and high-principled, we could, in the end, virtually compel him to choose between losing his popularity in Germany to a dangerous degree, and keeping to his offers even, it might be, against his own personal inclination, if only to save his face.

CONSCIENCE ON TRIAL

The Rev. T. J. Harvey, minister of the Partick Baptist Church, Glasgow, has given us permission to publish his impressions of the Glasgow Tribunal :—

11 Laurel Street,
Glasgow, W.1.

Dear Sir,

My contention at the Assembly was that the Tribunal was weighted instead of balanced. There should be neutrals or C.O.s on it as well as those who are war-minded. Can you expect a prejudiced jury to view anything but in a prejudiced way? Some of the reasoning from the bench was absurd, and the quotation of Scripture out of its context was pitiful. As I said at the Tribunal, we are told this is a war for liberty. Well, let us have liberty of conscience.

I thank you for offering me the hospitality of your paper, but in looking through it I don't think I could add anything, and you yourself are much better informed in these matters than I am.

With kind regards,
Yours sincerely,
T. J. HARVEY.

LONDON CONCHIES' TRIBUNAL

The London Local Tribunal meets on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, at the West London County Court; and on Wednesday at the Fulham Town Hall. Judge Hargreaves is the Chairman. He is supported by Sir Edmund B. Phipps, Sir James Baillie, Alderman S. H. Marshall, and Mr. A. B. Swales. Mr. Clayton Smith represents the Ministry of Labour, and Mr. R. J. Lawler is the Clerk to the Tribunal.

The first sitting of this Tribunal was on October 3. In just over a month it has heard 465 cases. The results are as follows:—

Unconditional Exemption	7
Conditional Exemptions	165
Non-Combatant Military Duties	189
Placed on Military Register	104

The first sitting endeavoured to impress the public with the patience and fairness of the members of the Tribunal. This sympathetic treatment rapidly changed. Day after day accumulated disturbing evidence, not merely of harshness, but of injustice. Young men, opposed to the weight of current prejudice, and often pleading in public for the first time, found themselves apparently floored in argument by the aged and experienced controversialists examining them. These controversalists enjoyed the further advantage of status and so could improve their opportunity of dictating. It did not follow that their argument was right. Much that the members of this Tribunal said was specious.

These members forgot their duty, which was not to discover how quick-witted were the young men. As the Manchester Chairman remarked, quickness of answer is no evidence of conscience. The business of the Tribunals is to discover whether the objectors are sincere in their scruples.

The members of the London Tribunal are all elderly. Judge Hargreaves is a County Court Judge. Sir Edmund Phipps is a man of 73 years of age. He retired 10 years ago from the position of Deputy Secretary for Elementary Education. He has made no secret of his impatience with conscientious objectors. Sir James Baillie is a professor of philosophy and a practised debater on employers' arbitration tribunals. A. B. Swales is a retired trade union leader. It was some time before he developed any good intent.

During this month of barren theological disputation and most irreverent bandying of Biblical texts, Judge Hargreaves has become expert at ridiculing Christian teaching. He has avowed that Jesus nowhere specifically declared that war was incompatible with his teaching. The Judge also has justified war on the ground that God allowed Christ to be killed for humanity's sake. We would not like to see Judge Hargreaves standing before a Tribunal, defending these strange ideas that he imposed on nervous young men of 20 and 21, who had no experience of public speaking.

The misbehaviour of Sir Edmund Phipps became most marked.

"These miserable creatures," he observed at one hearing. "What bosh!" he exclaimed a few minutes later.

"How much time do you devote to that study," Sir James Baillie blandly asked a young pacifist who pleaded Biblical support for his views.

To another young man, who said that killing was opposed to the laws of God, he said: "Did your vicar apply that to war as well as murder?"

A post office worker reasoned that his duty to humanity was higher than his duty to a particular community. "Can you tell me," rapped out Sir James, "any one thing which humanity as a whole has done for you?"

This reminds one of the Irishman who asked: "Why should I serve posterity? What has posterity ever done for me?"

A mere boy exclaimed that he knew that if he were to shoot someone, it would be wrong. Judge Hargreaves rejected this outburst of sincerity and sneered: "He doesn't like the idea of killing and it rather goes against the grain for him to fight."

Ought youth to like this idea of killing? Ought it not to go against the grain of twentieth-century Christian humanity to fight?

Little evidence of sympathy with the young C.O. was shown by A. B. Swales. He even sneered at Socialist objectors to war and national imperialism. Only after the London Tribunal had been criticised in the press, and the Daily Herald in particular, had attacked its behaviour, did Swales remember that he had been a member of the working class and a Socialist critic of war. The Tribunal sat for a month before Swales made a scene. At last he protested:—

"I must voice my objection to these questions as being irrelevant," he said.

Alderman Marshall—I think I will retire.

Judge Hargreaves—I hope you won't.

Swales—I object . . .

Judge Hargreaves—I am here to decide whether questions are relevant or not.

Swales—All I want to say is that we will discuss it elsewhere, not in public.

Swales's protest was loudly applauded from the public gallery.

Judge Hargreaves—If people make a noise they will be turned out of court.

Members of the Communist Party and readers of the inglorious Sunday Worker will recognise the name of Mr. Swales. He was hailed by the Stalinists as a representative Left Wing leader and exponent of the class struggle. The Sunday Worker for September 13, 1925, published a report of the Scarborough Trades Union Congress beneath the following headings:—

"TRADES UNION CONGRESS"

"SWALES' SPLENDID SPEECH."

"Scarborough Congress Consolidates Forward Movement."

The letter-press explained that this Congress "demonstrated the fact that the rank and file are determined to stand no nonsense." If the Labour movement is satisfied with Swales' behaviour as a member of the London Tribunal, and considers that such class-collaboration is becoming to an ex-chairman of the T.U.C., obviously there is no limit to the nonsense that it is prepared to stand.

The Sunday Worker, in the usual hysterical C.P. style, declared "It was agreed on all sides that the Scarborough Congress would leave its mark upon Labour history." The truth is that the Scarborough Congress did not even leave its mark upon the chairman.

The Sunday Worker described how the hall was crowded when A. B. Swales rose to deliver his address. Five million organised workers were represented by 724 delegates. This is of great consequence to-day, and has been during the intervening years, whilst Capitalism was preparing for the present Armageddon.

Then followed a summary of the "historic speech" which demanded a straight "fight between Capitalism and Labour."

"I take this opportunity of expressing the opinion that our standard-bearers in Parliament will best serve our cause by concentrating in incessant propaganda outside the House of Commons."

Swales concluded that it was necessary "to confront with unbroken spirit and resolute will the powerfully organised forces of Capitalism."

Of course, Swales is playing his part in the fight against Capitalism by serving on the London Militarist Tribunal!

In the Daily Herald for November 16, Stuart Fletcher describes a typical sitting of the Tribunal, which differs somewhat from the Tribunals in other parts of Britain. Facing the Trigunal is a half-circle of oak pews. Overlooking them is the public gallery. Around the chamber are stained glass windows of past kings and queens of England. Behind the Judge's chair is a life-size oil-painting of George V. This is flanked by portraits of numerous Mayors of Fulham.

"The stage is set. A clerk—a one-armed man who is probably a wounded veteran of the last war—calls out a name, and a young man . . . walks hurriedly into the well of the court and faces the Tribunal.

"Having verified the applicant's name, the judge reads out his statement claiming exemption. This is a testament of faith, sometimes eloquently, more often tediously written, but none the less a testament.

"The judge reads it out in a flat, dry, hurrying voice as if it is an inventory of rather unsavoury groceries.

"Then come questions. And these . . . give the impression of being designed less to measure the depth of an applicant's conscience than to muddle a mind already confused by the necessity of making a desperate decision."

When Ian G. Forrester-Paton, of Kingsley Hall, Powis Road, Bow, declared that he would not do A.R.P. work, agriculture or any defence work or work of national importance as an apology for refusing to fight, A. B. Swales commented: "Somebody else has got to feed you, but you won't take a hand in feeding yourself."

Forrester-Paton—Not to feed war.

Swales—Not much Christianity about that, I am afraid.

And not much Socialism and Labourism about Swales, we are afraid. Alderman Marshall approved. Judge Hargreaves approved. Sir William Baillie approved. Swales, forgetful of Scarborough, and the stupid Stalinist conspiracies that improved his status under capitalism, swelled at such stern capitalist approval.

The Tribunal told Forrester-Paton that he would be granted conditional exemption, only if he secured a job in agriculture, forestry, or the mercantile marine.

We sympathise with the question put by Alderman Marshall, who asked if Forrester-Paton carried a gas-mask. The answer being in the affirmative, Marshall asked: "What is your idea of getting a gas-mask, when you disapprove of A.R.P. work?" The reply was: "It is a compromise."

As opposed to the attitude adopted by Forrester-Paton, we commend the attitude of a Glasgow man, ex-Sergeant-Major Thomas Robinson, who has seen 31 years' service. The Scots Daily Express for October 14, 1939, published the following statement made by him to its reporter:—

"I won't carry a mask because I won't wear one. I never wore one in France in the last war either. I've survived three wars, and I'm not likely to be bumped off in this one."

On principle, no conscientious objector, no pacifist, should carry a gas-mask. It is completely wrong. On this point, the Tribunal attitude was correct. It is for the Tribunal to reconcile its approach in this matter with its conclusion in one case where it granted absolute exemption.

Lawrence Bendry Bruce Stokes, of Kew Bridge Court, Chiswick, satisfied the Tribunal that he was a conscientious objector and his name was kept on the register unconditionally.

Stokes stated that he refused to do anything to help on the war. His objection was based on the Ten Commandments. He thought it was better that Austria had been taken over by Germany without a war. Stokes added that he had tried to join the Metropolitan Police and the A.R.P. Services without success.

It is impossible to reconcile the decision of total exemption in the Stokes case with that given in the case of Frank Robert Stephen Higgins, Moore Street, Chelsea. Moore was a full-time sergeant in the Special Constabulary, and had done A.R.P. work. He refused to join the cadets when at school, from conscientious objection. The Tribunal said they could not "square" Moore's opinions with his employment and so removed his name unconditionally from the register of conscientious objectors.

The same Tribunal granted conditional conscientious exemption, so long as each remained in his present employment, to:—

(1) Raymond Knight, Balmore Road, Highgate, a full-time First-Aid worker for the A.R.P.

(2) Alan Lloyd, Wilmot Road, Dartford, a machine-minder in a munition factory.

(3) Henry William Kirby, Conder Green Lane, North Cheam, an auto-engineer, who constructed barrage balloons.
(4) Richard James George Price, Heathfield Gardens, Chiswick, a full-time Air Raid warden.

These conditional exemptions imply that it is consistent with conscientious objection to war and to killing to be: (1) a full-time air raid warden; (2) a machine-minder in a munition factory; (3) a constructor of barrage balloons. Why was Higgins turned down for being a Special Constable, and another man attacked for carrying a gas-mask? Why was a third refused for subscribing to Red Cross work?

Swales might have recalled his "historic" Scarborough speech about the straight fight between Capital and Labour, when listening to the case put forward by Harry Judson, of Welbourne Road, London, N. 17. Judson objected to war on social grounds. He refused to be trained for the war machine for the benefit of Capitalists. He protested against being called upon "to kill fellow wage-slaves of other countries with whom I have no quarrel."

Sir James Baillie—Russia goes to war.

Judson—Yes, but Russia is a capitalist State.

Sir James—The gentlemen in authority in Russia would be most interested to know they belong to the capitalistic class.

Judson—Since the revolution a Socialist State has not been set up and a Capitalist State exists.

Sir Edmund Phipps—The Labour Party is one of the strongest forces for war. Isn't the Labour Party in the House of Commons a Socialist Party?

Judson—It calls itself the Socialist Party at times. But it does not act as the Socialist Party. When war comes, it swings over to the capitalist class.

Judge Hargreaves—Do you believe in the class-war?

Judson—Yes. Class-war is all around us and is going on all the time.

Judge Hargreaves—Are you willing to take part in the class-war?

Judson—If you interpret the class-war in the terms of killing, no. I am against killing because it is a messy job, and you don't get anywhere with killing.

Judge Hargreaves—Have you religious objections to killing.

Judson—I have no religious convictions. I am an Atheist.

The Tribunal removed Judson's name from the register of conscientious objectors, and he was made available for non-combatant duties only. He was told that he could appeal. Without question, this was a case in which Swales should have spoken in defence of the applicant. But not a word came from the "Left-Wing" hero of Scarborough and C.P. pet. Judson was turned down for avowing his Socialism and answering questions truthfully.

The Tribunal removed the names of the following applicants from the conscientious objector's register, but stipulated that they should be employed in non-combatant duties only:—

(1) Raymond D. Cook, Amery Gardens, Harlesden.
(2) Victor Albert Duker, Highcroft, North Hill.
(3) Alfred George Gray, Abbot Road, Southall.
(4) John William Bland, Argyll Avenue, Southall.
(5) Charles Stanley Moore, Canobee Road, Honor Oak.
(6) Ronald G. Gaymour, Court Way, Twickenham.
(7) B. W. Mack, Lancing Road, Feltham, Middlesex.
(8) Norman Ivor Reynolds.
(9) Henry Smith, Hulse Avenue, Barking, E.
(10) Austin Smith, Greencroft Road, Hounslow.
(11) David Richard Thurlun, Graham Road, Acton Green.
(12) Filber George Barnet, Hartington Road, West Ealing, W.13.
(13) Lawrence Arthur Wormington, South Ealing Road, W.5.
(14) Percy Eric Knapp, Barnfield Road, Ealing.
(15) Philip Ivor Voyce, The Mall, Ealing.
(16) Cedric Alec Collingwood, Stonebridge Park, N.W.
(17) Wilfred Welldon, St. Mary's Road, Bayswater.
(18) John Leslie Smith, Keswick Road, Putney.
(19) Michael M. R. Sorensen.

In our opinion, each of these applicants made out a clear case for total exemption. Their names are recorded because they all declare that they would not render military service of any kind, notwithstanding the Tribunal's decision. They would appeal, and resist if necessary.

Duker and Bland were willing to succour the civil population, but not under military orders. Gray was willing to save civil life under normal circumstances, but not as part of the war machine. He declared that war was a violation of Christianity. This was the view also of Bland. The Rev. H. Westlake, of King's Hall, Southall, spoke in support of Bland's sincerity. Gray was supported by his father, Edgar James Gray, who served in the Great War, but now endorsed his son's anti-militarist views.

Cook declared that the present war was the result of the 1914-18 conflict. He did not fear an enemy over-running Britain, because all tyranny must yield finally to the determined pacifist opposition of an oppressed people. It was impossible for miltarism to conquer civic democracy.

Moore had been a pacifist since he was 15 years of age. He declined to help the wounded or to undertake work of national importance, because that was helping the Government to prosecute the war. He would rather see the country starve than aid violence. He objected to all forms of force, including police courts, law courts, and prisons. Force was unnecessary and created crime and violence.

Judge Hargreaves—Your statement is much wider than anybody else's.

Sir James Baillie—Your ideal is impossible. In fact, it is not an ideal; it is a fantasy.

The Tribunal declared that such things could not be. Moore must take things as they were and try to improve them.

Whether this view was right or wrong, the Tribunal had no right to deny Moore's conscience because they objected to his Utopia. Many things have happened that the learned and great declared would never come to pass. It is far wiser to vision what may be than to prophesy what can never be.

Gaymour was against war and militarism. He refused to do non-combatant work, A.R.P., or work of national importance.

Sir James Baillie—Can you give me, from Christ's words, a specific condemnation of war, or a specific statement of disapproval of the occupation of a soldier? Give me one statement out of the Gospel and I will be quite satisfied.

Gaymour—We are commanded not to kill.

Judge Hargreaves—That is in the Old Testament.

Gaymour—We are told: "Whoso taketh the sword shall die by the sword."

Judge Hargreaves said that the Court was satisfied that Gaymour had genuine objections to taking life.

Mack refused to be taught how to kill his fellow-men. Militarism merely meant learning how to murder people.

The father of Reynolds was granted total exemption as a C.O. in 1916. The son regarded war as the law of the jungle and would play no part in military service.

Henry Smith has been opposed to war since leaving school. He would give his life to save another, if necessary: but he was opposed to non-combatant service.

Austin Smith had hesitated at one time, and had considered doing A.R.P. or R.A.M.C. service. He angered the Tribunal by declaring that a soldier could not be a Christian. He declined to explain the religious beliefs of Oliver Cromwell and Chinese Gordon. The Rev. Norman F. Chubb, M.A., minister of Heston Congregational Church, made rather a halting witness in this case.

Thorburn is a communicant of the Church of England. The Tribunal considered that an anti-militarist had no right to be a member of the Church of England. Which may be right. Which means that an Anglican cannot believe in the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. This decision challenges Thorburn's intelligence, but it certainly does not destroy his conscience.

Wormington was congratulated by Swales on his honest, straightforward statement.

The Tribunal agreed that "there was a certain amount of conscience objection" in Knapp's case.

Voyce belongs to the Pentecostal movement and contended that his loyalty to God compelled him to decline all war loyalty to the Government. The Tribunal considered that he conscientiously objected to the shedding of blood, but they rejected his declaration that non-combatant duty was serving the war machine.

Collingwood stood alone. He belonged to no Peace Society and no religious denomination. War was wrong and must be resisted. He would not kill nor assist anybody else to kill.

Welldon is a Salvationist. He adopted a firm absolutist position. The Tribunal declared that he had a conscientious objection yet rejected his case.

Leslie Smith stated that conscription robbed men of choosing between right and wrong, and was a violation of freedom. The Tribunal decided that Smith showed a degree of conscientious objection, but it was of recent growth.

Sorensen is the son of the Rev. R. Sorensen, M.P., Unitarian minister, Labour M.P. for West Leyton, and a war resister in 1916. The father wrote to the Tribunal:—

> "So far as possible, I have sought to avoid giving my son any bias otherwise than to think for himself, to nourish a sense of social obligation, and to search for and reach his own political and religious convictions."

Unconditional exemption should have been granted in the following cases, instead of the applicant being registered as a conscientious objector, conditionally on undertaking agricultural work or forestry, within one month:—

(1) G. O. Way, of Rosebery Gardens, Sutton, Surrey.
(2) Ronald Arthur Brooks, of Tinto Street, Canning Town.
(3) Lawrence Edgar Sandford, or Gordon Road, Hounslow.
(4) Moses Wilkes, of Fountain Place, Mitcham, Surrey.
(5) Anthony Gilbert Spawforth, of Grenes Park Avenue, Surbiton.
(6) Rupert W. Goldhawk, Barn Hill, Wembley Park.

Brooks is a compositor by trade, but refused to assist in any printing connected with recruiting, war service, or A.R.P. work. He stated:—

> "A person who says he is a follower of Christ and can make himself a part of the war machine for the destruction of other people is a hypocrite."

Sandford declared that Britain had never fought a war that was justifiable morally. He did not recognise the right of any Government to destroy life. If it were necessary he was prepared to lose his job, suffer imprisonment, and even lose his life in pursuit of his opposition to war. He considered the stand against war and conscription an issue of supreme national importance. War did not conform to his ideas of a Christian democracy, for war was only organised murder. War was never a matter of organised defence. One could remove aggression only by removing the causes of aggression.

Moses Wilkes said that, since he could remember, his father, Moses Wilkes, suffered from wounds and disablement received in the last war. He added:—

> "I would not like to see anyone else suffer as my father has suffered; nor am I prepared to make anybody suffer in that way. I will not partake in war nor assist war in any way."

His father accompanied Wilkes and spoke on his behalf:—

> "It would not be fair for my son to carry on where I left off. It is just waste of life, killing or maiming people; and then carrying on, as I have been, without a day's health these last 23 years."

Judge Hargreaves was annoyed because Goldhawk stressed his refusal to compromise with war in anyway whatever. The learned Chairman asked what Goldhawk was prepared to do, as the Tribunal had heard only what he was not prepared to do. The country was at war, and the people had to be fed. Would he do anything regarding that? Goldhawk replied that he was not willing to do work of national importance under such circumstances.

Unconditional exemption should have been given to Robert Richard Bance, of 3 Tatan Road, Harlesden, a clerk employed by the Willesden Borough Council. He was registered as a conscientious objector during the present emergency, conditionally on his remaining in his present employment. The Tribunal subjected him to a great deal of badgering.

Judge Hargreaves — Does your objection extend to non-combatant work?

Bance—Yes, because I think A.R.P. work is a part of the war machine, and in connection with agricultural work I feel that in the present circumstances to indulge in that work, to which I am not suited, would be to assist in the war economy of the nation.

Sir Edmund Phipps—Doesn't the Willesden Borough Council do A.R.P. work like other Councils?

Bance—I don't do that work. I have already been asked to do gas training and I refused. I do statistics work in the Juvenile Employment Bureau.

Sir James Baillie—You don't object to assisting a Borough Council that is doing its best to enable citizens to carry on during the war?

Bance—Not if I am serving the community in a constructive way. If I happened to be a member of the Council I would state my views there.

But you are serving the Council?—Yes, but in a civic capacity.

Alderman S. H. Marshall—If you are willing to serve a body that is charged with the protection of the public in all circumstances you are part of it, you know that very well.

Bance—I showed my objection by refusing to do gas drill.

Sir James Baillie—In your work, are you arranging for the employment of people in factories that are working for the war?

Bance—Possibly.

Sir James—It is useful work, but you are stating a position you cannot maintain in actual practice. In fact you are assisting your Borough Council which is doing its best to help the community in time of war.

After further question and answer, Alderman Marshall said: You are really doing non-combatant work now."

George Thomas Plume, of Dunholme Green, N.9, was ordered to do civilian work, and to be trained as an accountant under the direction of the Minister of Labour. He stated that he was not willing to assist in doing any work for the national emergency, nor would he serve in the military machine. He had held Socialist opinions since he was fourteen years of age. Plume said in a long written statement:—

"I object to war on Socialist grounds. I claim that these grounds have a moral basis equally with religious or pacifist grounds. For me, it would be wrong either to kill or to maim, or to prepare to kill or to maim, my fellow-workers of other countries with whom I have no quarrel; or to become any part of the war machine, whose purpose is to defend and to advance Imperial interests which, as a Socialist, I am spending my life in striving to end."

Fenner Brockway spoke in support of Plume's sincerity.

The names of the following persons were removed from the register of conscientious objectors without qualification:—

(1) Peter St. John Lee, of Bark Place, Bayswater.
(2) Vincent N. Scannel, of Besant Road, London, S.E. 18.
(3) Phillip Reed, of Fawley Road, N.W.
(4) Thomas McNulty, a Scot, resident in London.
(5) Hugh John Philip Priest, of Duke's Ave., Chiswick.
(6) Kenneth F. R. Ball, of Holland Park Ave.
(7) William Thomas Finch, of Altrem Street North, London.
(8) Kenneth William Skeates, Windmere Rd., Ealing.

Lee said that conscription was intolerable. War was contrary to humanity, and it would be criminal for him to take any part in it. He did not believe in any peace society or church.

Scannel said that his uncle had been a C.O. The last war did not bring peace and he was not prepared to do anything in this war, not even assist the wounded. The Tribunal decided against Scannel because he admitted having bought a Red Cross button.

Philip Reed was accompanied by his father, Alfred Reed. The latter said he served four years in the R.A.M.C., and had described the horrors he had seen to his son. He concluded: "I have some photographs here of the last war. Here is one of a man of 17 with both his legs off."

Thomas McNulty said bluntly: "I refuse to fight a Capitalist war."

Ball declared—"I consider killing one of the greatest wrongs that one human being can do to another. . . . I prefer front line service, because I am not afraid to face death. But I must decline to serve one side. I would pick up the wounded from both sides equally. I am not prepared to discriminate between friend or foe."

"It appears," said the Chairman of the Tribunal, with the consent of his colleagues, "that Ball thinks that anyone may do as he likes."

Priest renounced war in 1936, as he became convinced then that he belonged to the larger association of the human race. The Tribunal declared that his objections were genuine but political and not conscientious.

Finch stated that his attitude was endorsed completely by his parents. He declined to consider any work that assisted war or involved the making of weapons of war. His father had served four years in the last war and was still suffering from war wounds. His father was no longer in favour of war.

Each of these objectors should have been granted unconditional exemption.

Here is a contrast—

Frederick Crandley is a cripple. His left leg is withered. He can walk a very little and only stand for a limited time. He was exempted from combatant service. He did not tell the Tribunal he was a cripple, only that he hated war and would not assist in any way.

Reginald William Bundle, of Walpole Road, Walthamstow, said that all that he was prepared to do was to pray for the country. His name was entered in the register without conditions.

The trouble that may have led to the change of attitude subsequently adopted by Swales began at the Sitting on November 1, when the Chairman announced that Henry Wythe, a G.W.R. clerk, of Inwood Road, Hounslow, would be removed from the register of conscientious objectors to be employed on non-combatant work only.

Wythe said that he was a member of the sect known as Jehovah's Witnesses. The Tribunal said that his religion did not exempt him from non-combatant service.

The public protested and shouted down the Court. When the outcry had died down Judge Hargreaves said:—

"If there are any more disturbances and bad manners I will have the gallery cleared. The public do not come here to amuse themselves and jeer and boo as their feelings dictate. If they do that they are guilty of bad manners and I will clear the court."

Thomas Jack Law, of Kilburn Park Road, N.W., called his father, a disabled ex-soldier, to speak for him. His father explained his present beliefs, and the beliefs in which he had reared his son, as follows:—

"War is filthy and contemptible. After having suffered in the hospital for five years, two years on my back, I determined that if ever I got out I would instruct my son under no conditions whatever to participate in such filthy, dirty work."

Replying to the Chairman, the father said he served in the Army in 1915:—

"I volunteered because I had a farm, and they said I was there to protect it from the Germans.

"After I came back I found it wasn't the Germans. It was the people I had gone to fight for."

This drew loud applause from the gallery. The public cheered again and again. This angered the Chairman and members of the Tribunal.

The Chairman—I will give the people in the gallery the opportunity to leave quietly, or I will adjourn the court so that these fellows will have to come back another day.

We can understand the Chairman objecting to applause. But where was his judicial dignity, in referring to applicants as "these fellows." A Chairman who speaks like this in court should be removed from his post immediately.

The gallery was cleared finally, at the request of the applicants, although we cannot understand why they should agree to a private hearing.

The Tribunal decided that Law should be registered as a conscientious objector, conditionally on getting agricultural or forestry work.

The same decision was given in the case of Thomas William Richardson, of Springfield Road, East Ham, whose father was killed in action during the Great War, after winning the M.C., the D.C.M., and the Russian Cross of St. George. Richardson is a Methodist preacher and the Rev. A. E. Binks supported his application.

"Five months after his father's death," said the minister, "this boy was born; and his mother instilled into him a hatred of war."

The public report of these scenes roused the interest of the Rev. C. G. Holland, Vicar of Ewell. He attended the proceedings day after day and sat in the public gallery, a silent, keen-faced observer. He concluded that objectors ought to be legally represented.

He considered that the demonstrations made in the gallery were entirely justified. "I am convinced," he told the Daily Herald, "that under existing conditions, young men do not get an opportunity to express themselves adequately."

He also protested against the methods of the Tribunal:—

"Although the number of members was stated to be five, there have on many occasions only been three, consisting of a judge, a professor of philosophy at Oxford, and a third evidently a local man.

"The chairman and the more active partner have peculiar views on the teaching and example of Christ. As this has been seen to play so vital a part, I would like as a priest to rebut many of their mistaken arguments.

"By the standards of these men Christian consciences of the objectors are being judged."

This means that Swales did not attend to protect the interest of working-class youth as regularly as he ought to have done.

LETTERS

Dear Comrade Editor,—It has been a pleasure to read the October WORD. This is the feeling of all comrades here. As this war progresses the real character of individuals will be revealed. No words can erase the betrayal of the socialist cause by the lying parliamentarians. To-day is a time of supreme test for the principles of the socialist since propaganda cannot stop the war. The result of the Clackmannanshire by-election gives an indication of the war mood of the masses. For the time being the struggle for emancipation has been arrested.

I believe now that one can only play an individual part in opposing war. The future history of our fight will record that humanity had to pass through barbarity twice in twenty years to see reason. Our ideals will not be held in vain.

With fraternal greetings,

Wood Green, London, N.22, October 26, 1939. ALEC KAYE.

Dear Comrade Editor,—I beg of you, as I did Fenner Brockway, to unite with every stop-the-war, anti-imperialist movement. There's a colossal power for good in this benighted country of ours, if only we can organise and get together more. Look at the P.P.U. in a few short years!

THE WORD is an excellent paper, with a lot of bite in it. As Mat Kavanagh says "More power to your elbow." I won't flatter you foolishly, but I do wish we had a few more men like you.

In all sincerity and friendship,

Kilburn, London, N.W.6., W. A. RATHKEY.

October 28, 1939.

Dear Sir,—If you should have any of the little books on John McLean, Martyr of the Class Struggle, which you wrote could you kindly send me two copies? I am an ex-serviceman, 47 years of age, but I became a Pacifist after the last great disaster. I used to listen to you at West Regent Street with great interest. I have been unemployed for 6 years. I wish we had a dozen John McLeans and a dozen Guy Aldreds. Of course, there was only one John McLean and there is only one Guy Aldred! Oh! how we should recognise their worth, those men who remained true to principle and kept out of the Westminster Gas House. What a debacle we are having now!

DUNCAN KELLY.

GLASGOW "CONCHIES" TRIBUNAL—

The Glasgow and West of Scotland Tribunal for conscientious objectors opened its proceedings at the Sheriff Court, Glasgow, on October 16. The members of the Tribunal were :—

(1) Sir ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL BLACK, K.C., O.B.E., Chairman; Sheriff of Lanarkshire; Sheriff of Stirling, 1933-37; Procurator for the Church of Scotland, 1936-37; Asst. Editor "Encyclopedia of the Laws of Scotland," 1926-34.

(2) Sir ROBERT BRUCE, LL.D., born 1871; on Glasgow Herald, 1894-1936; Editor in Chief since 1917.

(3) WM. LORIMER, O.B.E., born 1875; official of the Associated Blacksmith's Union since 1909; General Secretary since 1919.

(4) ROBERT BRYCE WALKER, C.B.E.; born 1873; Solicitor since 1896; County Clerk of Lanarkshire, 1923-1938.

(5) J. J. CRAIK HENDERSON, born 1890; Professor of Mercantile Law at Glasgow University since 1929; joined Royal Scots, 1914; Commissioned and served until 1919; Ex-chairman Hillhead Unionist Association.

The Trade Union representative on this Tribunal was futile, just like Andrew Clarke, the T.U. representative on the Edinburgh Tribunal, and Swales, the T.U. representative on the London Tribunal.

Since this Tribunal has completed its labours for the present, we are able to estimate its conclusions more fairly than would have been possible at one time. During part of the proceedings, the Sheriff Principal of Lanarkshire revealed little of that knowledge of the first principles of jurisprudence, or the rules of primary or secondary evidence, to be expected of such a learned jurist. Then he changed, and once more approached the matter in a manner worthy of an academic mind. He put aside bias and without question saw the conscientious objector's side in some cases that had to be considered on merit alone. He had the opportunity of proving himself a great lawyer and a useful social thinker. It is a pity that he did not seem equal to his task equally all the time. Where he failed to apply his legal capacity, he sinned less against the conscientious objectors, whatever their future struggle, than against the law of thought. This is the unpardonable offence, the crime or error of fundamental rectitude. The right of conscience is not a whimsical concession to cowardly intellects or sentmental minds, but a constitutional principle of democratic society. Conscience is more than an individual right. It is an integral principle of the social development. Finally, society must be built on conscience and not on power or force or violence of any description. Wherever the Sheriff Principal reasoned against his academic training, or permitted his colleagues to do so, he shamed the logic of his training, and warred against the integrity of his mind. Even the lay mind can sense the gravamen of such an error.

Sir Robert Bruce asked questions no editor should have advanced. As a trained and distinguished journalist, he ought to have known that many of his questions were contrary to fact and to truth. Journalists are supposed to know and to interpret the world. Alas! they only serve the world and so betray and deceive humanity.

Walker is a solicitor who fits into legal ruts, a man of routine mind. The academic training of such men fails them as soon as they become solicitors. They become mere general practitioners of law, licensed traders, governed by typewriters, forms, the Parliament House Book, and occasional references to the Faculty Digest. Thinking departs from them once they put up their legal name-plate. Yet Walker was party to some decisions that did the Tribunal honour. We would respond more heartily to this fact were it not that we are conscious of the persecution to be faced by the youths who have been rejected.

Professor Henderson would prove a jurist worthy of his academic training, if he were to lose his financial interests and could forget his Tory associations. He cannot depart from his position as a bulwark of a tottering social order long enough to pause to reflect legally and constitutionally. He should go to a real law school as a student, and learn what academic training really means. He has the honours and degrees. Some of the decisions show that he has the mind. But he should exercise jealously his great gifts, and so make his every decision worthy of his academic distinction. A jurist must never sicken in his reasoning approach to fine problems of law and understanding.

Few great doctors have held degrees or have been honoured or recognised by the medical association. Many have been outcast. The corner-stones of the temple are rejected. Few men of vision have been divines. The greatest of English jurists was not entitled to practise law. Jesus typifies the same truth. He was without scholarship and had no legal status of divinity. He scorned professional learning. The adjective applied and not the noun. The latter was deleted that the shadow might become the substance. Did not Hans Andersen immortalise this truth in a fairy-tale? When Henderson's conclusions were conventional and ungenerous, they upheld the criticism of Jesus. Where Henderson showed understanding, he vindicated not only his humanity but his law-standing.

The Glasgow Tribunal was sometimes right in making its decisions. Often, it approached the problem with an awkward feeling—it must not grant exemption. The Rev. T. J. Harvey, Minister of the Partick Baptist Church, attacked its power and sense of decision at the annual assembly in Glasgow of the Baptist Union of Scotland. He accused the Tribunal of war-mindedness.

"I think that something should be done about this," Mr. Harvey told the Assembly. "I have attended this Tribunal, and I have noticed that all the members of the Tribunal are for war."

A delegate shouted "Question."

Mr. Harvey—There is no doubt about it. I have listened to the questions which the Tribunal members put to the lads who come before them. I think something should be done to ensure that those with conscientious principles should not be called upon to fight. We are all out for liberty of conscience.

The first three days' hearings of the Tribunal were October 16, 18, 19. During that period 59 cases were heard with results that fully justified the Rev. T. J. Harvey's criticism. The decisions were :—

Non-Combatant Service	26
National Service of a Civilian Nature	15
Entered on the Military Register	11
Unconditional Exemption	7

These results were recorded during what threatened to be the best period of the Tribunal hearings. After the first day, the Tribunal became, for a while, with certain rare exceptions, hostile to the applicants. Recruiting and open-attack became the order on the second and third days. After that the Tribunal ceased to enquire into the sincerity of the applicant, and conceived it to be a duty to persuade, guide, or command the applicants into some form of service. The youths, unused to the atmosphere of a court room, were subjected to ironic humour, which amounted almost to open brow-beating. Before closing its sittings, the Tribunal recovered its integrity and consideration.

One applicant from Partick, named Ross, had his case considered on its merit, without any unfair questioning. He was put at his ease and questioned pertinently. A thorough desire was shown to understand his viewpoint. At the end he was granted total exemption and thanked for answering the questions honestly and fearlessly. Not merely the decision, but the manner of the Tribunal in this case, did credit to every member.

Superficially, the first day's proceedings offered few grounds for complaint. Fundamentally, we think that it was open to grave objections. The first case decided only took a few minutes to decide. Total exemption was granted to A. W. Murdoch, "Morven," Tower Drive, Gourock; David Alexander Kennedy, 15 Blackwood Street, Barrhead, who described himself as a "pacifist propagandist and lecturer in the technique of non-violence"; his brother, John Kennedy; and David A. Murray, 4 Dalcross Street, Glasgow.

The Sheriff-Principal insisted on the oath being taken. This is an abuse of process whatever the regulations. In 1916 the applicant could be accompanied and represented by anyone he wished. He could speak on his own behalf, as a reasoner, which is another matter from oath-taking or affirmation. Only evidence, and strictly evidence, should be given in this fashion. The decision should rest with the applicant, to his peril maybe, and not with the Tribunal.

David Kennedy protested against the absurdity of taking the oath. But he took it, although not in the most respectful way. He averred that he had no objection to taking it. As a Christian, Kennedy ought to have known that Jesus forbade his disciples to swear, and declared that they must say "Yea" or "Nay." Why did not Kennedy uphold the Christian principle in this matter? It would have been dignified and true and would have become his stand.

Kennedy based his objection on three grounds : (1) Christian; (2) Humanitarian; (3) Ordinary Common Sense. He said that war was "just daft."

John Kennedy objected to work of national importance, because it was directed towards helping the military machine.

Sheriff-Principal—Would you refuse to eat bread provided for you at the risk of other men's lives?—No, I would not, because I was born into this society and cannot withdraw from it.

Bryce Walker—Assuming that the hosiery factory in which you are employed were for the service of the troops, would you feel compelled to leave that employment?—Yes.

Asked if he were a member of any religious body, he said he was not, but he was a Christian.

If the Kennedy decisions were correct, as we hold they were, the questionings put to other applicants, and the comments made by the members of the Tribunal on the replies received, were wrong completely.

Murray contended that his conscience was a moral law greater than that of the State. The Tribunal treated him with consideration and respect. Which only means that those less educated and less classically-minded than Murray should be represented. Even the dumb may be conscientious.

Sir Archibald Black—Can this law to which you refer not be described as high-grade materialism or is it more than materialism?—May I define it as moral intuition?

The applicant obeyed the Christian ethics without embracing the Christian faith. He had not yet made up his mind on religion, but contended that his pacifism was a faith.

The Sheriff—Is it?

"We are none of us concerned whether your beliefs are right or wrong," Sir Archibald pointed out. "What we are concerned with is the sincerity behind those beliefs. I may say we are extremely interested in your arguments."

Replying to the Sheriff that his belief prohibited him from taking part even in non-combatant military service, Murray said he did not desire that others should fight for him while he did work of national importance or of a non-combatant nature.

The Sheriff—Suppose there was an air raid and people were injured, would you regard it as wrong and contrary to your beliefs to give the injured any assistance?—If I did so in a casual way I would do what I could to prevent human beings from suffering, and that would be an end to it. But if I joined some body, civil or military, to alleviate suffering in war-time I would be to some extent supporting the war.

Questioned regarding civil work of national importance, Murray said if he took such work he would be doing the least possible for the prosecution of the war, and yet he would be supporting the war.

The Sheriff—You would rather go the whole way than quarter-way?—Yes.

The Tribunal retired to consider its decision. On its return the Chairman announced that Murray had been granted total exemption. "The Tribunal," said the Sheriff, "have considered your case, and we think that it is an exceptional one."

Other persons to whom the Tribunal granted total exemption included:—J. Robinson, 15a George Street, Port Glasgow, a Roman Catholic, who stressed his ethical objection to war and claimed to be a true Roman Catholic; E. Steele, a missionary student, living at 74 Bellville Street, Greenock; and E. G. Nairns, 22 Clouston Street, Glasgow, who declared that his convictions had led him to become a vegetarian.

Unconditional exemption was granted also to Peter McNaughton, of Orr Street, Glasgow. He read his case in a low voice from a sheet of foolscap:—

"I am a conscientious objector to military service because my home life has forced me to realise the horror of war.

"My father served in the last war and lost his reason as a result. He has been in an asylum ever since, and does not even know he has a son.

"I have my reason and I want to keep it. I am not pleading hardship, although I am an only child and support my mother. It is impossible to believe in God as a common father of mankind and yet to go out and kill my fellow men—my brothers in the sight of God."

The decision was given in this case without questioning. The conclusion, and the manner of giving it, did the Tribunal honour. The story behind the application is simple and tragic—a sidelight on the meaning of war. Private Peter McNaughton, of the King's Own Scottish Borderers, served almost throughout the Great War, and left the Army for a mental home in 1918. He has been there ever since and does not know his only son, born in the last days of 1918.

A. Day, 17 Dempster Street, Greenock; J. Brown, 71 Stratford Street, Maryhill; and H. A. Brown of 43 Gateside Street, Hamilton, were granted conditional exemption, provided each remained in his present trade.

Day stated that he was employed with J. G. Kincaid & Co. He was not employed in war-work, but was helping to built merchant ships.

Bryce-Walker—But these are surely necessary for the conduct of the war?

Day—They also can be used in time of peace.

Brown turned down a job as professional footballer at £8 per week because playing football was not consistent with his religion. His father told the Tribunal that his son had been offered 30s. a game by a football club when he was only 14½ years of age. He refused all offers because of his religious views.

"On the Sunday night he was converted," the father added, "he had to go to Aberdeen to play in a schools international match on the following Saturday. His whole outlook on life was completely changed and he did not go."

"I believe the cause of war is sin," Brown said, "and God abhors it. Therefore I cannot participate in anything directly or indirectly associated with it."

"I have not kicked a football since leaving school," Brown told a reporter afterwards. It is against all my belief and I have refused to sign up with clubs. I would rather be a bricklayer and obey my conscience."

It may not make much practical difference to Brown, but it is our view that he ought to have been placed on the register of conscientious objectors unconditionally.

J. Brown, an apprentice engineer fitter, should have received total exemption also. His statement carried its own evidence of truthfulness, as the reader can see from reading it in full:—

"As a child of ten I used to watch soldiers in nearby barracks. I would have a funny feeling and run away, and maybe a few days later I would go back.

"When I watched the soldiers drilling I had a feeling that they were like a lot of animals rather than men.

"Looking through a gate and seeing them drilling and marching and training sort of gave me a feeling that they were not human. I used to get frightened."

The following non-combatant decisions condemned the Tribunal rather than the applicants:

(1) J. Mitchell, 106 Crookston Drive, Ralston, Renfrewshire.
(2) J. A. Boyd, 207 Bonkle Road, Newmains.
(3) A. C. Hamilton, 253 Orbiston Street, Glasgow.
(4) R. McCallum, c/o Battison, 38 Eldon Street, Greenock.

In each case, total exemption should have been granted.

Mitchell is the son of a man who was a conscientious objector to the last war. The father said he was proud of his son's refusal to be a soldier. The only permanent result of war was graveyards. Mitchell based his refusal on humanitarian, moral, and pacifist grounds. Mitchell stated he had not decided yet his religion as there were so many beliefs. Man was the most inhuman animal that existed.

Boyd had these questions, among others, fired at him by the Tribunal:—

"Is it a matter of utter indifference to you if this country goes down in ruins, so long as your personal salvation is secure?"

"Is it your view that all the soldiers and sailors and airmen in H.M. Forces are not true Christians?"

These questions cannot be defended.

Hamilton declared—"I regard militarism as a mad, insane machine."

McCallum is a member of the Y.M.C.A. and a worker in the Christian Endeavour movement. He would resign from the Y.M.C.A. if called upon to assist in any work of providing comforts for soldiers. All military work was contrary to the teaching of Christ. He would not work in the R.A.M.C. because that was preparing soldiers to go back into the firing lines. He would do what he could to help a man injured in an air raid. What he did afterwards was none of the applicant's business. It would have made no difference to the act of the Good Samaritan if it transpired that the man he helped had resisted the robbers with force.

McCallum's answers were simple, true and direct. His reply was exactly the same as that of David Murray and the Kennedys. When he told the Tribunal that he would not help the State to prosecute war, he was accused of taking advantage of the food and other things provided for him by men who served the State. The Chairman commented: "It looks to me a little like making the best of both worlds."

If this taunt were correct, it is the unanswerable reply to every conchie. Actually, war destroys food and menaces the amenities of civilisation.

We pass to some of those who should have been granted unconditional exemption, but were placed on the military register without qualification:—

(1) J. A. Murray, Rock View House, Maryhill.
(2) J. H. Kier, 317 Wellshot Road, Shettleston.
(3) R. Rankine, 110 Cornwall Street, Glasgow.
(4) F. G. Boag, 59 Brawhirley Road, Greenock.
(5) D. R. Jamieson, 56 Old Dumbarton Road, Glasgow.
(6) S. W. Irving, Kilmory, Adele Street, Motherwell.
(7) Albert Begg, 73 Orchard Park Avenue, Giffnock.
(8) J. M. Logan, 50 Stewart Drive, Clarkston, Glasgow.
(9) J. McLaren, 62 Copland Road, Glasgow.

J. A. Murray was prepared to do nothing but pray "for the removal of the spirit of war." The London Tribunal granted total exemption to R. W. Bundle, who adopted exactly the same attitude.

Kier declared that he had no quarrel with the people whose lives he was being asked to take. They were absolutely innocent, and he would not take arms against them. It was sometimes necessary to take the life of an individual. He owed a greater allegiance to the human race than to his country.

Answering Sir Robert Bruce, Kier said:—

"I think of all evils the results of war are the worst. I do not think any evil that would result from passive resistance to an enemy would be comparable to the evils resulting through war."

Rankine had the last word to the Tribunal: "I'm not joining up anyway."

Boag stated his views very clearly. He described work of national importance as industrial conscription. He would appeal against the Tribunal's decision, and in the end, if necessary, resist. He was determined, as a Christian, to resist war uncompromisingly.

Jamieson wounded Sir Robert Bruce's delicate feelings about the League of Nations. He declared that the League was forgotten and that international regeneration could come, not from war, but only through a League of Nations.

Sir Robert Bruce—The League of Nations is not quite moribund!

Irving startled the Chairman. He averred that a State could find argument always for legal murder.

Sir A. C. Black—Would you ask for the assistance of the police if you were attacked by a gang?

Irving—That is quite an interesting point you have raised. Yes, I would!

Sir A. C. Black—Why?

Irving—In return for taxation I am entitled to police protection.

Irving won the argument but lost his case.

Logan was placed on the military register for his fearless logic. In addition to holding strong anti-war views, Logan objected as a Scots Nationalist, on the following grounds:—

"The Armed Forces Act is not constitutional in Scotland for three reasons.

"The Parliament by which it was enacted exists by virtue of the Treaty of Union. Every important clause of the Treaty of Union has been broken repeatedly in letter and spirit. Therefore this Parliament has destroyed the Treaty by reason of which it has jurisdiction over Scotland and has thereby destroyed its jurisdiction.

"The Scottish people are entitled to refuse obedience to its enactments.

"The Act is further in violation of Section 18 of the Treaty of Union, which expressly requires that no alteration can be made in laws concerning private rights in Scotland except by separate legislation for Scotland for evident utility of the subjects within Scotland.

"The Act is further unconstitutional because it imposes obligations on Scottish citizens which are not equally imposed on all other parts of the United Kingdom, contrary to the Treaty of Union.

"I am an advocate of Scottish independence. I believe that the United Kingdom has been dissolved by reason of the repeated breaches of the Treaty of Union.

"I do not regard myself as a subject of the so-called United Kingdom, but as a Scottish citizen, owing no allegiance to the King of England. I cannot and will not take the military oath of allegiance, or submit myself to any military or other authority constituted by the Government of the so-called United Kingdom.

"I do not recognise the right, legal or moral, of this Tribunal to pronounce judgment on my sincerity on this matter, nor do I acknowledge their jurisdiction over me. In appearing before this Tribunal I do so only as a courtesy."

McLaren offended the Tribunal with his naiveness. He declared that God had sent him a divine command to resist war and military service.

Professor Craik Henderson—How did you get these instructions?

McLaren—They came to me in a dream.

Craik Henderson—Did God send you to the No-Conscription League?

McLaren—Yes; to get their legal help!

Which was unanswerable. To prove it was not God who sent him, the Tribunal turned the application down.

Here are some Tribunal odds and ends, cited without relation to decisions.

J. A. Doherty, 17 Church Street, Uddingston, objected to taking part in war, or in civil measures for the prosecution of the war.

Professor J. J. Craik-Henderson—What is your job?—I work in a department which deals in dress shirts.

Professor Henderson—If you were put in a department dealing with khaki shirts you would resign?—Yes.

In another case, the Chairman attacked an applicant for reading Tolstoy, and asked if he had read John Knox's "Book of Discipline." He styled John Knox a great writer, whereas John Knox is unreadable. Knox may be a great and fearless character. He was neither thinker nor writer. Tolstoy was a thinker and writer and an immortal.

The Chairman asked:—

"Then why must you go stravaiging among foreign writers, and never give a thought to our own great writers?"

John Knox got his creed from stravaiging after a foreigner, a persecuting and most undesirable foreigner, John Calvin. The latter boasted, quite wrongly, of stravaiging after another foreigner much admired by Sir Archibald Black, but not respected too strictly—Jesus called Christ since his death!

The applicant apologised, being young, to his bullying elders, to the scoffers in high place, as the Psalmist would say:—

"It was purely an accident took me to Tolstoy, but no accident ever took me near John Knox."

It was not an accident that took him to Tolstoy, but circumstance, commonsense, and opportunity. It would require a calamity to take one near John Knox. The result would be complete catastrophe.

Questions that ought never to have been asked and incidents that ought not to have happened are these:—

"Do you think a municipality is justified in maintaining a police force?"

"Must I answer that question?"

Sheriff-Principal—"Refuse at your peril."

Two observations by the Tribunal:—

"It is the duty of a citizen to be loyal to the throne."

"Of course, Parliament may take away your conscientious objection."

The first statement is a fallacy. The duty of the citizen is to be loyal to his own thought.

Parliament can never take away conscience.

W. Ramsay, 43 Exeter Drive, Glasgow, was granted total exemption. Sir Robert Bruce asked what he would do if he was a Dutchman living in Holland. Would he do nothing at all to help to repel the invaders?

The applicant replied that he would do nothing.

Sir Robert—What would your attitude be?

Applicant—Passive resistance.

Sir Robert—What help would that be?

Applicant—If everybody adopted passive resistance there would be no invaders.

Sir Robert—How would you defend yourself?

Applicant—I would register a strong protest.

The Tribunal displayed humour, understanding and good-nature in the case of R. McBurnie, Orchard Cottage, Ruthwell, Dumfries, who requested:—

"If you cannot grant me my liberty, by which I mean my freedom of conscience, then I ask you to sentence me to death so that I may die with a clear conscience."

After concluding his appeal, McBurnie said:—

"If you are not going to sentence me to death I would like to catch a train leaving St. Enoch at 5.20."

McBurnie was granted unconditional registration as a conscientious objector. Professor J. J. Craik Henderson told him:—

"We will try to meet your request, but we cannot sentence you to death."

GLASGOW SECULAR SOCIETY—Meets in the McLellan Galleries, every Sunday, 6.30 p.m. Readers should attend the meetings of this organisation and so strengthen the cause of Free Thought, Free Speech, Free Press, and Radicalism of Individual Right and Civil Liberty. Members of Glasgow S.S. support the C.O's. and all friends of liberty should rally to the Glasgow S.S.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Sir,—I attended all three meetings which you addressed while in Aberdeen and intended speaking to you at your last meeting (outdoor) but interruptions were considerable and darkness beginning to fall, so that I felt obliged to leave. Will you therefore accept by gratitude for the service you are rendering the common people and for Peace?

I am a member of the Peace Pledge Union, but I often feel disheartened, because I think that we do not work hard enough. I am not sure if I express myself very well, but I agreed with your criticism of Canon Morris—I do think that if one is against war one should not dabble in Red Cross work or such like; which seems to me as though one apologised for one's pacifism. Our attitude should ever be that of a courageous stand—we are right, militarists are wrong.

I lose no opportunity of spreading THE WORD. May I congratulate you on such an excellent paper. I never read a better one, and have converted quite a few by showing them statistics regarding pensions for Brass Hats in comparison with the rank and file, contained in the June issue.

Such a title too! A delicious satire on Bible-thumpers—THE WORD!

With renewed thanks for your lectures,

(Mrs.) ISOBEL KNIGHT.

Aberdeen, October 17, 1939.

[*This letter should have been published before our November visit to Aberdeen. The nerves of our former printer threw all the organisation's plans out of joint.—Ed.]

My Dear Friend,—Just to let you know I am still alive . . .

I take PEACE NEWS weekly and am glad to know you are still carrying on with your noble work. What a rotten crowd the labour fakirs have proved to be. Just what you prophesied 35 years ago when you denounced the Rev. Ramsay Mac. and the Rev. Philip Snowden.

I met Fred Howard last August in Hyde Park and had a long chat with him. He seems to have a great respect for you. He wrote to me the next day explaining why he went astray owing to the labour bosses of those times.

I thank you for THE WORD. You must feel very proud of your Army Discharge. What a fighter for righteousness you have proved to be!

I founded a Newbury Socialist Church here some years ago but could not carry on owing to the difficulty in finding a hall. Newbury is a Tory stronghold and I have been boycotted in my business a great deal.

I expect you have given Andrew Stewart a good lecture on the futility of parliamentary action.

With every good wish,

London, October 25, 1939. S. J. WILLCOCK.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—So far as I can gather from the reports given to me re the London Tribunal, Swales, the ex-T.U.C. chairman, has not helped the C.O's. very much. Hargreaves, the Judge, considering his bias, at first, endeavoured to show understanding and to be courteous. Later, his behaviour almost moved me to madness. A trained County Court Judge taking the rise out of youngsters of 20!

Best wishes to all Scots comrades,

Willesden, N.W.10., November 7. C. JONES.

Dear Guy,—I am on the "dole," and look like remaining so, at my age, and with my reputation. The chances for work are small. The only advantage is, I have time to work for the cause. Never was it more necessary to do so. I still stick to open-air propaganda and command good crowds, in spite of the weather and other adverse conditions.

Our little group of the N.C.L. contends that the organisation should be known as The Workers' Rights League, because:—

(1) Conscription is now the law, and the name, N.C.L., is a misnomer.
(2) Issues of equal importance, and of a clearer nature, will arise. We must have an organisation to cope with them. The N.C.L. should give birth to that organisation. Owing to their war policies, the Labour Party and the I.L.P. are discredited. We have clear and definite views, and we have urged them throughout the crisis.
(3) The program of the Workers' Rights League must be definitely Anti-Parliamentary.

Of course, if the majority of the organisation insist on the N.C.L., we will accept that decision.

The C.P. commands no respect. This leaves the field open for real revolutionary activity. It is a strange thing and has puzzled me a lot. Men leave the Labour Party to join the I.L.P., or become Anarchists. Sometimes they drift back, but they never lose contact entirely. Bolshies, as a rule, once they leave the C.P., seem to drift out of the movement altogether.

I hope and expect an article from you on the Pollitt incident. How completely consistent the whole affair is with the policy of the Party line! Another Moscow trial—in Britain! "The dog returns to its vomit." "I will," says the culprit, "with all due humiliation, cover myself with sack-cloth and ashes and eat my words. Whatever thou sayest, Holy Father Stalin, is right. In the true interests of Our Most Holy Church, I confess that I did wrong in having an opinion of my own. I should have changed my views three times in three days, as required by the Party Dictatorship from Moscow. I renounce my manhood for my weekly salary."

The rank and file of the Communist Party, who can follow such a leadership, are not worth converting or defending. They deserve to be conscripted and shot as soon as possible. The men of good records in the working-class struggle were attracted towards the C.P. in the early days of the organisation. Now, these seem to have faded away.

Clare Jones was down here last Sunday. Very fine open-air meeting. Last night we held a "Mock Tribunal." There was a good audience and much appreciation.

Jones and your son are coming down here soon, to give a hand on the front. We are making headway slowly. But what a fight it has been, since you and I spoke together in Liverpool, full of enthusiasm in 1906.

All good wishes,

MATT KAVANAGH.

Southend-on-Sea, November 10.

Dear Comrade,—I hope the next issue of THE WORD will publish a report of the success of the splendid meeting we had at the Belmont Cinema, addressed by Comrade Ethel MacDonald. The meeting was a rousing one. Comrade Fraser MacIntosh was in the chair. It is a pity that the Socialist movement has so few members of Ethel MacDonald's calibre. We, of the Aberdeen I.L.P., are hoping that she will be able to return soon to the Silver City to speak under our auspices.

We have been doing good propaganda work. Oliver Brown, P.P.U., spoke jointly under our auspices and those of the P.P.U. in another anti-war demonstration. A resolution was carried against Emergency Powers Regulations.

I have been urging the local branch of the N.C.L. to go ahead with its activity. Our branch of the I.L.P. is thoroughly loyal to the N.C.L. and is willing to grant the complete use of the Belmont Cinema on any Sunday, or to arrange a joint meeting. Since Bailie Tom Kerr of Glasgow opposed the last war, and maintains such consistent opposition to-day, although Senior Magistrate of Glasgow, we would like him to visit Aberdeen. We have advertised John McGovern as an anti-war speaker.

Please deal vigorously with Bailie Jones.

Yours in the Struggle,

JOHN S. THOMSON,

Propaganda Secretary, Aberdeen I.L.P.

Aberdeen, November 1.

Dear Sir,—The enclosed pamphlets may be of interest to you, perhaps. It is unfortunate that monetary reform should so often have been regarded as a rival to, or substitute for Socialism. The real fact is that it is something essential to the production of the best results under any political and social system, and any organisation of industry.

Make any use you like of the literature I send. There is no copyright.

Yours truly,

EDITOR'S PERSONAL APPEAL

This appeal is written in the first person single, instead of the editorial plural. It is a direct personal appeal from the editor to his readers.

The copy for the November issue was returned to me by the printers. They had omitted to place their imprint on a leaflet issued by the N.C.L., and were fined £5 in consequence and informed that they could have been fined £25,000. From the letter, dated November 9, accompanying the return of the M.SS. I extract this paragraph :—

"Sorry we could not print this, as everything of this nature would be suspect at the present time, as instance them serving a summons because of no imprint on a leaflet for The West of Scotland No Conscription League, whereby we are liable to a fine not exceeding £25,000.

As I could not find a printer, it became necessary to establish an independent press. The expense has been heavy. I ask comrades to help. A printing press has no meaning if the right to print what one feels is true is barred. The press is the engine of freedom and not of silent acquiescence in authority. It produced the Bible against authority in the days of Wycliffe and later. It produced the thought of Thomas Paine and pioneered Radicalism, Rationalism, and Free-thought in the glorious days of Richard Carlile and his brave shopmen and shopwomen. It must not be betrayed to-day.

The "Conchie" question is so important, the usual 8 pages are not sufficient space in which to do justice to the facts. Hence the present 12-paged issue. Even on the 8-paged issue, to date, I have incurred a loss of £70. In addition, there is maintained a postal mission which makes contact throughout Britain and is unifying the movement. About £30 has been spent on this postal mission since May. I think readers should make up this £100 deficit now. This will enable me to enlarge the paper permanently.

I appeal to readers to send along addresses of possible new readers and subscribers. Papers are sent gladly. It is spreading The Word!

Reports were published in the June issue of the police court proceedings in the Hyde Park case. I conducted the appeal in person in the High Court of King's Bench. The behaviour of the Lord Chief Justice (Hewart) and his two colleagues, recalled the behaviour of Richard Carlile's judges, and Karl Marx's censure of these dignatories. The Labour and Socialist movement in London did not support this struggle for civil liberties in Hyde Park. I lost the fight for ordinary propaganda rights, which affects all thinkers, because I stood alone, unbacked by any public opinion. I had to pay four fares to London specially for this case. My law reports cost £2 2s. Without these I could not have argued. The fine was £2. I had to pay £1 15s. to the Police Court and £2 to the High Court expenses.

The costs of the Treasury, which I had to pay, and for which I hold the receipt, were £33 16s. 3d. This makes a total outlay as follows :—

Court Costs and Fines	£5	15	0
Treasury Costs	33	16	3
Personal Expenses	22	2	0
Total Expenses	£61	13	3

To cover the losses on this paper, on the postal mission, and on these London Law proceedings, I appeal for a sum of £166 13s. 3d. Acknowledgments will be made in these columns.

BOURNEMOUTH REGISTRATION CASE

The Bournemouth Daily Echo for November 20, 1939, published the following account of local police court prosecution :—

"MAN WHO REFUSED TO FILL UP FORM.
"Remarkable Letter Read in Court.
"Bench Decision: £5 Fine—or Month in Gaol.
"NATIONAL REGISTRATION CASE AT BOURNEMOUTH.

"A remarkable letter writtten by a young man who refused to complete the war-time national registration form was read in Bournemouth Police Court to-day.

"Michael O'Daye, 820 Christchurch Road, Bournemouth, pleaded guilty to committing a breach of the National Registration Act, 1939, by not making a return of the persons residing at the address of September 29th, although he was responsible for doing so.

"Mr. H. W. Rodd, of the Bournemouth Corporation, said it was necessary for the head of the house or the person acting as head of the house to make the return; and defendant had not done so, despite reasonable efforts to make him. Section 3 made it an offence to fail to comply with the regulations.

"Miss Wilkins, national registration clerk at the Town Hall, said no return was received; so O'Daye was sent another form in case he had lost the original—but no reply was received and a "reminder" letter was sent. He replied, refusing to fill in the form.

"Ronald George Dominey, the enumerator responsible for the district concerned, said that defendant handed him back the blank form and refused to sign it.

"Mr. Rodd then read a letter which defendant wrote to the National Registration Officer. It ran:

"'In reply to your communication in connection with National Registration, please note that I decline to complete the form, as I regard refusal to do so in some measures as an individual gesture of protest demonstrating that some few of us at least are determined to express our unwillingness to co-operate in the war schemes of the Government.

"'In itself such action, I am aware, carries comparatively little weight, but as a gesture, especially at the present time, acts such as this may be of untold value . . .'

"O'Daye told the Bench that he had nothing further to add to his letter. He was still of the same opinion as when he wrote the letter.

"The chairman (Mr. R. W. Poultney) said that defendant's excuse was a poor one.

"Defendant—'As I wrote in my letter, it was the only way I could voice my protest.'

"The Bench imposed a fine of £5.

"Defendant asked whether he had the alternative of going to prison instead of paying the fine.

"Chairman—Yes—one month.

"Defendant was about to make another statement when the Clerk asked the police to take him away, and he left the court in custody."

O'Daye's letter is not remarkable. It savours of old time Radicalism and Anti-Militarism. It expresses the democratic right of the individual to think and to protest.

"CONCHIE" COMMENT

At the Bristol Tribunal, on Wednesday, November 15, the Rev. E. J. Blythe, minister of the Brislington Congregational Church, handed the Tribunal a letter from the Rev. S. M. Berry, D.D., general secretary of the Congregational Union, stating that Mr. Hore-Belisha, Minister of War, had given him a verbal assurance that the position of young conscientious objectors wishing to join the R.A.M.C. would be safeguarded if they first registered as objectors and then offered their services.

Judge Wethered, the chairman, with his usual impartial cautiousness, pointed out that the Tribunal's only power under the Statute was to direct that an applicant should be registered for non-combatant duties. The rest was a matter for the Army authorities.

Arthur Masson, Chanterland Avenue, Hull, member of the British Union of Fascists, applied for exemption to the North-East Regional Tribunal at Hull. He conscientiously objected to participating in the present war, which he considered unjust. He would fight for the country if it became the victim of aggression. Judge Stewart removed Masson's name from the C.O. register, and stated: "This is not a case of a man possessed of genuine conscientious objection."

But is not refusal to participate in a war one considers unjust a conscientious objection?

The Rev. H. Marsden, Hawick New Chapel, writes in the Manchester Guardian, November 17 last :—

"I am a Nonconformist minister and an ex-N.C.O. of the Manchester Regiment. I was a theological student during the last war. Many of us (men of my own generation and outlook) believe that the total reservation of theological students is unreasonable. I myself do not agree that clergy or ministers should be exempt from military service. If young ministers and theological students are pacifists (as many hundreds are) they should take their turn at the C.O. tribunals. I am not, of course, speaking against their pacifism but simply against their total immunity."

Which is correct. The clergy ought not to be exempt.

WALTER STRICKLAND: Friend of Liberty

A MEMORY: Being the story of a Press report

Walter William Strickland, B.A., Trinity College, Cambridge, Ninth Baronet, and first to decline to use the title, was born at Westminster, London, on May 26, 1851. He died at Buitenzorg, Java, on August 9, 1938. During the last 29 years of his life, I was his only intimate English correspondent and confidant. There were serious quarrels on matters of principle and policy; breaks and reconciliations. I became Strickland's publisher and secretary. Forseeing the war, Strickland addressed, what proved to be his last letter to me, from "Buitenzorg, Java, Asia, December 14, 1937." This was an appeal to scientists and savants to stop "This March of Homicide." This letter was published in The Malton Messenger for April 8, 1939. It was abridged slightly by The Varsity, the Cambridge University paper, for May 13. Reference was made to this letter in the June 1939 Word. It is my aim to reprint and to broadcast this stirring call against war.

Walter Strickland addressed his first letter to me from Paris, in September, 1909. Never was a letter more welcome.

A few months before, the Liberal Government had suppressed Shyamaji Krishnavarma's paper, The Indian Sociologist. I did not subscribe to bourgeois Indian Nationalism. Nor did I subscribe to British Imperialism. I was a Socialist and wished to see a Socialist confederation of the world, organised according to best Republican interests of humanity, centralised or decentralised as Liberty and well-being of humanity everywhere directed. This was something different from nationalism, even in the best idealist conception of Mazzini and Garibaldi. I did not believe in nationalism but I did believe in Freedom of Speech, Thought, and Press. I believed in the unlicensed liberty of opinion. With Auberon Herbert, I held that there should be no restraint on the press, either as regards outlook, or even taste. I did not believe in the power-ghosts of blasphemy, heresy and sedition.

When the printer of The Indian Sociologist was arrested and imprisoned, after making contrite apology; and the Attorney-General had boasted that never again would the paper appear in Britain; and The Times, the Old Mother Hubbard of Printing House Square, had hiccoughed agreement; I thought it was time someone disturbed this dangerous complacency of the great and the entrenched. So I wrote to Krishnavarma and published the paper, without fee or reward. I charged exactly what I paid the printer, whose name was never revealed. No more. No less.

In due course I was arrested, tried, and sentenced to 12 months in the First Division. This sentence was served in Brixton Prison, London.

Since 1905 I had been associated with the Social Democratic Federation. Although I left the party in 1906, and gave up my parliamentary notes for Justice, I contributed odd articles to the paper exposing Imperialism. I was active in the Anarchist movement, since I had become an Anti-Parliamentarian. At the time of my arrest, I had intimates in both groups. When sentence was passed, Anarchist and Social Democrat alike used their press to repudiate me, and to declare that I represented no one but myself. They were unanimous in employing the very phrase, although there was no obvious collusion between them. The mediocrity of their common outlook rendered collusion unnecessary. I have represented myself ever since. Perhaps, one day, such a small minority will prove to be at one with the majority of the oppressed, roused at last to revolt against politician, divine, and careerist. I was repudiated. A word of friendship and of cheer was needed urgently. That word came, out of the void, from—Walter Strickland!

WALTER W. STRICKLAND

Strickland sent me a letter of appreciation and suggested a life-friendship. He said he had bought a Daily Mail in Paris and an English friend had drawn his attention to the report of the Police Court proceedings. He enclosed the cutting, which the Prison Governor graciously passed on to me. Strickland had written a covering letter to the Governor, with the special request that it should be handed to "Guy Aldred, an Englishman who believes in conserving the abandoned Radical English traditions of Liberty and Justice."

The enclosed cutting was culled from the Daily Mail, for August 27, 1909. It read as follows:—

"INDIAN SEDITION

"PUBLISHER AT BOW STREET

"The Indian Sociologist

"A youth of twenty-two stood in the dock at Bow-street yesterday charged with seditious libel. He is Guy Alfred Aldred, the publisher of the "Indian Sociologist," the journal which is edited "safely from Paris," Mr. Bodkin said, by Mr. Krishnavarma. The defendant wore a Norfolk suit with knickerbockers, and throughout the day's hearing was keenly interested, taking voluminous notes on foolscap sheets.

"Mr. Curtis Bennett was the magistrate. During part of the proceedings Sir Charles Mathews, Director of Public Prosecutions was in court. Mr. Bodkin conducted the case for the Treasury. The police were represented by Superintendent Lewis, Chief Inspector McCarthy, and Inspector Ryley. No natives of India were in court.

"Aldred when placed in the dock looked round repeatedly towards where his young wife sat . . .

"Mr. Bodkin made an impressive speech, at considerable length, in which he laid stress on the gravity of the alleged offence. He explained that as a measure of precaution the "Indian Sociologist had been treated as a newspaper, and under the statutes action had been taken only after leave was given by a judge in chambers. The prosecution would disclose some very serious matters in regard to the dissemination of seditious prints in this country and elsewhere. The publication was done deliberately by the defendant after warning, and done by him not merely as a printer but as a writer also of some seditious matter in the paper.

"Counsel described the defendant as living at 35 Stanlake-street, Shepherd's Bush, and known by the name of Guy A. Aldred, of the Bakunian Press—whatever that might mean—and was a person, as appeared from the publication, who held seditious views. He was an associate of Anarchists in London, and, counsel observed, 'he thinks he has some journalistic capacity.'"

This Daily Mail account of the preliminary police court proceedings was responsible for an association that did not end even with Sir Walter Strickland's death. To-day, the task of editing Strickland's writings, compiling his biography, and making known his Anti-Militarist message to the world is in my hands, because a Daily Mail reporter so vividly pictured my stand in the dock. I should be grateful.

In interviews, and also in a special article in The Malton Messenger, I have recalled how Strickland wrote that the names of Strickland and Aldred had been associated together in the days of Cromwell. He referred me to Thomas Carlyle, for the story of those stirring days. His ancestor, also Sir Walter Strickland, and a Colonel Aldred, had been close colleagues on the side of Parliament against the King. Another Colonel Aldred had turned Communist, and so left the Cromwellian Army, finding salvation in the views of Winstanley the Digger. In the previous generation, their uncle, another Aldred, had described the scene when the Commons challenged the King. Strickland expressed the hope that I would remain loyal to the struggle for social freedom until I died, and that the names of Strickland and Aldred might be associated again, and finally, in the task of battling towards peace, commonweal and liberty. Thus began a great and stormy friendship.

Among the MSS. left in my charge by Strickland is one, entitled: "Why More War? Buddhism's Message of Sanity to the Western World." This essay discusses the philosophy of Buddhism, the teachings of Freethought, the calamity of war, attacks the Church, and enounces Capitalism. It will be published in an early issue.

Strickland's Folklore translations; his Czech stories and love-lyrics; his defence of conscience against the myth of duty; his satirical verse; notes from his world travels, will be published as circumstances permit. Some of his work, and his biography, I would like to see published by an ordinary established publishing house, not afraid to deal with the eccentric, the useful, and the heretical.

The Strickland Press, established to print this paper when no printer would do so, is established to honour the memory of Walter Strickland, and accedes to his last request to stop "This march of Homicide." It is a memorial he would wish, if it achieves the task to which it is dedicated.

* * * *

N.B.—"Bakunian Press" for Bakunin Press is an error that appears in the Daily Mail report. Bodkin's "known as Guy A. Aldred" is nonsense.

LORD PROVOST DOLLAN

"Conscientious objectors were not considered desirable to have associated with the colours."—Dollan's Counsel, High Court of Justiciary, Edinburgh, 1917.

CONDITIONAL EXEMPTIONS.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Tuesday, 10th July, 1917.

Mr. MacCallum Scott asked the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that Councillor Dollan of Glasgow has been granted exemption by the Central Tribunal on the ground of conscientious objection, conditional on engaging in work of public importance; whether the Central Tribunal imposed as a further condition that the work must be found more than fifty miles from Glasgow, and if not, who imposed this condition: whether his appeal to the High Court against the decision of the stipendiary magistrate that he was an absentee has not been heard; and, if not, whether he ought to be released from prison until it has been finally decided whether he was rightly convicted of being an absentee?

The Secretary for Scotland (Mr. Munro)—I am aware of the decision of the Central Tribunal in this case. I am informed that it was intimated to Dollan that he should find employment in a district at least fifty miles from Glasgow. As regards the latter part of the question, I am informed that no such appeal has been heard in the High Court. The question of interim liberation has already been disposed of by the stipendiary.

Mr. Scott—Is it in order to impose such a condition as that he should find work of public importance at a distance of more than fifty miles from Glasgow? Is not that more suitable for the action of the authorities under the Defence of the Realm Act?

Mr. Munro—I see no reason whatever to doubt the legality of the condition.

Mr. Scott—What is the object of a condition like that? It is held that no work of public importance can be found within fifty miles of Glalsgow.

Mr. Munro—That is a matter entirely for the Tribunal and not for me.

Mr. Scott—Is it the case that the Tribunal can impose any condition whatsoever, no matter how irrational or how irrelevant to the matter at issue.

Mr. Munro—One must wait until such a case arises. This is not a case of that type.

A CALENDAR OF CODOLOGY

Only a "Decoy Duck!"

Tom Johnston's Verdict On Himself

The main caption of this essay is the title of an article published by the Rt. Hon. Thomas Johnston, M.P., in Forward, June 24, 1939. Johnston's article was the chief feature, on the front page of our contemporary. He bitterly attacked the Ministry of Information. On September 4, 1939, it was announced officially that a Scottish Regional Committee of the Ministry of Information had been formed. Its members were: Tom Johnston; James Willick, J.P., Chief Regional Information Officer; W. M. Ballantyne, Deputy Chief Regional, Information Officer. Dr. G. A. Waters, editor of the Scotsman, was co-opted to the Committee in an advisory capacity. As stated in our last issue, Tom Johnston is head also of the Scottish Civil Defence.

The second heading of this article is culled also from a Johnston article. The description "decoy duck" belongs to the time when Johnston was editor of the Forward and was writing his famous "War Points." Even as John Burns, never expecting to become a Cabinet Minister, labelled himself "Judas Iscariot," in an unfortunate moment of anticipation, so Tom Johnston, in Forward, for September 8, 1917, passed the verdict on himself: "a decoy duck." The description is specific and the application is accurate. Tom Johnston, editor of Forward, condemned the Rt. Hon. Thomas Johnston, M.P., Regional Commissioner for the Civic Defence of Scotland, and head of the Scottish Regional Committee of the Ministry of Information.

In the Forward mentioned, G. N. Barnes, since passed into deserved oblivion, defended himself against an attack Tom Johnston made upon him in the colums of that journal for September 1, 1917. Barnes headed his reply: "Labour in the Cabinet."

At the end of this apology, editor Tom Johnston exercised his editorial prerogative to comment between those awesome square brackets that make "editor's say" seem so final. The details of the dispute is of no consequence now, although they were part and parcel of the fact impeachment of parliamentarism. The following excerpt from Johnston's "last word" is of supreme import to-day. Rebuking Barnes—Rt. Hon then, as Johnston is now, and neither right nor honourable in reality—Johnston wrote:—

"We all see evidences of the struggle of the classes; we all want to subplant class consciousness by social consciousness. That is the orthodox socialist position. But class consciousness is there: capitalist class consciousness is in control of the State, and neither Mr. Henderson, Mr. Barnes, NOR ANY OTHER SOCIALIST IS OFFERED A GOVERNMENT POST, UNLESS ON THE DECOY DUCK PRINCIPLE."

Note, "the any other Socialist," Thomas! Presuming that you claim still to be a Socialist, you condemn yourself! Were you not offered a Government post? Have you not accepted a Government post? Has it been "on the decoy duck principle?"

Tom Johnston is Scottish Regional Commissioner for Defence and Information.

No one has attacked the Ministry of Information more bitterly than Tom Johnston. As explained in the opening paragraph of this essay, he attacked it in June and entered its service in September. He described its activity as "A Calendar of Codology." The calendar has not varied its purpose with its personnel. Its function remains the same, its science is unchanged.

In the Forward, for June 24, 1934, Johnston asked his readers to preserve certain press clippins, as they "would do well to retain for future reference." Knowing Thomas to be a well-informed lad, we followed his advice. The clippings commended by Johnston included extracts from the Daily Telegraph and Times for 1936; Hansard excerpts for 1937; and more extracts from Times, Daily Telegraph, and Manchester Guardian for 1939. These extracts most certainly condemned the Chamberlain Government, its Ambassadors in Rome and Berlin, and its active connivance at a Fascist supremacy in Europe, which serves as an official excuse for the present war.

Summarised, the story told by these press-cuttings is as follows:—

(1) The Daily Telegraph, for July 30, 1936, reported the denials, made in Rome and Berlin the previous night, that Germany and Italy intended to help Franco. Rome declared: "Italy has already announced her intention of remaining strictly neutral in the Spanish Civil War." The D.T. insisted on the truth of these reports.

(2) The Times (Berlin Correspondent) for August 28, 1936, announced that the German Government had informed the French Government that it would apply an immediate embargo on the export of arms and war materials into Spain.

(3) Hansard, February 1, 1937, records Anthony Eden's reply to Noel Baker. Eden, who became a kind of Communist Party pet for a while despite his own bland indifference to that party's advances, referred to the text of the notes addressed by the German and Italian Governments to H.M.G., declaring "themselves favourable in principle to the prohibition of the despatch of volunteers to Spain. H.M.G. have expressed their appreciation of the helpful nature of these and other replies."

(4) Hansard, March 15, 1937, records Viscount Cranborne's replies to Miss Wilkinson and Mr. Attlee. He had no knowledge of the landing of Italians in Spain to help General Franco. He explained his ignorance: "I think the answer is that information that appears in the papers is not always correct."

(5) Hansard, May 5, 1937, records Viscount Cranborne's inability to answer the member for Wolverhampton East as to the landing of German troops at San Sebastian.

(6) Hansard, May 26, 1937, records Viscount Cranborne's reply to Captain McEwen, that the British Vice-Consul at San Sebastian could not confirm the rumour that 1,500 Germans had landed there at the end of April or any other time.

(7) The Times, June 7, 1939, described the Berlin march past before Hitler of the Konder Legion of Germans, who had fought in Spain. There were 15,000 men on parade. Hitler said that he acceded to Franco's request for help in July, 1936.

(8) The Manchester Guardian, June 7, 1939, reported Field Marshal Goering's speech: "All important victories of General Franco were obtained with the help of German volunteers."

(9) The Daily Telegraph, June 6, 1939, reported Mussolini's speech of welcome to eight ships of Italian troops landed at Naples the previous day. Mussolini spoke of their "30 months of victorious war against the democracies and Bolshevism" in Spain.

Thus the Times and Daily Telegraph of 1939 answered the Times and Daily Telegraph of 1936. Thus were the statements made in the House of Commons by Anthony Eden and Viscount Cranborne given the lie. They were proved to be both stupid and false. On June 8, 1939, the Daily Telegraph completed the indictment of the British Government's folly in this matter by publishing its Rome correspondent's summary of the Italian War Office's official account of Italian naval activities in Spain.

These started on July 24, 1936. On August 15, Italian naval units effected a surprise landing at Porto Cristo, in Majorca. September, a liaison was effected between the Italian and Franco's fleet at Cadiz. Between December, 1936, and April, 1937, fifty-two Italian ships transported 100,000 Italians; 40,000 tons war material; and 750 heavy guns to Spain. During the entire period of the civil war, 17 Italian transports carried troops to Spain, making 55 voyages; 68 convoy ships made 134 voyages with war supplies for Franco; and Italian submarines prevented aid reaching Republican Spain, by spreading "fear in the Mediterranean basin."

Commenting on these facts, Johnston denounced Lord Perth for the part he played in assisting Fascism by helping to create the British Government's false face of "official ignorance." Johnston proceeded to attack the Ministry of Information:

> "And now we await with interests the efforts of my Lord Perth to counter the effects of the Goebbel propaganda in the neutral countries. His lordship, of course, is not chosen for his journalistic nose for he has no training in journalism. But because of his long association with Signors Mussolini and Ciano, he has been selected as the fit and proper person to run our British Government's information service—about Democracy!
> "The new department is not to be called a Ministry of Propaganda. It is information, not propaganda, that Lord Perth is to supply, and to judge from the Rome appeasement stuff, that flowered so beautifully when Lord Perth was ambassador to Italy, we are likely to get some interesting 'news' shortly."

Johnstone proceeded to eulogise the propaganda department organised by Northcliffe during the great war, which in the words of Ludendorff, "poisoned the hearts of our soldiers" by dropping, in one week alone, 3,000,000 leaflets upon the German soldiery in the trenches, explaining how German officers were living in luxury and embezzling the funds of the canteen. Johnston explained that "some of the ablest brains of the country were at the service of that propaganda department: H. G. Wells, Wickman Steed, Beaverbrook, Seton Watson, Hamilton Fyffe," etc.

Was it not rather unkind to remind Hamilton Fyffe, who has posed so prominently in the Labour movement since the war, that he was a Tory militarist in 1914-1918? Of course, he is a Labour militarist now.

Johnston concluded by describing the purpose of the Ministry of Information:—

> "I could have understood a propaganda designed to incite the German and Italian workers against their rulers—and the more truthful the propaganda the more effective the propaganda—but this Lord Perth business is quite obviously not intended to provide an efficient propaganda for Democracy against Dictators; it is not a fifth arm of British defence; it is not designed for civil insurrection; it is not intended to strengthen whatever opposition remains in Germany. Lord Perth's record shows that!
> "Then what the deuce is the Perth appointment designed for?

This description of the Ministry of Information makes excellent reading and still applies. But what the deuce is Tom Johnston doing serving the same Ministry of Information as from three months after this vigorous denunciation?

Johnston does well to call this 1936-1939 Fascist diplomatic record of the Chamberlain Government under which he now serves "a calendar of codology." Does the phrase not describe, as accurately, Johnston's own career?

Let us consider the time when Johnston stood for Dundee in 1924, following upon the death of E. D. Morel. Johnstone opened his campaign at the Caird Hall, on Tuesday, December 2. John Wheatley, who lived long enough to retire from the Labour front bench, and to denounce Johnston for betraying the unemployed, was the chief speaker. He wanted the Dundee workers to vote for Johnston. Four days later, Emrys Hughes advised to the same effect in Forward. The same issue of our contemporary carried an appeal for financial help because "Morel's seat must be held for Johnston."

Why was this so necessary? Has the condition of the Dundee workers changed? Johnston's status has improved. He is now a statesman and a bureaucrat. His old age is secured. And he never goes near Dundee. What of the Dundee workers who voted for him? Funny, how parliamentary Socialists ask the workers to supply funds, so that the former may secure careers at the expense of the latter, without any intention of helping the latter!

Johnston was returned. He secured 22,973 votes. His majority was 12,739. Forward, for December 27, 1924, celebrated the victory by publishing a large portrait of Johnston, and a special article from his pen. He concluded this article:

> "The result is a ringing challenge to Capitalism, an encouragement to the Labour Party all over the country, and an emphatic indication to whomsoever it may concern that the nation is having no red-herring stunts about New Liberalism. Dundee has dug the grave of the New Liberalism, as Paisley dug the grave of the Old Liberalism. A people sunk in the horrors of the Capitalist Poverty system has no use for new political humbug.
> "My personal thanks to all who voted and worked, and honoured me with their confidence. My hope is that I may prove worthy of it."

How parliamentarians lie! The result was not "a ringing challenge to Capitalism" as Johnston's present status shows. Johnston has never challenged Capitalism. He has play-acted at Labour journalism—under Capitalism. He has pursued cercerism with a certain amount of dull successs that would have palsied a man of thought and have suffocated a man of honour. Johnston has imposed upon the people "political humbug" of the worst description. What are Johnston's personal thanks to the people of Dundee worth today? As to his hope—that was beyond the strength of his carcerist interests and outwith the scope of his ambition.

To what depths of humbug Johnston could descend was shown by the columns of the Glasgow Evening News for June 20, 1929. This paper published an "interview" with Johnston, beneath these wild and exciting "headings":—

> "SCOTLAND'S IDLE ARMY.
> "First Steps to Relieve Unemployment.
> "Under-Secretary Interviewed.
> "'No Laggards in This Business.'"

Then followed several paragraphs about Mr. J. H. Thomas, of unfortunate memory, having asked Johnston "to assist him in launching the big crusade against unemployment generally." The crusade that never got going!

We quote part of the Evening News letterpress:—

> "'There is to be no laggard in this business.'
> "This was the concluding statement of Mr. Thomas Johnston, M.P., the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, in an interview with a 'News' representative this forenoon on the Government's plans for the relief of unemployment in Scotland.
> "Mr. Johnston has just returned home from London after a consultation with Mr. Thomas, and a bold move has already been made on behalf of the Scottish Health Department.
> "'There will be early decisions made,' added Mr. Johnston with emphasis, 'and there will be no laggard in this matter.'
> "But, from the impression given by Mr. Johnston, it is evident that he and his colleagues in the Ministry are determined that no time will be lost in tackling the problem that was so eagerly and earnestly pressed during the General Election."

As everyone knows, this unemployment gesture and chatter was undiluted rubbish. Capitalism has one cure for unemployment: reduce the human being—who cannot find a market for his labour-power to cannon-fodder. In 1930, John Wheatley denounced Johnston for doing nothing for the unemployed. He recalled a speech Johnston made at Balmore, on March 1, 1929. This speech was reported in the Kirkintilloch Gazette for March 1, 1929. Wheatley commented on the Balmore speech:—

> "At this meeting in Balmore Mr. Johnston adumbrated a scheme for providing India with steel ploughs, crushing machinery, and pumps that would increase British exports to India by £40,000,000. All our engineering shops would run merrily. Another scheme was, through small holdings, to raise at home the eggs they imported so extensively from Egypt and China. He further stated that afforestation could be extended to save the import of £36,000,000 of foreign timber. He also had a scheme for helping the Scottish herring industry. He summed up by stating that he believed the Labour Party, if given a chance, could, within six months or a year, come out with an economically useful scheme to provide work at useful and economical rates for the men presently idle. If this was not enough, he continued, 'he would give 800,000 old men and women now working an addition to the 10/- of £1 per week, and replace them by 800,000 young men and women presently idle and drawing relief.'
> "Mr. Johnston is now in office. He is the Scottish representative on the Employment Committee, and, so far as I know, not one man has found work through one of those schemes, or one penny has been paid towards those increased pensions, and he is not now in the sixth, but in the eighth, month of office.
> "I want to support his schemes, and I want to know when I may have a chance to do so."

Wheatley's indictment was unanswered. So is John McGovern's.

That there may be no doubt on this score we refer the reader to Forward for November 5, 1932. Under the two-column heading, "A BUDDING STATESMAN," the Tom Johnston organ says:—

> "John McGovern's speech in the House of Commons denouncing the Communist leaders of the Hunger Marchers has brought him bouquets galore from the Capitalist press. 'Beware when the press speaks well of you,' has long been a watchword for Socialists. And judging by the praise that is being handed out by the bucketful to John and his group, it is time that they pulled themselves up, too."

Forward quoted the Liberal News Chronicle for November 2, 1932, "description of how John captured the House of Commons on Monday." The News Chronicle depicted McGovern speaking "in the most correct Parliamentary manner, with all the weight of a Cabinet Minister, speaking from the Treasury Bench . . . The Tories cheered. For the first time in his Parliamentary life, Mr. McGovern—firebrand, revolutionary, mob orator—found himself warmly supported from all parts of the House."

Commenting again, the Tom Johnston organ said:—

> "Everybody who has read a little of the history of the Socialist Movement is familiar with the phenomenon of the real red hotter developing into the super statesman in record time.
> "And by the holy smoke John McGovern's bump of statesmanship seems to be developing in double quick time."

To whom do these words apply to-day? To John McGovern, fighting conscription, standing firmly against the horror of war; or to Thomas Johnston, of the Regional Defence and the Ministry of Information? John seems to have nipped his zeal for statemanship in the bud. But Tom has budded—into a full-fledged bureaucrat! That is, if one can follow the Forward's and Tom Johnston's variety of metaphors, and refer to "a decoy duck" budding. Agitators do bloom into "statesmen" and so prove to be "decoy ducks." That is the transformation parliamentarism achieves.

"Silver City" Socialism!

The Aberdeen I.L.P. is the centre of Socialist propaganda in the North of Scotland. For years it has conducted a consistent and untiring agitation and continues to go strong. In connection with a recent Communist Party demonstration, it issued the following handbill :—

BLACK VOTING RECORD OF W. GALLACHER, M.P.

Emergency Powers Act ... ... National Services (Armed Forces Act)	No Vote.
(Extension of Conscription) ... ... Control of Employment Bill (Industrial Conscription)	No Vote.
Local Elections Temporary Provisions Bill (Suppress Local Elections)	No Vote.

"A Straight Challenge Demands a Straight Answer."

"If you give me a chance I will go straight to the Music Hall and join the Army."

This was the promise given by George Will, of no occupation and no fixed abode, when he appeared before Bailie Jones, at Aberdeen Police Court, on Monday, October 30. Will was charged with being drunk and incapable. Bailie Jones is a Unitarian Minister, a member of the Peace Pledge Union, and a member of the Labour Party.

In continuing the case for three weeks, the Rev. Bailie Jones, Labour Party and P.P.U., said :—

"You are physically strong, young, and fit. You could be a national asset, instead of a national liability. I will give you an opportunity, but if you do not keep your promise you will get the fou' o' the ladle."

Is it the business of a Unitarian Christian to use the pressure of the police court as a recruiting medium for war? Is such a method of recruiting a tribute to the military occupation or to the memory of the men conventionally referred to as heroes? Does the Labour Party endorse the attitude of Bailie Jones? Is this consistent with P.P.U. membership? We demand a reply.

In our view, Jones should be expelled from the P.P.U., from the Labour Party, and from all Christian fellowship. Also, his methods are unbecoming to the dignity of a magistrate.

The day before Jones was making social indiscretion a personal ground for military recruiting, the Aberdeen Burgh Labour Party and Trades Council was discussing problems which the war had created.

Councillor Brown declared that some members of the Labour Party were not satisfied that the party had taken the proper course in declaring a political truce or in accepting the cancellation of the municipal elections.

He added :—

"If the present conditions continue, many of us who are now in the Labour Party may be found in the opposition in order to rally the working classes to freedom and Socialism."

Passing to local problems, he attacked the miserable and callous patriotic subterfuges of the Town Council. In the case of many families which were felt to be overcrowded, and would have obtained better houses but for the declaration of war, the Factional Sub-Committee of the Town Council had decided that because the men had been called up the families were not now so badly overcrowded and would not be given houses.

This decision represented the "city fathers'" sense of the proper reward of patriotism. It was a scandal. So was the method of calculating income for rent rebate purposes. The Council had the audacity to take into account the pay of the soldier husband and the value of the food he gets in the Army.

Referring to reserved occupations, Councillor Brown instanced the case of an unemployed plasterer who was not allowed to take other employment which would have given him a wage of £3 a week because it was outwith his trade.

A meeting under the auspices of the I.L.P., in co-operation with the Peace Pledge Union, in the Belmont Cinema, Aberdeen, on Sunday, October 29, passed a resolution protesting "against the Government proposals to destroy the right of free speech under the Emergency Power Act, and calling on the Aberdeen M.P.s to resist this measure."

On Thursday, November 14, 1935, North Aberdeen returned G. Garro Jones for North Aberdeen in the official Labour interest. Garro Jones was supported by the Communist Party and all the official Trade Union elements. He is a barrister-at-law and was previously M.P. for South Hackney, 1924-9. His 1935 election address described him as : "The Labour candidate unanimously adopted by the Aberdeen Trades and Labour Council and officially endorsed by the National Labour Party." We are sure the Aberdeen Trades and Labour Council must feel proud of its pet now.

Garro Jones addressed the electors from his Central Committee Rooms, 1 Gallowgate, Aberdeen. In true Socialist fashion, worthy of a barrister, he addressed the electors as "Ladies and Gentlemen." Not Citizens or anything that savoured of democracy! The good old-fashioned, public school-tie, careerist mode, "Ladies and Gentlemen!" What a wealth of psychology this phrase contains!

The following extracts from Garro Jones' election address make good reading to-day :—

"For the second time in four years a so-called crisis is being used to manœuvre a Tory Government back into office. If the Government wished, they could remain in office for one more year, but Britain's difficulty is their opportunity. Do not again allow them to prostitute patriotism as a first line of defence of their party. This time the nation should remember the words of the old Quaker :—'If a man deceive me once, shame on him : if a man deceive me twice, shame on me!' . . .

"Peace and Armaments.

"War can be prevented only by the system of Collective Security, under which the nations stand together to prevent war. On this fundamental policy the Conservative Premier and Cabinet have wobbled.

"Armaments for Profit.

"There is to-day a large and profitable British trade in weapons of war which can only be described as a trade in massacre. Our late Tory member, under the Tory whip, twice voted for its continuance. Its participants cannot even plead 'patriotism' as a defence, for the arms go to foreign countries and may ultimately be used against ourselves or the League. The Tory 'National' Government has refused to stop this evil. Labour would deal swiftly with it.

"The Tory-'National' Government are asking you for a blank cheque for armaments. They want a sum so vast that they dare not name it. I warn you that it cannot be less than £200,000,000, equal to £5 from every man, woman, and child in the country. This will inaugerate the greatest armaments race in history. Tempers will rise. Where will it end? I earnestly beg of you by voting Labour to say NO . . .

"Ex-Service Men.

"To Ex-Service Men I will only say that I am their comrade. I have stood shoulder to shoulder with them in the trenches. I have fought, with them and for them, in the air; I have urged justice for them in the House of Commons. I would value their support now.

"A Personal Note to All Electors.

"I wish all the electors to know that I want no office and no honour but their esteem and confidence. All who labour, by hand or brain, will find me ready to give untiring attention to their needs.

"The Labour Cause is great and noble—help me to bring about its inevitable triumph."

The Italics are in the original.

Beneath the text of the main address, in a facsimile of his handwriting, Garro Jones said :

"Women of Aberdeen! Note well the words that I have underlined. They are my special messages to you."

Beneath this again, in ordinary print, Garro Jones warned :

"Free Speech.

"As this goes to print, I am compelled to warn the free men and women of Aberdeen that their local press, controlled from London, suppresses and misrepresents the Labour case and policy. Your best answer is to vote Labour."

Having been returned to Parliament for Labour, Garro Jones now writes for that London press which misrepresents Labour and supports war and conscription and the destruction of democracy.

The women of Aberdeen noted well the words Garro Jones underlined. They believed him. What has he done to serve that great and noble cause and to bring about its inevitable triumph?

He asked the electors to say "No!" to armaments and war by voting Labour, by returning Garro Jones to Westminster! The electors accepted his word. They returned him. They said "No!" according to his instructions. What has Garro Jones done? With emphasis he has reversed their instructions. He has said, "Yes! Yes!!" He is a Yes-man of Toryism, war, and conscription! He stands for the massacre of youth!

Garro Jones recalls the shame injunction of the old Quaker. Let Aberdeen remember those words well.

Let us consider what Garro Jones has done.

In the House of Commons on Tuesday, 17th October, 1939, John McGovern and Campbell Stephen divided the House on the Second Reading of the Government's Bill to abolish local elections for the duration. James Maxton was absent from the House. Not a single Labour M.P. voted with the I.L.P. Willie Gallacher spoke against the Bill, but did not vote! Seventy-two Labour M.P.s supported the Bill! the list including Garro Jones. The result was, as the tellers do not count :

For the destruction of democracy	222
Against the destruction of democracy	0

By 222 to 0 the Government, the Tory "National" Government, abolished municipal voting during the war. North Aberdeen's Labour "Yes-man" was one of the Tory 222!

On Saturday, 2nd September, 1939, John McGovern and Campbell Stephen divided the House on conscription. Again Gallacher did not vote and again Garro Jones voted with the Tory "National" Government for conscription. The "Noes" to Conscription were :

Buchanan, G.
Harvey, T. E. (Eng. Univ.).
Jones, A. C. (Shipley).
Maxton, James.
Salter, Dr. A. (Bermondsey).

Those marked with a star also voted for conscription on September 2. Aberdeen will be interested in the votes of Pethwick Lawrence, in view of the appeal he made to the Silver City during the 1914-1918 war. Those starred do not include all the Labour M.P.'s who voted for conscription.

Picture Garro Jones' Labour colleague, Emmanual Shinwell, voting for conscription, when he is over military age, on September 2, 1939, and then turn to the old volumes of Hansard, and read the following:—

EXEMPTION APPLICATION

(E. SHINWELL) Tuesday, 26th February, 1918

Mr. Stanton asked the Home Secretary whether he is aware that Mr. Emmanuel Shinwell applied to the Glasgow Tribunal for exemption from military service, that his application was rejected, that he received a calling-up notice, and that such notice was not in order, with the result that he had to appear before the Tribunal again; if he is aware that he is a conscientious objector; whether instructions were sent to the Tribunal that the case was not to be proceeded with; if so, were such instructions sent with his sanction; whether any information can be given as to the total number of cases in Glasgow where similar instructions have been sent; and why steps were taken to protect this person against military service?

Mr. Beck—Mr. Emmanuel Shinwell was granted conditional exemption by the Glasgow Local Tribunal in July 1916. The case was reviewed in December 1916, and exemption continued. This decision was upheld on appeal by the Appeal Tribunal. In September 1917 this case was again reviewed by the National Service representative, but application was, in error, made to the Appeal Tribunal instead of to the local Tribunal as provided by the Regulations governing Tribunal procedure. The case was accordingly remitted to the local Tribunal by the Appeal Tribunal after a decision had been given withdrawing his exemption, and on the 12th October, 1917, the local Tribunal heard the case and continued the exemption granted to Mr. Shinwell. Against this decision the National Service representative appealed, but on instructions from the National Service Department the appeal was withdrawn. No instructions were sent to the Tribunal. The appeal was withdrawn on the representation of the Shipping Controller and the Admiralty that Shinwell was doing important work in connection with the engagement and supervision of crews for merchant ships, both requisitioned and unrequisitioned, and that in the opinion of those Departments it was desirable in the national interests that his exemption should continue. The Minister of National Service is not aware that Shinwell is a conscientious objector.

That is how Shinwell avoided conscription during the great war, whilst posing to the movement as a conscientious objector, and an associate of conscientious objectors.

We have chaired one N.C.L. meeting at St. Andrews Hall, Glasgow, and have been advertised as a speaker at another. May we remind M.P.s and Councillors that it is a breach of courtesy to crowd out questions and also to crush out the Anti-Parliamentarian speaker, one's own enthusiasm notwithstanding. We have something to say on this peace question that needs to be said. We wish to say it in Glasgow. If it cannot be said under N.C.L. auspices for the reasons already given, it must be declared under U.S.M. auspices. Next time we speak in St. Andrews Hall we trust we shall be permitted to develop our theme and that questions will be permitted from the audience. Every speaker is entitled to the same right of speech and the audience is entitled to question.

We object also to the N.C.L. platform being used to make careers for persons advertised as "Prospective Labour Candidate" for this or that place. This is only new parliamentary careerism.

ARMISTICE DAY.

Please to remember
The eleventh of November,
Season of treason and plot.
But the boys who will die
Because of Versaillies,
Will all of them soon be forgot!

WAR—FOR WHAT?

The Concentration Camp Argument Considered

By THE MARQUIS OF TAVISTOCK

One of the most serious obstacles confronting workers in the cause of peace is the indignation aroused in the minds of people, often of great intelligence and the highest principles, by stories of atrocities in German concentration camps. Much as they hate war, certain men and women feel that these atrocities are so evil that even war itself may be a sad necessity to overthrow the régime which perpetrates them. They also feel that no better alternative to war exists.

Making every allowance for the propagandist enthusiasm of our not too intelligent or fair-minded politicians and for the lies and exaggerations of our peculiarly satanic National Press, it cannot be denied that acts of brutality have been committed, often against quite innocent people, and that such acts rightly provoke feelings of great indignation and a passionate desire to prevent their continuance.

Let us not forget, however, that many acts which are wicked and indefensible are, at the same time, perfectly understandable.

Nations or classes which have suffered greatly, when they rise to deliver themselves, usually produce leaders who are ruthless in their treatment of those whom they regard as their countries' enemies and, once they have labelled the suspect groups, they are prone to punish the innocent with the guilty.

This, in the past, has happened in France and more recently in Russia and it might even happen in our own country if we were as hard driven as the German people after the last war.

It is beside the point to argue that the Germans brought the consequences of the last war upon themselves and that they would have given us even worse treatment if they had won. Even if this were true, two wrongs do not make a right; most of the Germans who suffered after the war had little or no responsibility for causing it. and over-severity creates just the same evil consequences whether it be unprovoked or administered on a tit-for-tat basis.

Do not let us forget, either, that in Britain there are plenty of people with the "concentration camp" mentality. They write, or cause to be written, letters and articles in our daily papers and sometimes they speak in Parliament. Indeed, the matter may be brought even nearer home: which of us at some time or another has not felt the temptation to wish that he had power to imprison or banish from the country, whole classes of persons whose actions or ideas seem highly obnoxious? (Of course our bêtes noires deserve their punishments; it is always the other fellow who is so unjust in his antipathies)!

The German leaders have been accused of "delighting" in torturing innocent people. This charge could only be substantiated by those who are intimately acquainted with them. Although sadist rulers are not unknown, it is more than usual for those in authority who issue orders which produce much suffering, not to take any special delight in the pain they cause, but rather to regard it as an unavoidable necessity for the attainment of a (to them) right and moral objective. The German Government regard Jews, Pacifists and religious leaders who meddle in politics as enemies of the State and there is no reason to doubt their sincerity, however little we may respect their judgment.

In the matter of willingness to cause innocent suffering in the pursuit of what seems to them to be a high moral end, there is no difference between the German Government and our own Government. To the German Government the welfare of the State appears to be the supreme good and to purge it of dangerous elements, Jews, Pacifists and religious leaders who indulge too freely in political criticism must endure suffering. To our Government the liberation of Europe from Nazi aggression appears to be the supreme good and in pursuit of this objective they also decide, by a declaration of war, to subject to suffering large numbers of persons, most of whom are entirely innocent. No one, however, could fairly accuse British statesmen of "delighting" even in the suffering of German soldiers and their bereaved relatives.

There is, too, a well-known saying, "What the eye does not see, the heart does not grieve for." It is unlikely that Hitler and his colleagues have been eye-witnesses of the atrocities committed as a result of their orders and it is all too easy for any person who has, for the achievement of what he believes to be a good end, given orders which involve suffering, to drug his conscience with the reflection, "It is hard luck for some, but it simply has to be and there is no other alternative."

In regard to those Germans actually guilty of inflicting physical cruelty and apparently enjoying doing so, most nations, our own included, produce a certain percentage of unpleasant bullies, especially among their young men, some of whom, incidentally, in time outgrow their evil ways. This percentage of bullies need not be high to cause much mischief and to attract much attention. On the principle that if a dog bites a man it is not news, but if a man bites a dog it is news, kindly or tolerant treatment of Jews, etc., by German men and lads goes unrecorded, but cruelty is news and is therefore brought into prominence.

It is important to remember that the vast majority of the German people, also, are not eye-witnesses of the crimes for which the policy of their government and the sadistic tendencies of a minority of their fellow-countrymen are responsible; very much, indeed, as the vast majority of our own people are not eye-witnesses of the unpleasant things sometimes done as a result of Government policy in the more remote parts of our far-flung Empire. The Germans share with ourselves a weakness common to most patriotic peoples in that they are prone to ignore and brush aside any evils in their own régime which are not brought forcibly to their notice; while they are easily moved to sincere indignation by stories of similar evils perpetrated within the boundaries of rival States.

There is only one really effective and Christian method of putting an end to concentration camp atrocities and that is to reduce the fear which often gives rise to them and to inspire with a livelier sense of concern or shame, decent Germans and other Germans, perhaps less decent, who happen to be in authority.

The less the fear of enemies without, the less will tend to be the fear of enemies within and in consequence the less temptation there will be to treat the latter with severity.

In regard to the second point, to whose opinion are normal people most sensitive? Whose respect do they most desire and whose censure do they most fear? That of proved friends and benefactors and of persons whose efficiency they admire? Or that of enemies and of hostile critics whose blunders they despise? Obviously the former: therefore if we desire to influence the German Government in the direction of greater leniency towards those whose fate we pity, we should earn their respect by setting our own house in better order and putting right those abuses which they, with more or less justice, find to criticize. We should also take immediate steps to earn the goodwill of the German nation by acts of practical generosity and helpfulness, especially in the economic sphere where such service can most easily be rendered. It is an interesting fact that the people of every nation which has recently earned the name "aggressor" have shown evidence of a strong desire to justify their conduct in the eyes of friendly foreigners and to do nothing to earn the latter's contempt.

As a method of bringing to the German Government and people a sense of guilt for the severities of the former's régime, war is completely useless, and, from a psychological standpoint completely ridiculous.

War always accentuates a combatant nation's sense of its own rectitude and also its belief in the wickedness and hypocrisy of its adversary. How can it do anything else when we remember the effect of war propaganda and the natural reaction to news of casualties?

War punishes the wrong people. Few indeed of those responsible for concentration camp atrocities are likely to be killed in this war. Thousands not responsible are sure to be victims if hostilities are continued. No high moral purpose can ever be attained by killing the wrong people. Would that this truth could burn its way deeper into the minds of our tender-hearted but often muddle-headed champions of the victims of Nazi oppression!

Finally, do not let us forget that in this war we are fatally handicapped by not starting with a clean slate. Versailles, the British starvation blockade, and the vindictiveness of the French Government are not forgotten. Every day of a new war and a new blockade will intensify these memories, memories fatal to our chances of bringing home to the hearts of the German nation any sense of shame for the shortcomings of their Government.

Indignation, however righteous, must be tempered not only by a realisation of all pertinent facts, but also by an ever-present awareness of the normal workings of the human mind.

EDITOR'S PERSONAL APPEAL

Last month I made a personal appeal to readers to raise a special sum of £166 13s. 3d to cover losses on the paper prior to the issue of the Xmas number, on the postal mission, and on the London Law proceedings in connection with the Hyde Park fight.

This was not my personal fight, as I rarely visit London, and have been for years a settled Glaswegian. Hyde Park speaking is of no personal moment to me. The stand was made by me absolutely in the public interest. One day it will have to be repeated successfully. Meantime, I think those who live in London should contribute to my costs.

The following donations have been received in response to my appeal:—

Marquis of Tavistock	£10	0	0
Mrs. Isobel Knight	1	0	0
Lady Constance Malleson	0	10	0
Lawrence Rose	0	5	0
J.P.	0	4	0
Gavin Caldwell	0	3	0
George McAndrew	0	2	6
Anglo-Scot	0	2	6
Alec Kaye	0	2	6
R. C. Mekey	0	2	6
Sid Kaye	0	1	0
Total Received	£12	13	0
Total to Come	£154	0	3

Comrades are asked to make up this loss now. We are producing a 12-paged paper, on good paper, without advertisements of any description. N.C.L. and all such announcements are inserted free and unconditionally. Please help.

THE MANCHESTER CONSCIENCE TRIBUNAL

The Manchester Tribunal opened at the Assize Court, Manchester, on November 2. The sittings concluded on November 24. The Chairman was Judge E. Burgis. Other members of the Tribunal were: Alderman C. Aveling (Southport); Laurence O. Holt (Liverpool; Sir Miles E. Mitchell (Manchester); and A. Roberts (Amalgamated Society Card, Blowing, and Ring Room Operatives, Salford).

When the Tribunal assembled, the Chairman expressed a desire for a friendly and understanding basis of approach. The Court realised the suffering that war entailed and entered upon its duties with sympathy and diffidence. In questioning applicants, the Court was not seeking to persecute conscience, but to plumb the depths of conviction, so that conscience might not be made a cloak for cowardice and irresponsibility.

In the main, the Chairman's opening remarks were admirable and did point to a desire to discharge onerous duties with fairness and understanding. This, notwithstanding, during its first day's sitting, the Tribunal failed to appreciate the limit of its power in reference to non-combatant duties. An applicant who agreed that he would serve in the R.A.M.C. was registered without comment in the military register for non-combatant duties. It was not made clear that the Tribunal had no power to guarantee him R.A.M.C. service or to specify any particular form of non-combatant service, which is determined by the military authorities in accordance with their needs. It is thus possible that this applicant, who thought that he was accepting service in the Medical Corps, may find himself required to perform other non-combatant duties such as transport of munitions, to which he will object. He will find himself court-martialled for disobeying a "lawful command," although his refusal will proceed from a conscientious objection that has been admitted to be genuine.

Another fault of the Manchester Tribunal was its marked tendency to direct the energies of applicants, whom it deemed genuine, to some form of State service, usually first-aid work.

It never occurred to the Tribunal that a course of first aid is merely a mean apology for pacifism. It is also an easy attitude to adopt, much easier than an endeavour to get down to first causes. War is an evil. To know the cause of war, and to work with all one's energy to remove the cause, is a far greater service to humanity than to spend time in acquiring knowledge of how to patch up some of the effects of the evil. Pacifism may seem a poor allegiance to the State but it expresses a loyalty to mankind which is to the best interests of the State whenever the State does not conflict with society.

Eighteen people appeared before the Tribunal on the opening day. Two were registered unconditionally. Eleven were registered conditionally. Three were placed without qualification on the military register.

A. C. Adshead, Manchester Road, Heaton Chapel, and F. Bickerdike, Bowker Street, Radcliffe, were registered as C.O.'s unconditionally.

Four other members of the Society of Friends were registered on condition that they qualified for the Friends Ambulance Unit. Six Christadelphians were registered as C.O.'s, on condition that they attended Christadelphian civil ambulance classes. One of these was P. Adams, Mile End, Stockport. He stated that Christadelphians were granted exemption during the American Civil War and during the Great War. Christadelphians were willing to perform civilian work under the Ministry of Labour, but would not take an oath of allegiance to the King for military service.

When the Tribunal sat for the second day, fifteen young men stated their objections to performing military duties. Six were conditionally registered as C.O.'s, four were registered unconditionally; two were placed on the list of persons liable to be called up for non-combatant duties; two were adjourned; and only one applicant had his name removed unconditionally from the provisional register of conscientious objectors. The case was that of M. C. Marson, Ashford Lodge, Bowdon. His father had served in the last war, and was invalided out of the Army, having lost an eye. The Tribunal stated that Marson had not established his conscientious objection, but that this decision must not be taken to prejudice an appeal on the grounds of hardship. The Tribunal considered that he had a hardship case.

E. Mason, Minshull New Road, Crewe, was registered as a C.O., on condition that he took up ambulance work. He said:—

"Christianity does not recognise the geographical divisions into which mankind has fallen."

A. A. Mainwaring, Duke Street, Old Trafford, made a long and effective statement.

Registration under the Military Training Act, he said, was a suppression of personal rights, and it was wrong that the State should turn men into careers which were against their Christian teaching. Registration compelled men to take training in order to kill, and created an atmosphere which was ungodly, unchristian, and given over to nothing more than savagery. Were young people to be brought up in that atmosphere? He objected to performing any duties which would aid military action, encourage animalism, cause intense suffering, lower the standard of living, and bring about things which were hideous. He would willingly give his life in a passive resistance to everything connected with war.

Pacifism, properly applied, he added, was not just non-resistance. He would feel impelled to help anyone in difficulties, but he would not serve under military control.

H. Brayshaw and D. J. Hepton, both of Dalton Hall, Manchester; H. Makin, Hilton Street, Little Hulton; and J. T. Marsh, Trafford Grove, Stretford, were registered unconditionally as C.O.'s. Brayshaw said he was born into a family connected with the Society of Friends. He refused to serve in the Friends' Ambulance Unit, because it was not run by the Society of Friends, but only by a few members of that body who were not Absolutists. He was an Absolutist and would not compromise with war.

J. Mitchell, Standedge Road, Diggle, was registered as a person liable to be called up for non-combatant duties. Prior to rejecting his appeal, the Tribunal adopted an amazing attitude. Mitchell mentioned that he believed in the brotherhood of man. He had been to Switzerland and had met a number of people of other nations.

Mr. Roberts—And you feel we ought to have an international brotherhood?—Yes, sir.

Mr. Roberts—I feel like that, too, and I think we all do on this Tribunal.

After this, the Tribunal virtually rejected his appeal!

On Saturday, November 4, the Tribunal heard seven cases. Three applicants were placed on the military register without qualification. It was directed that another applicant should be liable to be called up for non-combatant duties. One person was registered as a C.O. on condition that he took up first-aid work. Two were registered unconditionally as conscientious objectors.

H. Nixon, Broadfield Road, Moss Side, and L. P. Barnett, Hartley Victoria Methodist College, maintained that war was contrary to the teaching of Christ. Barnett refused to have his case adjourned indefinitely, as suggested by the Tribunal, on the ground that he was a theological student. He maintained that he had no right except that of a conscientious objector under the Act. He took his stand as a Christian Pacifist, convinced that war, in every form, was contrary to the teaching and example of Jesus. He explained :—

"As a Christian I can never support or sanction war or preparation for it. Peace and security can never be attained by preparing for or engaging in war or by possessing armaments, as the present situation amply demonstrates. Peace is a practical, positive policy which must be obtained by free co-operation between nations, putting the good of all before the selfish interests of each."

He maintained that it was essential to this end that it should be made abundantly clear that Britain would not resort to mass murder. War was, at present, so interwoven in national and social life that he realised it was impossible for anyone to escape all connection with it. There was no such thing as logical, consistent absolutist pacifism possible, but under the Military Training Act his position was clear. He could not take training in order to kill.

Questioned by Mr. C. Aveling, he said he had always been a pacifist at heart, but his views were crystallised in 1937 when he left home to live in London and came under the influence of a dominantly pacifist Christian community.

Both were registered without condition.

The Barnett decision was clapped. Judge Burgis ordered the offenders to leave at once. They were sitting in a court of Justice; and he would have neither clapping nor expressions of approval or objection. Such conduct was an insult to the Court.

The fourth sitting was on November 6 Seventeen objectors were dealt with. Two applicants received unconditional exemption Five were placed on the military register without qualification. Three were given non-combatant service. Conditional exemption was given to I Grant, Gladstone Grove, Heaton Moor, who was employed at engineering and was prepared to do International Voluntary Service for Peace overseas. Unconditional registration was granted to J. D. Gabbort, King's Drive, Heaton Moor, and H. Briggs, Duffield Road, Salford Gabbort was a Scoutmaster but refused during his schooldays to join the Hulme Grammar School O.T.C. Briggs is a full time evangelist of the Calvary Holiness Church, Oldham.

J. G. Campbell, Devonshire Road, Stockport, and G. R. Cattell, Nearmaker Avenue, Benchill, Wythenshawe, were ordered to do non-combatant work. Campbell is costs-clerk in an aircraft factory and Cattell is a time-clerk at an aviation company's work. Campbell said he could not accept responsibility for the use to which aircraft was put, and made a religious explanation, which put the responsibility on God.

Judge Burgis—You are part of the machinery in the manufacture of an aeroplane?

Applicant—As a clerk my participation is very indirect.

On November 7, the Tribunal heard eleven cases. Three were registered unconditionally: five conditionally; and three removed without qualification.

H. Hesketh, Doctor's Lane, Bury, was registered as a conscientious objector, conditional on his remaining in his present industry of farming. The Rev. H. Lonsdale, Congregational minister, described Hesketh's hard life and described him as "inarticulate and not well educated" but a "real Chistian pacifist."

The Chairman (Judge E. C. Burgis)—What is there about his life that has made you form the view that he is a Christian pacifist.

The Rev. H. Lonsdale—Well, he lives with his mother-in-law. (Loud laughter, in which members of the Tribunal joined.)

J. Holroyd, Shaw Road, Oldham, a member of the executive of the local branch of the Peace Pledge Union, was unconditionally registered. As a child he had refused the gift of a toy fort equipped with soldiers. He had refused a gas mask as being part of the preparations for war and would not make use of an air-raid shelter.

W. Jevons, Chapel Street, Edgeley, Stockport, was questioned at length by Mr. Holt. The Court retired to consider his case. On retiring the Chairman said :—

"My colleagues have listened to this case with much interest. Of all the cases to which we have listened during the last few days, there is no case in which we are more satisfied that the applicant has a genuine conscientious objection."

Jevons was registered without conditions. The Chairman explained that it was difficult for Jevons to make up his mind as to the precise form his service to community should take, "but we are so satisfied with his integrity that we shall leave it to his honour."

J. Harding, Junior, St. George's Road, Bolton, was registered conditionally on his qualifying for first-aid work. He said that the affairs of this world were not his concern and his only duty was to preach. The Tribunal decided that he had a conscience which they despised: but it was a conscience.

On November 8, the Tribunal heard eleven cases. Unconditional exemption was granted to the following four applicants: Harry N. Sheldon, Windermere Lane, Reddish; John Hartley, Birch Grove, Longsight; Gerald H. W. Pullen, Plumbley, near Knutsford; and J. K. Lawton, Queen's Road, Cheadle, Hulme.

In the case of Pullen, the Chairman said :—
"We feel strongly that pacifists as a whole are under the illusion that they have performed all the service they need for humanity when they have done peace work."

The Tribunal asked Hartley to place his knowledge of languages at the service of the Council for Social Service for work among refugees. The Chairman complained that, unlike most applicants, he had understated his case.

The Tribunal released J. L. Hurst, a clergyman's son, to the care of his godfather, Canon Peter Green, to find him social service for which he is fitted, and that is in the public interest. The Chairman said that, but for the Canon's interference, the Tribunal would have deemed Hurst "a humbug, come here for purposes of self-advertisement."

After Canon Green had given evidence on Hurst's behalf, the applicant returned to the witness box and apologised for his "arrogance." Judge Burgis said that the apology was worthless and that the applicant had made a bow to the audience.

Mr. Hurst—It was a bow to you, sir.

Judge Burgis—It was a bow to the audience.

The Tribunal removed J. H. Lindars, Timperley Vicarage, Altrincham, from the C.O. Register, because his ideas lacked the depth of conviction necessary to justify the conclusion that he had a conscientious objection to war.

Asked by Judge Burgis why taking part in war went against his conscience, Mr. Lindars replied, "I don't know. It just does."

Judge Burgis—Why shouldn't you take part?

Mr. Lindars—I can't conceive why I should. It is so horrible and beastly. A great hatred of it has just grown up in me.

On November 9, the Tribunal ordered six out of fifteen applicants to be removed from the register of conscientious objectors. One was a Jew. The Chairman said that several of the objectors had "views" but not the clear, strong, deep conviction needed to justify conscientious objection.

Conditional exemption was granted to Harold C. Jones, Garston Street, Bury. Canon Hornby spoke to his sincerity.

Judge Burgis—What social service such as Christ would have performed are you prepared to perform?

Mr. Jones—I think Christ would have been preaching his Gospel to-day.

Judge Burgis—He did other things besides preaching. I can't help thinking that when you say in your statement that some people may think you are a shirker you are in danger of being right.

Mr. Jones—I don't worry much about what other people think of me.

Although the Tribunal granted unconditional exemption to Benjamin Stoddart, Albert Road, Levenshulme, the Chairman had a passage of arms with him. He is going to a post at the Stockport Grammar School. When he mentioned education as his social service, Judge Burgis said, "Leave out education. That is something you make money by."

Lippa Kunovici, Caroline Street, Lower Broughton, Manchester, said his father was a Rumanian. The suffering of the Jews in Germany was a direct outcome of the last war. It was always wrong to kill. The Chairman said his case had been considered sympathetically because he was a member of an outraged race. But there was no circumstance to justify his exemption. He was removed without qualification.

Barry Woollerton, Rochdale Road, Manchester, was removed from the Register after he had expressed his objection to all killing with much eloquence. He belonged to no organisation. His confidence and speed in answering questions caused many bursts of laughter.

Without retiring, the Tribunal decided against him. The Chairman said :—

"A budding demagogue, glib of tongue and with ability to use words, but without sincerity or conviction."

On November 10, the Tribunal gave unconditional exemption to Harold Jones, Princess Road, Levenshulme, who has been for eight years a member of the Bettisham Tabernacle, which is in "voluntary fellowship" with the Assemblies of God. Jones said that a Christians main concern was with the state of people's souls. The Chairman said that such views filled the Tribunal with surprise and almost contempt. The Tribunal was satisfied that they were held conscientiously.

A second member of this organisation, Albert A. Parr, Thornton Street, Openshaw, was registered as a C.O. conditionally. He said that the only way to serve Christ was by preaching. He believed that praying would give a man a new leg or a new arm or new head.

Judge Burgis stated the view expressed by Parr was not an honest conscientious view.

On November 15, the Tribunal unconditionally registered as Conscientious Objectors: Ted Whittaker, Banstead Avenue, Rownswood Estate, Northenden; John E. Wilkinson, Sherbourne Road, Cheadle Heath, Stockport; Frank Wilson, Newark Road, Rochdale; John P. Wragge, Walton Hall, Manchester.

Whittaker said that there was no religious background to his objection. He had no conscientious objection to non-combatant work, but he had to taking life, and he was not prepared to take non-combatant work as a compromise. The Tribunal adjourned for lunch with the case still undecided, and on returning Judge Burgis asked :

Are you prepared to give up your job for this objection?—Yes.

I believe there are certain pension rights attached?—Yes.

And you are prepared to lose those rather than give up the objection?—Yes.

Judge Burgis gave reasons for refusing exemption to Frank Platt, who, when the war broke out, was studying philosophy at the Sorbonne in Paris and who as an agnostic based his objection on utilitarian grounds.

Platt said that he accepted the arguments of Huxley, Bertrand Russell, and Joad on the practicability of one-sided disarmament. He said that the majority of people in Czecho-Slovakia, who had accepted invasion without armed resistance, were happier than the majority in Poland. As an agnostic his objection was one of expediency.

Judge Burgis summarised :—

"It is clear that this young man is not repeating a number of phrases which he has picked up and he has addressed his mind to the subject. His outlook as an agnostic is different from that of most young men before us, and it is with his agnostic's outlook that he urges his case. I am disposed to take the view that an agnostic may have conscientious objection. But he must not merely object to war, he must do so conscientiously. He says frankly, 'I don't object to killing. It may be necessary to kill—to execute the murderer. I don't object to killing in war. War may be justifiable.'

"Parliament has not laid down that a man is excused from military service if he thinks that the grounds on which the war is waged are not justifiable. Parliament has given an exemption on three grounds only. I hold that the applicant does not come within the exemption which is allowed to those who conscientiously hold these views. In my view he does not conscientiously hold these views which he says he does."

The day's decisions were :—

Registered unconditionally as C.O.'s	4
Registered conditionally on doing work specified by the Ministry of Labour	1
Registered on condition of continuing spare-time food-growing	1
Transferred military register, non-combatant service	3
Transferred military register, without qualification	4

On November 16, nine of the fifteen applicants were removed from the C.O. register without qualification.

Unconditional exemption was granted to Douglas Cottrell, Richmond Road, Fallowfield, Manchester; Harold R. Bedson, Buxton Avenue, Crewe; Derek Brook, Buxton Avenue, Crewe. Bedson and Brook entered uniform applications as Christadelphians.

Douglas Cottrell is an Anglican, who opposes conscription because it is opposed to "the right of freedom of decision which every person possesses from God." He was willing to do medical service voluntarily.

In announcing the Tribunal's decision, Judge Burgis said they were favourably impressed and they hoped he would feel it his Christian duty to render service for those who might be injured.

George Grand, Heaton Lane, Stockport, and John F. R. Holden, Churchgate, Stockport, were removed from the register without qualification for stressing their Socialist approach.

George Grand said that he would not kill men who were no different from himself. He would not help an injured soldier, even in civil life. The war was maintained by "foul propaganda" and "the whinings of statesmen."

John F. R. Holden said that war was promoted by "the press and ranting politicians." As a worker, he had nothing to defend. He had no vote. He "detested being a butcher and a murderer."

Judge Burgis—All of us here are most opposed to the idea of killing. It is physically repugnant to us.

Giving the decision in Holden's case, the Chairman said :—

"We view this case with considerable sympathy. We feel that this young man has probably had a sad and bitter experience in life. He has been nurtured in class warfare, and in consequence his whole outlook on life has been warped."

We think the decision entirely wrong, and the expression of sympathy, hypocritical. Judge Burgis, who spoke frankly about the hypocrisy of others, will not resent frank comment in return. Grand and Holden did make out cases for total exemption on the ground of conscience. The class-war is a social and economic fact. The workers' outlook, if warped at all, is warped in reality: the reality of poverty and class distinction. We believe that these applicants stated their case unwisely but not untruly.

Cyril Jacobs, 9 Darlington Road, Cheetham, was represented by a solicitor, Mr. J. H. Minor. He was told at the Labour Exchange not to register as an objector until he received calling-up papers. James R. Clegg, Cookland Street, Cockbrook, Ashton-under-Lyne, went for medical examination and then asked to be put into the R.A.M.C. He stated he objected to killing and an officer said he must register as a C.O. at once. Both Jacobs and Clegg were denied exemption.

Arnold R. Hutchings, Braemar Avenue, Stretford, was registered for non-combatant service on his own statement that he was willing to join the R.A.M.C. He wanted a written undertaking that he would not be asked to do combatant work.

Judge Burgis—The Government, I gather, has given assurances that the R.A.M.C. will not be used for fighting purposes.

Hutchings—In the last war these assurances were given, and there were many cases of many being required to do other work. I want written assurances.

Judge Burgis—I cannot give any written assurance. The only assurance I can give is the assurance that has been given in Parliament.

Hutchings—That is no guarantee.

Judge Burgis—It is no guarantee, but if we recommend you for non-combatant work you will not get into a combatant corps. You can be sure of that. That is the best we can do. In announcing the decision, he said they would make a strong recommendation that Hutchings should be admitted to the R.A.M.C.

On Tuesday, November 21, Manchester Tribunal granted exemption, on condition that he did work prescribed by the Ministry of Labour, to Leslie Emery Bracewell, Providence Street, Bacup. Bracewell opposed war in the interests of civilisation. He described conscription as a surrender to Hitlerism. The Chairman described the case as a difficult one :—

"This boy has been brought up in a strongly pacifist home and has lived in a strongly pacifist atmosphere. We think that that outlook on life has affected his views and that what he has really been trying to express to us is not that he objects to dictatorship or doing what he is told: we think he has been trying to express to us the fact that he objects to doing anything of a military character."

Kenneth Douglas Bundy, Broad Walk, Buxton, signed the military register, submitted to medical examination, applied to the Hardships Committee for a postponement of his service, and did not suggest, until September 29, that he was a conscientious objector. Bundy said his grounds were religious, humanitarian, and moral. The Court removed Bundy's name from the C.O. register unconditionally. The Chairman stated that he was a young man of superior education and his claim was rejected because the Court doubted his credibility. A conscience was not developed overnight. It was a plant of slow growth.

The following were registered unconditionally as conscientious objectors: Garvin Alexander Stuart Warnock, Trafalgar Road, Salford; George Douglas Barnett, Rever Street Farm, Copperhall, Crewe; Ronald Byrom, Myrtle Street, Bury.

The following day the decisions were somewhat dull. John Francis Salter, Oldfield Road, Sale, was opposed to leaving his family. Harold Davies, Bedford Street, Crewe, objected to war breaking up his home. Douglas Dingwall Mittall Cottage, Ramsbottom, had resigned from the Boy Scouts because he objected to military training. All three were placed on the military register without qualification.

On November 23, John Godfrey Heathcote, Brunswick Street, Manchester, refused to accept exemption on condition that he does civilian work specified by the Ministry of Labour. He claimed total exemption and based his claim, as a Roman Catholic, on the tests laid down by Catholic Theologians, from the time of St. Augustine, to determine what is a righteous war.

1. It must be in defence of a strict right, proportionate in importance to the means invoked.

2. All other means of settlement must have been tried and have failed.

3. There must be a reasonable hope of victory for the just cause.

4. The war must be entered upon simply with the intention of righting a certain wrong.

5. The means used must be in accordance with the virtues of truth, justice, and love.

6. The evils caused by war must not be greater than the evil it is sought to destroy.

The applicant said he was convinced that the nature and scale of modern warfare made it impossible for all the conditions to be satisfied. He agreed that the Catholic hierarchy in England had stated that our cause was just. He himself doubted whether it was just entirely.

Judge Burgis—It is only a theological objection?—It is a profound conviction.

Applicant said that although some people felt able to justify modern warfare by Catholic principles, he did not know how they did it.

Judge Burgis—Your whole objection is because of the magnitude of modern war?—Not the whole. It is sinful in its methods and does more harm than it averts.

Applicant said he could not accept any service as a condition of exemption.

Alderman Aveling questioned him about the oppression of Catholics in Germany. He replied that Catholics in all countries, following their hierarchies, thought they had a just cause. If he fought he would only be fighting other Catholics.

Unconditional exemption was granted to Cyril D. Hughes, Hertford Road, Blackley, Manchester. Judge Burgis said :—

"We have no hesitation whatever in arriving at the conclusion that this young man is a man of deep religious conviction, and his religious convictions are so deep and genuine that he finds himself unable to take part in any military act. We are also satisfied that he is a young man who recognises his responsibility to society. He does not merely preach. His acts satisfy us that there is no need for this Tribunal to attach any conditions whatever."

On November 24, John Edward Robinson, Green Lane, Hopwood, Heywood, was registered as a C.O., conditional on doing work prescribed by the Minister of Labour. In announcing the decision, the Chairman said :—

"This young man's views are founded on false premises. He has become imbued with the idea that everybody in the Army hates everybody on the other side. Although his views are founded on false premises, they are none the less sincere."

John Pritchard, Egerton Road, Whally Range, Manchester, was registered unconditionally. Pritchard stated that he had been willing to lose his job for freedom of opinion. He explained that he had been definitely told by his employers that as he was not prepared to do his bit either by fighting or helping those who do fight he must look for another job. Several letters were read describing Pritchard's consistent pacifist attitude since at fourteen he refused to join the cadet corps at Hulme Grammar School, although his father wished him to join.

Pritchard's mother was in the Court and in the witness-box and expressed opposition to her son's views. Pritchard returned to the box and in reply to Alderman Aveling said he had done propaganda in the works and had had to give an undertaking to his departmental manager not to propagate pacifism in any way.

In announcing the decision that Pritchard should be registered unconditionally, Judge Burgis said :—

"We have felt considerable regret at seeing mother and son in the witness-box, and we hope nothing which may have been said to-day by either of them will tend to enstrange the relations between them. . . . This is the clearest case we have had before us. We have no doubt whatever that the applicant is a conscientious objector. There is no clearer test of the depth of a person's conviction than the fact that he is prepared to endure persecution and to suffer disadvantages."

Referring to the action of Pritchard's employers, Judge Burgis explained :—

"His employers have taken the view, and we do not feel they can be criticised, that it is impossible to maintain the discipline of their works if there is someone there carrying on propaganda opposed to the views of those who are working in their works. I do not doubt that he has carried on this propaganda knowing they were not going to tolerate it. All this is evidence of his courageous outlook and the depth of his opinions. It is only in that aspect that this question of his dismissal is relevant."

The case of Alan White, a student at Manchester University, who was registered unconditionally, had been adjourned to enable him to clarify his attitude to the R.A.M.C.

The Editor has been in correspondence with the Divisional Controller of the Ministry of National Service and Labour, with reference to the Glasgow Local Tribunal, and the defence of C.O.s before the Appeal Tribunal in Edinburgh. The correspondence will be published next month.

Reports of other N.C.L. Tribunals will appear in our next issue. We are obtaining full reports from all the centres. Order now and send along any data. The C.O. cases and decisions are both news and history.

THE WORD-TO THE WORLD!

(Written and Published by the Editor in "The New Spur," Dec. 1933. Reprinted by Request)

Many decades since, the word challenged an unbelieving world through the lips of a prophet thus: "Behold ye despisers—and perish for I work a work in your days which ye shall in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you."

The old-time prophet was poor and his authority was the inward wisdom generated of poverty. He died, as such men die, mourned by a multitude of half-believers, who yearned rather than understood. They were powerless from their very poverty. Generations later they were to be succeeded by semi-believers, who were to prove powerless from their very sense of comfort. There is a gulf widely fixed between a half-believer and a semi-believer. The first responds to the teaching and desire to believe the second despairs of the teaching and has no desire to believe but deems it wisdom to mock with his lips that which he dare not subscribe to in his mind or thought. Although even the half-believers were few, somehow the prophet's message lived. It still lives as it must live, until understanding brings power of achievement unto the poor.

Prophecy is a strange business. The vision of the prophet gives radiance to his word. It outlives the prophet himself. He dies scorned and neglected. His word continues and increases until the struggle ends in triumph. The man is mortal—a mere instrument. His word is the verity, and is embodied in the scheme of things that serves man by using men. One generation of unbelievers and despisers hear without understanding and scoff merrily; the second generation of those who scoff hear and perish: spiritually in themselves; materially and finally as a class. The epoch of critical poverty throws up the agitator or prophet to proclaim the doom of the idling world of exploitative luxury, and lends the power of working with the tools of poverty, the mean methods of starvation. The powerful cannot believe and even the poor find it hard to sense that the power of the word consists in the very poverty of its machinery. The Jews could not believe that Jesus was the Messiah because he came without arms and was clothed in rags and had not where to lay his head. How could truth obtain arms in a world of oppression and unctious self-interest? How should truth have where to lay its head when the palace was built on falsehood and the hovel rests on lies? Have not the parliamentarians urged that one must capture Parliament and the State Power and so inaugurate the revolution with the ceremonial robes of legal majesty? Did they not put their theory into operation in Germany? Behold! the Messiah came with pomp and ceremony, duly arrayed in purple and fine linen. He came; at first he was Mars, the God of War and the Son of Mammon. Then he became Nazism, reaction incarnate, the offspring of Parliamentarism. He came because the poor were blind and their leaders could not see.

He who has vision is more than an angel—he is a man and an agitator: not a serf, not a stomach, not a brain subordinate to digestion: but a man, a mortal arrayed in the invincible armour of light. His manhood stamps his word with authority. Friedrich Nietzsche, greatest of Anti-Christians, has revealed the power of the word in his poem:—

There the gallows, rope, and hooks,
And the hangman's beard is red:
People round and poisoned looks,
Nothing new and nothing dread!
Know it well, from fifty sources,
Laughing in your face I cry:
Would you hang me? Save your forces!
Why kill me who cannot die?
Beggars ye! Who hate the tougher
Man who holds the envied lot;
True I suffer, true I suffer—
As to you—ye rot, ye rot.
I am breath, dew, all sources,
After fifty hangings; why!
Would you hang me? Save your forces!
Why kill me who cannot die?

The same idea is well expressed by Ferdinand Freiligrath in "The Angel of Revolution":—

Ye see me in the cell, ye see me only in the grave;
Ye see me only wandering lone beside the exile's weary wave;
Ye fools! Do I not also dwell where ye have sought to pierce in vain?
Rests not a niche for me in every heart, in every brain?
In every brow that brooding thinks, erect with manhood's honest pride?
Does not each bosom shelter me that beats with honour's generous tide?
Not every workshop brooding woe, not every heart that shelters grief;
For am I not the breath of life that pants and struggles for relief?

Nietzsche and Freiligrath both express the revolutionary early Christian idea. Says Proudhon outlining the history of that idea:—

All at once, a man appeared calling himself the "Word of God." It is not known to this day who he was, whence he came, or what suggested to him his ideas. He went about proclaiming everywhere that the end of existing society was at hand; that the world was about to experience a new birth; that the priests were vipers, the lawyers ignoramuses, and the philosophers hypocrites and liars; that masters and slaves were equals; that usury and everything akin to it was robbery; that proprietors and idlers would one day burn, while the poor and pure in heart would find a haven of peace.

"Society was saved by the negation of its own principles, by a revolution in its religion, and by violation of its most sacred rights. In this revolution the idea of Justice spread to an extent that had not been dreamed of before never to return to its original limits. Heretofore Justice had existed only for masters; it then commenced to exist for the slaves."

The word, seemingly declared in vain, becomes manifest in the flesh. Even when the critics of the messenger denounce his teachings most vigorously they pronounce his message most definitely. A certain school of freethought, not content with its many excellent attacks on superstition, thought it ncessary to deny all virtue to early Christianity. This school is very much opposed to my activity in the press and on the platform. It forgets that when G. W. Foote was indicted for blasphemy, his main and most excellent argument was that Jesus had been indicted for blasphemy before him. It may come as a surprise to this school of Freethought to read the following extract, culled from "Acid Drops," published in The Freethinker of June 17, 1889, page 193:—

"Christian Socialism was explained at St. Catherine's Church, Rotherhithe, last Sunday afternoon by the Rev. Stewart D. Headlam. Christianity is Socialism, said Mr. Headlam. So it is, if we are to go by the New Testament. But it is not Mr. Headlam's Socialism. Christian Socialism, as taught by Jesus and practised by the primitive Church, is downright Communism.

"Now, Mr. Headlam, do be honest and go the whole hog. Half-and-half measures are unworthy a man of your spirit."

Foote's evangel was very limited. Although his followers would deny it, his interest in life was essentially theological. Atheism and Pantheism relate as much to theology as Deism, Theism, or Polytheism. The history of theology is a history of negation. The Idea of God destroys itself by a process of expansion. The Idea expands until God loses all his physical attributes in universal spiritually. He grows vaguer and vaguer until at last he gives up the ghost entirely. From being located in Heaven he grows into occupation of the entire universe. He ceases to occupy and begins to permeate the universe so as to occupy it more completely. His followers grow jealous not only of the universe but also of space. They identify him with space as well as matter. He expands into everything. Nothing he is not. Nothing he becomes. Until he becomes nothing, until his real definition and purely poetic existence is understood by the human mind generally, the atheist is as great a theologian as the theist. He spends his nights and days in company of this God that does not exist. He pretends an interest in the secular happiness of mankind. His interest is pretense. It is elementary, unformed, and purely pious. He has no real interest in the emancipation of the poor from poverty. God is his obscession. He is at no greater pains to make his dream complete so as to secure the secular wellbeing of every man, woman and child on earth, than is the Christian to realise the brotherhood of man. He is purely a theologian, of an advanced character, continuing the useful negative work of former heretical theologians, and setting up a small respectable Bethel of his own within the limitations of class society. Richard Carlile is to G. W. Foote as Jesus Christ is to a modern Anglican minister. I refrain from saying the Archbishop of Canterbury because I respect the fact that Foote was concerned with an idea and not merely a property sinecure. He bowed none the less before the cause of property and had no live enthusiasm for that of poverty. Richard Carlile was original. He set his cause on nought. Foote was merely conventional. He based his cause on the mediocre interests and current practice of conventional society. Christianity was false to Richard Carlile because it was untrue. That was his position, plain and flat. Christianity was false to Foote and to Charles Watts and others of the Secular and Rational Fraternity because it did not conform to society and was inconsistent with political reformism. The fact that he was not a Liberal in the English political sense was a serious secularist complaint against Jesus. The fact that he was not a Liberal like the late J. M. Robertson is an excellent recommendation of the teachings of Jesus to the consideration of working men. Bradlaugh and Foote never thought of that.

There are traditions about Jesus, recorded in the sermons and writings of the early fathers, that are not to be found in the New Testament. One such tradition is an excellent proletarian story. It is said that Jesus, as a child, played in Nazareth with a gibbet. He did many strange things with that cross of wood. Years later, those who loved his manhood, his mission, his way of living and of dying, regaled themselves with the wonder of his early plaything. The symbolism of it amazed them. It implied that he set his life on nought. He desired no fame, no military glory, no kingship, no power to destroy; only the power to influence through being destroyed. He literally set his cause to nought. A great Polish writer has passed the idea on to the working class. The ruling class prepares for their children many wonderful toys, all eulogistic of the capitalist system, symbols of pomp, circumstance and power. The worker's child gazes in the shop windows and anxiously desires these toys. His or her father made them so that his own offspring might not have them. Wonderful world! Wonderful Providence! Why not accept this irony of Providence? Why not give the child of the workers, if he resents injustice early, the toys of his future with which to play? Give him chains and let him play at wearing them. Give him handcuffs and let his wrists respond to the touch of steel. Let him have the wheelbarrow and so grow accustomed to pushing it. Permit him the hangman's rope so that he shall not dread it. Train him to solitude and let him grow articulate through silence. Let him shun fame and seek ignominy for ignominy is the workers' lot. Let him play at hue and cry. Let an unknown spy accuse and let the one accused defend himself before a perjured court. Children play at mothers and fathers, at schools, at Indians, and at play-acting. Why not at courts? Let the court give no heed to the truth the accused one tells. Let the spy and his employer have the last word and let the judge speak for the prosecution. Let the accused one make his poverty's garments look more poor. Let him play at standing before a tribunal of pomp. Let the judge steal a coloured tablecloth or curtain and wear it so that he may look ermined and respectable. Let the accused one pretend to be killed and to be buried far away from all his friends. Yes, let him anticipate in play his destiny.

Whoso is born poor and would be a prophet has all history for his guide. He knows what will be when he is dead. A cross in some men's hearts for a monument; a fragrant memory in place of a stone; a wilderness, his habitation and his grave. Girls weep for his memory and their tears are dried by charlatans.—Men talk of him a little—and the talk dwindles to nothingness. Such is the life and death of the prophet of the poor. Let the working class child play at the symbolism of his destiny. Maybe, in the knowledge of it he will grow up a Socialist, loyal to his class and loyal to truth; mild, serious, but not afraid. His anticipations will make him proof against disappointments. He will have mastered the mysticism that inspires the race of Messiahs. He will become a prophet without honour or reward. He will, lose the world and gain his own soul. His glory will be his shame before men.

"I have set my cause on nought." Such is the declaration of the prophet. It emphasises the power of his word. Not his word as a man, but his word as a messenger. It explains why the prophet disappoints all the world's conceptions of power and grandeur. The prophet's story is an ironic biography of unequal circumstance translated into an epic to please our childish wonder. Have not Whittier and Lowell, each in his own style, reserved for us wonderful pictures of William Lloyd Garrison's printing office, so meanly furnished, "in which the freedom of the race began"? One day, poets will romance about prophets no more. The marvellous stories will be collected as so much data from which to induce the philosophy of freedom. Liberty will be a fact, unquestioned and unquestionable, socially registered in the universally amiable terms of social revolution. The registration wil be very quiet and formal. It will be so tame and natural that it will be impossible to realise the agitation and crisis that was necessary to its achievement. Social revolution, for all the dread that men have of it is but the incidence of history. Anticipated by the lone voice of one crying in the wilderness, it moves forward like the thief in the night. In the immortal words of Proudhon, "like the Nemesis of old, whom neither threats nor prayers could move, the revolution advances, with sombre and inevitable tread, over the flowers with which its devotees strew its path, through the blood of its champions and over the bodies of its enemies." The revolution advances inevitably because it sets its cause on nought.

The great German philosopher, Kaspar Schmidt, better known under his pseudonym of Max Stirner, depicted the material poverty and spiritual completeness of the bearer of the word, in his challenge to the world: "I have set my cause on nought." The word is nought. The world is everything. But the world perishes and the word prevails. Caesar before Jesus; the Pope before Luther; Calvin before Servetus; Capital before Labour. Great is truth for the truth shall prevail.

PRISON: WHAT IT MEANS AND REQUIRES

AN ESSAY FOR CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

I. Genius in Prison.

Many of those who have made up their minds to resist war and military service, and who have declined to compromise by considering work of national importance, are wondering what the future has in store for them. Could their generation have escaped war, the lives of these enemies of authority would have been protected, conventional and respected. Until the Government challenged their consciences with compulsory calls to militarism and war, these persons had no idea of rebellion, passive or active. Resistence to authority was an idea that never occurred to them. Now all this is changed. True, when governments descend into war, they change the life of every human being in the belligerent countries. But ordinary folk look forward to army life, and to death on the battlefield, with more equanimy than they look forward to imprisonment even in war time. Militarism is harsh and involves regimentation. But it is according to rule and represents the normal man's response to abnormal conditions. It keeps to the ruts. Collectively we do not think. Militarism and uniforms become the fashion. When the trumpet sounds, the great majority respond. Marching to disaster becomes the herd-like impulse. It is very difficult to keep out of step. Thought is an individual function and imposes a double burden on the unfortunate thinker. He is stamped as a creature of anti-social tendency because he stands apart from his fellows. The sensitiveness which causes him to question war and the claims of the State upon his allegiance, even unto murder, does not belong to the criminal mind. Psychologically, the C.O. does not belong to the prison type. He faces the realisation that his destiny is to be fulfilled in prison with uncanny dread. Death indeed would be preferable even though less useful. It is good to go to prison. It is good to survive prison. It is good to return from prison and to plan to end the prison system for ever.

This article specially addresses itself to conscientious objectors. The writer does not intend to describe his own prison experiences. Instead of depicting his own reaction over a period of eight years, to the horrors, the sorrows, and humours of jail life, he proposes to roam through history, and to refer to some of the masterpieces of the writer's thought, that were the direct consequences of imprisonment. The solitude of jail has proven often the needed stimulus of genius.

Amongst those who are anticipating imprisonment for conscience, there may be some possessed of a latent power that imprisonment will energise into expression. That power may be stirring within them already, and they may wish to learn of that astonishing company, the old world men of talent, who had their lives branded and their gifts marked with the prison stain. The story takes us to many lands, and represents a thread running through the ages.

There was Charles of Orleans, whom the English captured after an unfortunate charge at Agincourt. He spent twenty-five years in exiled-captivity at Windsor, and later, at Pomfret Castle. He was rhyming ever in his native tongue; and his songs and poems place him in the front rank of French medieval poets. Then there is Sir Walter Raleigh, although doomed, a somewhat indulged prisoner. Dishonoured because a great adventure, which proved to be his last, had failed, he spent his days in the Tower of London, waiting the end, writing a History of the World. We have all heard of the great deeds of gallantry of Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table. Only some of us know that the story was composed by Sir Thomas Malory. How many know that Sir Thomas was a victim of the Wars of the Roses and that his Morte d'Arthur was composed in captivity? Have we not all heard of Paganini? It is said that he acquired his superhuman mastery of the violin because he was compelled to practise on a single string in prison.

One of the favourite instruments used in his days of fame by Paganini was a violin made by Guiseppe Guarnieri, the greatest maker of violins after the master, Stradivari. Guarnieri also landed in prison, and all the hope of making those marvellous violins which had been his glory and his fame was taken from him. Then comes the story of how genius found a way. The jailer's daughter procured wood, of various kinds, tools, mostly bad, varnish. All these things she begged. She gave them to the fallen master craftsman and in his dim barred cell he set himself to make violins as he had done in the days of his glory.

The mention of Guiseppe Antonio Guarnieri (1683-1745), the greatest genius of his family, recalls the name of another craftsman, Benvenuto Cellini (1500-71). For purposes of registration, Cellini was a goldsmith, sculptor, and author. He excelled in all three crafts. He was also a warrior and a man of genius. Behind the pose of braggart, he concealed a miraculous ease of mastery in art and crime. He proved that a braggart is not always a coward; nor yet need he be destitute of ability. Cellini was in and out of prison many times. He knew the meaning of repeated imprisonment if not of the truly civilised, truly legal repeated sentence. During his prison spells he found consolation and philosophy in the Bible, in the writing of wonderful prose and as wonderful verse. Because of the knack with which he could beat out a cup or set a ring he was permitted not only to divert himself with hammer and graver. Thus he won the forgiveness of the popes and princes who had sentenced him. Cellini's greatness saved him from ending his days in prison as it saved him from ending his life on the scaffold. The genius of Oscar Wilde brought him to his doom.

Conscientious Objectors are not likely to give much heed to the shade of the immortal John Bunyan. Certainly, he was a soldier as well as a preacher. Yet his dourness for conscience is worthy of recalling and the memory of him will encourage much through hours of gloom. Bunyan spent twelve years of his life in prison as the price of his nonconformity, and for his examples of conscience. His trials are magnificent, for the way in which he defends the laymen and attacks the professional mind, whether cleric or jurist. He may have been a narrow scholar but he was a brave thinker. The law said he must not preach and Bunyan said that he must preach. He would compromise nothing and demanded that the State withdraw its invasion of his conscience. He went to prison without genuine trial, because the right, in law, of the State to decree could not be challenged. The State gave itself absolute power. To Bunyan we owe much of that liberty the present war is attempting to steal from us.

Denied the right to preach from the pulpit, Bunyan took up the pen. He has handed down to us books of unequal worth and of dubious and now discarded theology. In their happy portrayal of human nature, they are as great as the works of Dickens. Bunyan satirised all the follies of mankind and left us pictures of his contemporaries, magistrates, clerics, politicians, saints and sinners, and commonplace citizens, that are immortal. Bunyan the genius and convict has given to us that immortal character we know so well. He is a member of every church and a strong supporter of the Labour Party. His name, thanks to John Bunyan, is known to us all. It is Mr. Worldlywiseman.

Bunyan's theology makes him seem a tiresome person. The range of famous convicts afford plenty of scope for more attractive personalities. Everyone has heard of Robinson Cruseo. This may not be the greatest work of Daniel Defoe but it ranks as his best-known. Defoe once wrote a very unwise political pamphlet and so languished in Newgate Prison. His capacity for producing prison literature gave him a means of vague communion with the world of free men. Behind prison bars he actually edited and produced a kind of periodical, his "Review," which continued after his release and grew into nine large volumes. This "Review" founded in prison became the model of Steel's famous "Papers."

More worthy of being recalled is the name of the immortal Cervantes, the creator of "Don Quixote." Then there is Voltaire who composed one of his greatest works from the Bastille. Less fortunate, alas, for mankind, was Roger Bacon, the father of philosophy and of science, denied the means of writing even to the smallest extent because the darkness of authority feared the brilliant reflections of his fettered and imprisoned genius.

In his prison cell the conscientious objector has roamed through the centuries and communed with the ghosts of many illustrious convicts. He has seen the crowded fools' parade of suffering: all that is sombre and purely great, and much that is at once great and charlatan. Wit and scholarship, rogue and craftsman, all mingle to make one amazing personality mocking his drab garb of shame. If he will leap the centuries as he ponders through the endurance, the conscientious objector may vision Oscar Wilde, no longer mocking, but fallen from his jesting high estate and eating out his soul in Reading Gaol, planning his tremendously true and semi-fictional "Ballad of Reading Gaol," and writing that strange, sad apology for his life, "De Profundis."

There must be few who do not know the story of Wilde. How he captured London by his glamour of words as playwright, essayist, and wit! How his audacity turned to folly, and a worse man than himself, an uncouth man of title devoid of genius, angered him and trapped him to his doom. In 1895 came the setting of his sun. The sentence was two years hard labour, which Wilde endured and survived, only that he might die five years later in Paris, an exile living in poverty, charity and disgrace. In prison he maintained his courage by his pride of intellect and with magic words endeavoured to make a bravely pitiful appearance of mastering the doom that had fallen upon him. His last witticism, uttered to a friend in a Paris cafe just before his death, applies with even more force to his period in prison than to the few years he lived afterwards. "You see," he said with a strange smile, "I am dying beyond my means." Fortunately this can never be said of a man who goes to prison for his principles. He is oppressed by an opposed inertia that he might give vitality to human endeavour, social and individual. He suffers darkness that he might become a light unto the world. He faces destruction gladly because there dwells within him that which cannot be extinguished. He is of the immortal choir invisible that gives harmony to the universe.

Of those who go to prison from misfortune and class persecution, become rogues from temperament and economic duress, yet retain some peculiar spark from manhood or womanhood some indestructible element of character and individuality, it may be said that they struggle and endure beyond their means. Their stories become tragedies, only understood when death ends their careers. They must die to be understood. Such was Thomas Dowd.

To be Concluded.

Owing to printing changes and difficulties, the Trade Union Scandal matter and an important essay by the Editor has been postponed for a later, but early, issue.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Comrade Aldred,—

Allow me to thank you for the copies of THE WORD. I also wish to congratulate you on having produced a "Journal" which gives revolutionary socialists something which the other socialist papers don't give. Our "New Leader," I expect you get it, is valuable for the day to day struggle against Capitalism.

THE WORD gives history which, in my opinion, is helpful to younger socialists like myself, who don't remember much about the last blood bath.

I wish your THE WORD every success in its work. I notice one of your correspondents says that the money spent on "this filthy rag would be better spent on the Left Book Club, etc." I think, perhaps, it would be better that valuable money be spent on "Journals" such as THE WORD.

I enclose donation towards same. With all good wishes.

Yours very sincerely,

12 Rose Square, JOHN F. WEST.
Ferryden, Montrose, November 20.

[Councillor West has been doing splendid propaganda for Socialist thought and the N.C.L. in Forfarshire. An account of I.L.P. and N.C.L. activity in this county will appear in an early issue.—Ed.]

Dear Guy,—Thanks for December WORD, which was excellent. Hope some of the addresses I sent out have proven useful. I mean not merely subscribers, but sellers and distributors. Which is much more important. For THE WORD is the only really No-Conscription paper there is.

The NEW LEADER is a political paper. No-Conscription is only a side-issue with the I.L.P., owing to the tradition existing in the party from the last war. Even up to the U.S.S.R. invasion of Finland, the I.L.P. was putting it forward as the party line, that the workers of the world must defend the "Socialist Fatherland"; quite oblivious of the fact that there had been a steady and consistent departure from Socialism for many years. Since 1919 in fact. Not that there had been, at any time, since the Bolshevik Revolution, any liberty of the press, meeting, or individual rights. Now, circumstances ought to drive the I.L.P. leadership into some sort of political consistency. The I.L.P. leaders and "intellectuals" can no longer plead that they are defending Communism in defending the U.S.S.R.!

If the I.L.P. stands for individual rights against the State military and industrial machine during war, why not all the time? Peace under Capitalism is only an interval between wars. The political virus seems to have got so thoroughly into the I.L.P. members' blood, that they cannot free themselves from the fetish of the State. They cling to all the old fly-blown tags of getting the right men into power—which is, of course, themselves—and then everything will be well! Forgetting that, if the individual has the right to-day, under Capitalism, to resist the State invasion, that same right must remain invulnerable under any condition.

One thing, I think and feel, is certain. The present war, and the crisis that must arise out of it, will force all honest Socialists to reconsider their position. It will disillusion them of the folly of hoping to gain their emancipation through the Capitalist carcerist machine, Parliament!

I hope we will both be alive to see that day. Papers like THE WORD will make that day possible. Therefore, I hope you will secure the support you deserve. So far as I am able, I will do all I can, to get new subscribers, and to sell and circulate as many copies as possible. On with the Fight. All good wishes.

Yours For Freedom,

MATT. KAVANAGH.

Southend-on-Sea, January 5, 1940.

Dear Comrade,—Through the introduction of comrade McCarthy, I have had much pleasure in reading copies of THE WORD. Both the above comrade and myself are members of the local I.L.P. branch, and we consider your paper one of the best regarding reports of C.O. Tribunals.

Your reports and exposures of the Sham Labour Party, Dollan, Morrison, & Co., are excellent. I am beginning to think, and to hope, that the rank and file are awakening, at last, to the true facts. So there is hope in that quarter yet.

In conclusion, may I wish, on my own behalf, and that of many more true Socialists, the best of luck to your efforts in the future.

Yours fraternally,

HAROLD BUTTERS.

WHEN GLASGOW WORKERS DEMONSTRATED AGAINST WAR AND CONSCRIPTION

MASS MEETING OF ANTI-CONSCRIPTIONISTS HELD ON GLASGOW GREEN YESTERDAY

The above heading is from "The Bulletin." The letterpress beneath the block read:—"A snapshot of the crowd at an open-air meeting held on the Green yesterday and addressed by anti-conscriptionist speakers, one of whom is figured on the right. The place was the base of the Nelson Monument, chosen no doubt with a certain ironical intent, seeing that Nelson won Trafalgar with the help of pressed men.—'Bulletin' Photos."

A DEMONSTRATION THAT WAS SUPPORTED BY THE PRESENT LORD-PROVOST DOLLAN

On Sunday, January 30, 1916, a demonstration was organised by the Glasgow Trades and Labour Council against the war and conscription. The Glasgow Bulletin for Monday, Jan. 31st, 1916, published two pictures of the meeting: one showing the denseness of the crowd which thronged the Glasgow Green to voice its opposition; the other, showing one of the platforms from which the audience was addressed. This huge demonstration was supported by Councillor Dollan, then a member of the I.L.P., and an opponent of the war and conscription. Dollar delayed his personal fight against conscription til 1917 as is made clear in previous issues, in which we published full reports of his trial before the Stipendiary and the High Court Appeal. Subseqently Dollan made a very short sojourn in Wormwood Scrubs prison and wrote an account of his "reception" and experience in the Forward

EDITOR EXPLAINS ERRATA

The Christmas issue was produced under circumstances of stress and storm. We obtained premises after a vain search of the city, installed a press, and printed on a press with which we were utterly unfamiliar. The result was good for part-amateurs. But it was not good enough. Some copies had more errors than others. The last batch issued was guillotined neatly and well-finished. An apology for errata is due to most readers. Here are the corrections.

All the letters and all the words that should be there are placed beneath the front-page block, ridiculing a favourite question posed by the Tribunal. But half-a-line was transposed and the wording is muddled. The correct wording reads:—

"The above illustration and letter-press are reprints from The Spur, April, 1916. Question was a favourite one with members of the Military Service Tribunal to conchies of that time. A short article, written by the cartoonist, accompanied the article, discussing the expediency of dodging the point!"

The third column of page 34, first paragraph, reporting the Edinburgh Cases had two lines inserted wrongly from page 35. The paragraph went wrong in the page proofs. It should have read:—

"Harvey was asked what he thought would happen to the country if all the young men had similar views. He replied that he thought it would mean the salvation of this country."

In some issues page 42 does not follow on from page 41. In these cases the readers should place these lines at the top of page 42, opening the paragraph:—

"The Sheriff—Suppose there was an air raid and people were injured, would you regard it as wrong and contrary to your beliefs to give the injured any assistance?—If I did so in a casual way I would do what I could to prevent human beings from suffering, and that would be an end to it. But if I joined some body, civil or military, to alleviate suffering in war-time I would be to some extent supporting the

THE BISHOP OF BIRMINGHAM

Dr. Barnes, Bishop of Birmingham, has addressed wo powerful letters to the Manchester Guardian, eplying to the Chairman of the Newcastle Tribunal, nd stating the Christian attitude towards war and conscientious objection. Dr. Barnes defends the bsolutist position with firmness, understanding, and lear historical approach. He writes not as a fanatic ut as a thinker and a scholar. The views enunciated y Dr. Barnes are defended by another great scholar, Professor C. J. Cadoux.

It would be a mistake, in the space at our disposal, o attempt to summarise the Bishop of Birmingham's statement. So we propose to make this contribution o the literature of Christian thought a feature of the ext issue. Dr. Barnes, attacked in the past for his heological heresy, takes his stand, at this time of crisis, s a political heretic. In this way he establishes his laim to rank not only as a Christian scholar but also s a Christian thinker.

If we must have Bishops, their function should be o think and to aid the democracy to think; to inspire s towards right social living and to develop our visdom and sulture by their scholarship; to promote a live understanding of the inspiration of conscience nd the one-ness of humanity against the dull, complacent world-liness amid which we live. Bishops should not serve cless iimperialisms nd war but humanity and so define in their lives the Christian ethic proclaimed so long ago. They should make the universe warm with love, service and understanding.

So far as we know, alone among the Bishops, Dr. Barnes has taken his stand. Not theologically or superstitiously, but symbolically and actually Dr. Barnes has taken his stand: against Caesar and war. He proclaimed his position simply and directly. For this we honour him.

SENTENCED TO DEATH

STORY OF THE OBJECTORS WHO WERE TRANSFERRED TO FRANCE

STUART BEAVIS

FRED MURFIN.

Three of the C.O.'s Sentenced to Death in 1916

[In the Christmas "Word," we listed the names of the men sentenced to death in 1916. The following article relates their sufferings, experiences, and stand.—Editor.]

The story of the thirty-seven conscientious objectors who were transferred to France in May, 1916, and of the thirty who were sentenced to death, has been told well by Hubert W. Peet. We summarise his story.

Whilst conscription was passing through the House of Commons, the highest civil authorities promised that no conscientious objector would be transferred from Britain. The undertaking was given because it was known that such transference meant the death sentence for the genuine conscientious objector. The military authorities rode rough-shod over the parliamentary pledges, and the conscientious objectors were transferred to France from Landguard Fort, Harwich; from Richmond, Yorks.; and from Seaford.

The first rumours of the intended transference reached the No Conscription Fellowship from Harwich, where a party of conscientious objectors were in irons at Landguard Fort. Definite information was received that the Non Combatant Corps, and its C.O. prisoners, were on their way to Southampton. This warning reached the N.C.F. in a letter, thrown out of the train by one of the ordinary N.C.C. men, while it was passing through a London suburb. The letter was posted by unknown hands and the facts became public property.

The party was delayed at Southampton, by the discovery of an outbreak of measles in the corps. Mr. Asquith, then Prime Minister, telegraphed to Southampton, ordering the retention of the C.O.s in Britain. But the prisoners had been separated from the other men and shipped to Havre. The Army authorities intended to make an "example" of them, it would seem.

They were technically "released" after leaving England. Their first real contest with the Military Authorities came on May 10. It was then that 17 of the Landguard party, alone in the midst of the B.E.F., began their refusal to be coerced into being soldiers.

On the parade ground at Cinder City, this May morning, an extraordinary scene was witnessed. The C.O.s were hustled into their places in different parts of the ranks. The order, "Right turn! Quick march!" was shouted. The company moved briskly off! But dotted on the parade ground were seventeen conscientious objectors still in their original positions. This was actually and symbolically true. These men stood in their original positions to the end, the bulwark of the protest against war and militarism, tested, well tested, and not found wanting.

Physical ill-treatment, bullying, and threatening ensued. Here and there an ordinary private whispered: "Stick it!" Finally, the party of C.Os were split up. Some of the men were ordered 28 days' Field Punishment No. 1. They were marched to the Field Punishment Camp at Harfleur. They refused to work in the quarry and were returned to the main camp.

SOME OF THE C.O.'s SENT TO FRANCE IN 1916.

Hubert Peet described the subsequent happenings by quoting from the account of his experiences, written by one of the men who stood firm:

> "The Quartermaster Sergeant had us each handcuffed to a tent with our hands round the pole behind us, which made the shoulders ache to a quite excruciating degree. The young Canadian, who had been so hostile the previous evening, came up. He broke into a torrent of curses at the authorities who imposed such penalties. After three hours, one of the handcuffs was unlocked to enable me to feed myself, after which the punishment was again inflicted."

Finally, hands were handcuffed in front. "Crucifixion" followed.

> "Each of us was placed with our backs to the framework, consisting of uprights at intervals of four or five yards, and cross-beams at a height of about five feet from the ground. Our ankles were tied together and our arms then tied tightly at the wrists to the cross-beams; and we were prepared to remain in this position for the next two hours."

"Crucifixion," on the second evening, was in a different part of the camp.

> "We were placed with our faces to the barbed wire of the inner fence. As the ropes with which we were tied fastened round the barbed wire instead of the usual thick wooden post, it was possible to tie them much more tightly, and I found myself drawn so closely to the fence that when I wished to turn my head I had to do so very cautiously to avoid my face being torn by the barbs. To make matters less comfortable, it came on to rain and cold wind blew straight across the top of the hill."

In imposing this sentence, the Commandant explained:—

"I have no special instructions about C.O.s. I shall treat you as ordinary soldiers."

The shamefulness of this sentence did not consist in the suggestion that C.O.s should be treated as ordinary soldiers. The shame was that any Commandant could sentence an ordinary soldier to such punishment, for the merest trivial offence.

The prisoners were hurried back to Cinder City and told that they were being sent to Boulogne, en route for the front line, "where you will be shot if you continue to disobey orders."

In the eyes of the soldiers and the guard, the threat was no idle one. The following weeks were big with a very real danger to these determined objectors.

Arrived at Boulogne, the men were taken direct to the Field Punishment Barracks, a disused fish market near the Quay. They refused to work. They were placed on bread and water diet, in dark and disgracefully crowded punishment cells. Their arms were handcuffed behind their backs for certain periods. They suffered one imposition of "crucifixion." And they still discussed: The existence of the Devil; the truth of Marx; the merits of Esperanto; the influence of Tolstoy; vaccination.

Meantime, two further parties of conscientious objectors had been sent from France, straight to the Henriville Camp, outside Boulogne. They were placed immediately in the guardroom.

As a result of agitation at home, the War Office permitted Dr. F. B. Meyer and Hubert Peet to cross to Boulogne to see the prisoners, on Wednesday, June 7, 1916. Three days before the C.O.s at Henriville had been warned, solemnly, that continued resistance would result in death. Stuart Beavis smuggled a letter out to his mother. It read:—

"Just a line. We have been warned to-day that we are now within the war zone, and the military authorities have absolute power, and disobedience may be followed by very severe penalties, and very possibly the death penalty, so I just drop you a line in case they do not allow me to write after to-morrow. Do not be downhearted if the worst comes to the worst; many have died cheerfully before for a worse cause.—Stuart."

For circulating copies of this letter, H. Runham Brown was prosecuted under Dora, and "deemed to be fined £50 or imprisoned for two months." His case caused questions to be asked both in House of Commons and the House of Lords and led to debates in both Houses of Parliament.

The seventeen C.O.s who had been taken to France first were each warned. A list was read out to them of men who had been shot already for disobedience.

Hubert Peet was allowed no communication with the imprisoned C.O.s. Colonel Wilberforce, the Base Commandant, finally permitted him to shake hands with four men he knew personally. Dr. Meyer was allowed to speak briefly to the prisoners in the presence of the Commandant and an imposing and impatient staff.

At this time, the prisoners had been court-martialled, but not "read out." Ten days later, J. Rowntree Gillett, who acted as Quaker Chaplain, brought back the news that the death sentences had been passed, though commuted to 10 years' penal servitude.

The writer of the diary, already quoted by Peet, describes the "reading out":—

"On Monday, the 9th June, we were informed we were to be read out. We found an escort waiting us in the courtyard below . . . We turned towards the outskirts of the town, and climbed one of the hills overlooking it, which affords a wide view of the Channel. I cast many a glance in the direction of the white cliffs of Dover, for this might be our last opportunity. We turned into the midst of a huge military camp and many curious eyes, evidently puzzled by our cheerful demeanour under such circumstances, followed us as we made our way to a large open space in the middle, 150 yards or more square, and evidently used as a parade ground . . . After a wait of perhaps three-quarters of an hour, the various groups of soldiers began to form themselves into three sides of a huge square until several thousands were present . . . When an appropriate hush had been arranged, the Adjutant, who was to read out the sentence, took charge . . . 'Private ——, No. ——, of the 2nd Eastern Company Non-Combatant Corps, tried by Field Court-Martial for disobedience whilst undergoing field punishment. Sentenced to death by being shot."—(Here a pause.) 'Confirmed by General Sir Douglas Haig'—a longer pause)—'and commuted to ten years' penal servitude." . . . I was number three on the list, and as I stepped forward I caught a glimpse of my paper as it was handed to the Adjutant. Printed at the top in large red letters, and doubly underlined, was the word 'Death.'

"I can hardly analyse the feelings that flashed through my mind as I caught sight of the word. They could certainly not be described as an emotion. I had faced the possibility of a death sentence before, and now accepted the fact almost without concern, whilst my mind was occupied mechanically and dispassionately with considering the immediate practical effects. It would be a great trial for Mother. My sister would have to leave school. People in England would make a great fuss. The thought of why I should receive a different sentence from the others did not occur to me. I simply accepted it as a fact. . . .

"'And commuted to ten years' penal servitude.' So it was not so after all!

"But as I stood listening to the sentences of the rest of our party, the feeling of joy and triumph surged up within me, and I felt proud to have the privilege of being one of that small company of C.O.s testifying to a truth which the world has not yet grasped, but which it would one day treasure as a most precious inheritance."

"These men aren't normal. Look at the shape of their heads!" Colonel Wilberforce said to Hubert Peet before he left Boulogne.

THE BISHOP OF BIRMINGHAM

Dr. Barnes Defends Absolute Opposition to War

The Manchester Guardian for Thursday, December 7, 1939, published a report of one of many of Judge Richardson's indiscretions as Chairman of the Newcastle Tribunal. The next day Dr. Barnes, Bishop of Birmingham, wrote a powerful letter to the Guardian, which appeared in the columns of our contemporary on Monday, December 11, 1939.

Dr. Barnes summarised the incident:—

"It would appear that on Wednesday a man applied to the Newcastle tribunal that he might be registered as a conscientious objector. He was supported by a friend who said that it was not Christian to take up arms. 'How dare you presume that?' said Judge Richardson. 'There are plenty of good Christians helping to remedy the evil of aggression.' Finally the Judge expressed his opionion of the two men who described themselves as 'Jehovah's witnesses,' by saying, 'You are a lot of cranks'."

Dr. Barnes then poses the direct Christian challenge to Judge Richardson and to the militarists of Church and State in the following trenchant terms:—

"Does the Judge know that for the first two and a half centuries of its history the Christian Church was predominantly pacifist? A careful examination of this question by a first-rate scholar is to be found in the book, 'The Early Christian Attitude to War,' published by Professor C. J. Cadoux in 1919. If it be thought that Professor Cadoux uses the evidence mistakenly, I would refer to the 'Cambridge Ancient History,' vol. xii., 1939, page 659, where, at any rate as regards the leaders of the Church, his conclusions are accepted. Take a concrete instance. Does anyone think that Marcus Aurelius, 'the saint of paganism,' persecuted the Christians merely because they did not worship Jupiter, Mars, Venus and the rest of the traditional gods? The offence of the Christians was a refusal to offer incense to the genius of the Emperor or to the genius of Rome, a refusal to serve in the armies of the State even against what at that time was literally 'the menace of German barbarism.'

"Judge Richardson's words were addressed to men known as 'Jehovah's witnesses.' Such are members of an organisation called the International Bible Students' Association. Their approach to the New Testament differs widely from my own. They regard it as verbally inspired: my own attitude is that adopted by modern critical scholars. But we agree in our conviction that Christ forbade his followers to do wrong that good might come. We agree, therefore, that Christians ought not to serve in the Army. We agree that even to join the R.A.M.C. is to belong to an organisation forbidden to Christians. We must serve the State by our prayers and give such 'civilian' help as the Christian conscience will allow. Such was the early Christian attitude, as the perusal of a famous passage in Origen's 'Contra Celsum' (ca. A.D. 420) will demonstrate: such is the attitude of present-day Christian pacifists."

Dr. Barnes proceeds to ask Judge Richardson, if, when he calls the Jehovah Witnesses "cranks" for opposing war and militarism, he knows what is happening in Germany. More than 6,000 Jehovah Witnesses are interned in Germany, with Jews, criminals, "and the depraved," for refusing to bear arms in defence of Hitlerism. They are nicknamed "Bible bugs" and wear a lilac or violet badge. The recent British White Paper on the "Treatment of German Nationals in Germany, 1938-39" (Cmd. 6120), mentions these men always with respect.

The White Paper states that they are "proscribed by the Gestapo since they refuse military service." It describes "their courage and religious faith" as "remarkable." It explains: "They are allowed no communication with the outside world."

It must be clear that, if Jehovah's Witnesses are to be applauded for opposing war in Germany, they cannot be condemned for refusing to assist militarism in Britain.

Comments Dr. Barnes:—

"Cranks? I suggest that such pacifists are rather enduring and praying for the Europe that is to be, a group of nations forswearing war and living in unity and peace."

The italics, in the passage referring to the early Christians, are ours. We wish to emphasise the fact that anti-militarism was the offence for which the early Christians were martyred.

S. Simpson, Russell St., Brandon Colliery, County Durham, was one of the Jehovah's Witnesses whom Dr. Barnes defended in his letter. Simpson appealed on Tuesday, December 19, to the London Appeal Tribunal. He was represented by Mr. R. Fuller, a London solicitor, who belonged to the Jehovah's Witnesses. Fuller produced Dr. Barnes' letter.

Sir Leonard Costello—The Bishop of Birmingham points out that a great many of your faith have been put in concentration camps?—That is world-wide; not only in Germany.

Would you be content to allow the same thing to happen here without opposition from anyone?—They are content to do it in Germany.

They have no power to do otherwise. Do you suggest that no one in this country should resist an invasion by a ruthless and unscrupulous enemy?—Yes, so far as we are concerned.

Do you think other people should resist?—That is their responsibility. As Christians we should not resist.

You are suggesting there are no Christians in the Army?—Emphatically there are none, otherwise they would not be slaughtering their fellow-men.

Isn't that a little intolerant?—No. That is according to the Scriptures.

The Tribunal dismissed the appeal.

Opponents of Dr. Barnes challenged the scholarship and veracity of Professor C. J. Cadoux, to whom the Bishop had referred. Replying to these critics, Professor Cadoux pointed out that his two works, The Early Christian Attitude to War, and The Early Church and The World, aimed at being strictly historical, presenting and summarising evidence. Professor Cadoux added that the terms employed by the early Church Fathers in denouncing bloodshed excluded participation in warfare.

Professor Cadoux explained:—

"Tertullian certainly had a horror of the contamination by pagan worship to which Christians in the armies were exposed. But he also makes it perfectly clear that he had an equally strong objection to the killing. This comes out quite definitely, both in his pre-Montanist work 'De Idololatria' and in his Montanist work 'De Corona Militis.' Neither Origen nor Lactantius, in dealing with the question of military service for Christians, even mentions the danger of idolatry: they both concentrate on the iniquity of bloodshed. Origen in particular (about A.D. 248) is concerned to reply to the complaint of the heathen philosopher Celsus, who (about A.D. 178) had criticised Christians for refusing to serve in the Imperial armies. Presumably Celsus, like Origen, knew that their objection to military service was mainly humanitarian. Yet both Celsus and Origen wrote as if refusal to serve was the general attitude of the Christians of their day."

It was asserted that Dr. Barnes' translation "Blessed are the pacifists" was a "serious misquotation" of Matthew V.9. Professor Cadoux denied that this was so. He added:—

"It is perhaps not a happy rendering, since the word 'pacifist' raises a host of modern associations: but linguistically it is the exact equivalent of the Greek word used, and, seeing that Jesus was in all essentials himself a pacifist in our sense of the term (see 'The Congregational Quarterly,' January, 1936, pages 58-67, for the evidence in detail), the bishop's translation cannot be ruled out as incorrect, in deference to 'the recorded translation.' And, in any case, what authority has a translation by virtue of the fact that it is 'recorded'?"

Writing from the Bishop's Hostel, Lincoln, the Rev. Patrick Blakiston supports the Bishop's attitude, by stating that there are other pacifists among the ante-Nicene Christian writers, besides Tertullian, Origen, and Lactantius:—

"'Thou wishest to make war,' says Tatian, 'and thou takest Apollon as thy counsellor in murder.' [xix, 849.] Apparently to Tatian murder and war are one and the same thing. Minucius Felix states: 'It is not right for us either to see or hear of a man being slain.' [xxx. 6.] St. Cyprian speaks of wars scattered everywhere with the bloody horror of camps.' 'The world,' he says, 'is wet with mutual bloodshed, and homicide is a crime when individuals commit it, but it is called a virtue when it is carried on publicly.' [Donat, 6.] To conclude, 'Fraud, adultery, homicide is mortal sin.' [Bon. Pat. 14.] Arnobius affirms that 'We, a numerous band of men as we are, have learned from His teaching and His laws that evil ought not to be requited with evil, that it is better to suffer wrong than to inflict it, that we should rather shed our own blood than stain our hands and conscience with that of another.' [Adv. Gent. i. 6.]

"That these are not just the voices of individuals may be shown by the rules laid down in the Egyptian and Syrian Church Orders and in the Canons of Hippolytus, which forbid Christians to join the Army. Finally, there is Maximilianus, saint and martyr of the Catholic Church, who in the year 295 at the age of 21 laid down his life for Christ as a conscientious objector."

Against this historic statement one correspondent quoted Article 37, which insisted that war was lawful in order to combat the Anti-Militarist views of the Anabaptists.

Dr. Barnes answered very effectively by declaring that the Articles of Religion of the Church of England were not decisive against the ancient (and modern) Christian refusal of military service. He added:—

"What are the facts? In article 37, entitled 'Of the Civil Magistrates,' there appears, after a number of other statements, the assertion that 'it is lawful for Christian men, at the commandment of the magistrate, to wear weapons, and serve in the wars.' The Elizabethan framers of the articles had a nice sense of words and were not wholly ignorant of the early history of the Christian Church. So they contented themselves with a platitude. Military service, when commanded by the State, is obviously lawful. It is not, for a Christian, lawful 'and right'."

Mr. W. P. W. Barnes, undergraduate son of the Bishop of Birmingham, appeared before the Conscientious Objectors' Appeals Tribunal in London on February 8.

He appealed against a decision of the East Anglian Tribunal to remove his name from the register of conscientious objectors without qualification.

Barnes said he was willing to do voluntary work, but not in the Royal Army Medical Corps.

PRINCIPLE OR CRIME

When the history of this war comes to be written perhaps the most discreditable thing connected with it, so far as this country is concerned, will be found in our treatment of the admittedly genuine conscientious objector to military service—leading Quakers and others as to whose complete sincerity there can be no manner of doubt. Several of them have lately died in prison, not directly from the result of the severe ordeal of long periods of hard labour, but in all probability through the prostration which made them the ready victims of any casual infection. Some time ago it was understood that the Prime Minister had so far relented as to agree that men who had served the maximum period allowed by law of two years' hard labour, should be released. The most ordinary sense of equity, to say nothing of mercy, would appear to dictate that the limit placed by law on sentences of hard labour for single offences should apply also to sentences for repeated offences when these are virtually the same offence and a man is re-arrested and resentenced almost as soon as he is released. But it is not being done, and this injustice and cruelty go on in defiance, or in pure evasion, of the law. Several of these prisoners were yesterday released from Pentonville Prison, but it is understood that they are to be rearrested shortly, or so soon as it is thought they have somewhat recovered strength to endure a further term of the hardest punishment known to the law. We publish a letter to-day from the editor of the "Spur," who has been sentenced four times for the same offence and already suffered two and a half years' hard labour, aggravated by extreme special punishments for what is regarded as contumacy. He has been hunger-striking, was let out for a month to recover, and is shortly to start on the miserable round of protest and punishment again. He and several others who acted with him expect this will be their last arrest; the next he feels pretty sure will come from the hand which sooner or later arrests us all. And this is our way of giving thanks for victory and approaching peace and of encouraging men who, however mistaken, prefer principle to life. It is a glorious device, and, if truth be told, fools though they be, such men are of the salt of the earth, and perhaps there is not one of their persecutors, from the Prime Minister downwards, who can compare with them in high regard for the things of the spirit and for loyalty to what they believe to be truth. It is a sorry and degrading spectacle. When is it to end? — The Manchester Guardian, Tuesday, January 14, 1919.

By the time these lines are in print many who were hardly born, or else were mere infants, when the Guardian "leader" was published, will be facing their first court-martial. Ere long, some paper, maybe the Guardian, will have to refer to their cases, in similar terms to those employed in 1919. Where is it all going to end? How long must mankind endure war and militarism? How long must sanity and service and brotherhood be outlawed among the nations?

Youth and Conscience

Dear Sir,—The chairman of the Lancashire Tribunal (Judge Burgis) was reported in the press recently as having said that a man should examine his conscience about participation in war at frequent intervals.

If this is true of those about to register for military service or to appear before a Tribunal, it must surely hold good for all young men of military age at all times; and they must continue to examine their consciences while training for military service and when they reach the front, and, if they come to the conclusion that they have chosen the wrong course, they must take steps to follow the guidance of their consciences.

May I ask what provision, if any, is made by the Government for men who may thus become troubled in conscience about their decision to perform military service?

Yours sincerely,

C. GASKILL.

MEDITATION

[This meditation was written on the eve of my first Court Martial. It was published in "The Spur," June, 1916. E. Armand translated it into French and published it in his paper, "Par dela la Mêlée," Orleans, February, 1917. It was reproduced in other French Anti-Militarist papers and widely circulated in leaflet form by French War Resisters.—Editor.]

I have a sheet of paper on which to prepare my defence to the many charges standing against me before to-morrow's court martial. And I intend to use it to prepare no defence. I am thinking of things good and bad, of persons virtuous and vicious. I want to indict the good, to deplore the bad, to denounce the virtuous and to heal the vicious. For good and bad, virtue and vice, are not what they seem.

I am thinking not of the good in essence, but the accepted good, the good in appearance. This good of fair speech, modish manners, and pretty dresses has been accepted as good throughout the ages. And it is a lie. It is vice through and through, lust instead of love, adultery instead of integrity, sham, upon sham. It is a business piety, a carnal wit, a stomach morality. Christ denounced it, Guatama exposed it, Socrates analysed it. And we must slay it.

What is reputed vice then? But reputed virtue in disgrace—the pomp with the shoddy showing, the respectability with the prostitution exposed. Sometimes even, reputed vice is real virtue seeking a resting place for the night, after a weary day of witnessing to the truth.

Man is ignorant. But there is an ignorance of innocence, which one day will know truth and testify accordingly. That ignorance is splendid. Its charms are felt like the possibilities of a marvellous child, whose brilliant future all can foresee. But there is an ignorance of squalor, of mental and moral mud, of stagnation, crime, filth, disease. That ignorance breeds war, feeds on superstition, is found on the bench, preaches in the pulpit, and exalts itself in politics. That ignorance counts itself respectable and controls the marriage mart. That ignorance I fain would destroy.

And now let me pray. To the destiny of man, to the instinct of my own nature; to the martyred spirit of all dead pioneers, let me pray. Let me commune for health and strength and endurance in captivity. Let me pray for zeal of spirit and power of faith. Let me pray for intellectual vision and fervour of passion. Let all vulgarity slip from me and the word the spirit of truth, become incarnate in me. Let me never deny the truth either in word or spirit. Let me work for the overthrow of scoffers in high places, for the destruction of the scoffing. Let me become a prophet against the scepticism of worldly piety and social unbelief. Let me become a son of man, the enemy of God, the foe of kings, the destroyer of ritual, ceremony, and all useless form. Let truth and truth alone be my mistress, and may I bring witness to her integrity from all lands and climes. May no worldly ambition, no temptation in this wilderness of understanding, lead me to serve the enemy of man, the principle of power and domination.

O holy spirit of truth, thou comforter, I have felt thy warm inspiration. May I deny at no time thy claim upon me. Dwell thou in me and with me in the days to come, and grant me perseverance in thy cause, until harmony shall dwell in the habitation of man, and peace and justice prevail through the land.

C.O.s WHO DIED: 1916-18

Facts Revealed in the House of Commons

Below we reproduce questions from the House of Commons reports, relating to those who died. The date in italics is that of the day when the question arose in Parliament.

1. DIED IN PRISON.

1. ARTHUR BUTLER.

Thursday, 13th December, 1917.

Mr. Snowden asked the Home Secretary whether he is able to report the result of his inquiries into the health of Arthur Butler, a conscientious objector, now undergoing his third sentence of imprisonment at Preston?

Sir G. Cave—At the time when I made the inquiry the prisoner was recovering from an attack of influenza and doing fairly well. Last Tuesday, however, an attack of pneumonia suddenly developed, his parents were summoned to see him on that evening, and I regret to say that he died last night.

Mr. Snowden—Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that more than a month ago I made representations to him in regard to the condition of the health of this prisoner, who, at that time was known to be spitting blood as the result of consumption; that I received a report from the Home Secretary saying that there was little or no foundation for these allegations; that letters which had been sent out of the prison by this prisoner have had statements in regard to his health obliterated; and in view of the fact that this man undoubtedly died yesterday as a result of the treatment he has received in prison, does the Home Secretary intend to take criminal proceedings against the medical officer and the Governor of the prison?

Sir G. Cave—In consequence of the inquiries which the hon. Member and others made a careful medical examination of this man was made, and he was reported not to be suffering in any way from tuberculosis. With regard to the other statements, the doctors did take the greatest care in this case. An inquiry will be held, and all the facts will be gone into.

Mr. King—Is the right hon. Gentleman able to assure us that he will give his personal consideration to this matter, and not leave it merely to some subordinate like the head of this institution, who may be himself in some way implicated?

Sir G. Cave—Of course I will try and do so.

Monday, 17th December, 1917.

Mr. Snowden asked the Home Secretary whether he has received a further report upon the case of Arthur Butler, a conscientious objector who has died in Preston Gaol; and what action he has taken or proposes to take in the matter?

Sir G. Cave—The inquest in this case, which was opened on the 14th instant, has been adjourned to the 18th to allow of a postmortem examination being held. I can, therefore, make no statement at present.

Thursday, 20th December, 1917.

Mr. Snowden asked the Home Secretary if he is now able to make a statement about the case of Arthur Butler, who recently died in Preston gaol?

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir George Cave)—Owing to delay in the post, I have not yet received a full report of the inquest, but I understand that the verdict of the jury was to the effect that Butler died from pneumonia, that he received proper care and attention during his illness, that he had been humanely treated and properly nursed, and that no blame whatever attached to anyone. The post-mortem examination showed that he died from pneumonia, and that there was no trace of tuberculosis.

2. ARTHUR HORTON.

Thursday, 5th February, 1918.

Mr. Whitehouse asked the Home Secretary if he has made any inquiry into the circumstances of the death of Arthur Horton in prison; and, if so, with what result?

Sir G. Cave—An inquest was held in this case, and all the circumstances were fully investigated by the coroner and jury, who found that this man died of pneumonia. Allegations had been made that the prisoner had not been properly treated in prison, but the jury, after having heard the evidence and seen the diet, found that these allegations were not founded on fact. I can see no reason for any further inquiry.

Mr. Lees-Smith—Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that after this man caught pneumonia he lay a month in his cell without any nurse and without any fire, which is a sentence of death upon the strongest man; and it was only after the Home Office Inspector, Dr. Dyer, came that nurses were suddenly summoned when it was too late; and will he have inquiries made into the conduct of the prison doctor.

Sir G. Cave—That was the allegation which was made before and at the inquest. It was contradicted by reliable evidence at the inquest, and was disbelieved by the jury. I regret very much that it should be repeated here.

Mr. Whitehouse—Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that not only that, but many other shocking allegations have been made regarding the treatment of this unfortunate man in prison, and has his attention been called to the fact that the doctor who gave evidence and whose evidence had weight, is reported in the Manchester Guardian as having made a very great attack in public upon these prisoners who are in gaol?

3. E. W. BURNS.

Monday, 15th April, 1918.

Mr. R. Lambert asked the Home Secretary whether the inquest on the death of E. W. Burns, who died in Hull Prison on or about 13th March, shows that death was in any way connected with forcible feeding; and whether an independent inquiry has been ordered?

Sir G.Cave—At the inquest held in this case the jury found that death resulted from pneumonia consequent on the inhalation of some fluid food during forcible feeding, and that no blame whatever was attributable to the doctor. Although I had not reason to feel any doubt as to the finding of the jury, whose inquiry was perfectly independent, I thought it right, in view of the importance of the question of forcible feeding, that a special inquiry should be made by medical men of the highest standing, and at my request my hon. Friend the Member for the Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrew's, who was recently president of the Royal College of Surgeons, and Dr. Maurice Craig, Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, who has an exceptionally wide experience of this matter, undertook the inquiry. I have now received their report, which entirely confirms the finding of the jury. They are satisfied that the case was one where resort to artificial feeding was necessary, and that the death of the patient was not due to any want of care or skill on the part of the medical officer.

Monday, 10th June, 1918.

Mr. T. Richardson asked the Home Secretary whether an inquiry was held in Hull Prison on or about 6th April, 1918, into the death of E. W. Burns; whether the Report is to be made public; who conducted the inquiry; what action has been taken on the Report; how many prisoners gave evidence; if any were legally represented; if they were indemnified or protected should their evidence be against the staff; if the evidence was taken down; if it can be made public; and how many of the staff gave evidence?

Mr. Brace—The inquiry in question was made by the hon. Member for the Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews, and by Dr. Maurice Craig, F.R.C.P. The result of the inquiry was fully stated by the Home Secretary in reply to a question in this House on 15th April last. To what he said I need only add that it is not proposed to publish the evidence, but that evidence was given by the governor, the medical officer, and three other officers of the prison, and by three prisoners who asked to be examined. The prisoners, who were all conscientious objectors, were given an opportunity of making their statements privately to the Commissioners—the governor and all prison officials withdrawing at the governor's suggestion.

4. P. E. GILLAN.

Tuesday, 9th April, 1918.

Mr. Richard Lambert asked the Home Secretary whether Paul Leo Gillan died in Winchester Prison on 16th March; whether the inquest showed the cause of death; whether the medical officer had already reported this case as one of acute heart disease; and whether the Home Office possesses and exercises the power to release from prison any prisoner whose continued detention is likely to have grave consequences?

Sir G. Cave—Gillan was admitted to hospital on the 12th March but serious symptoms only developed on the 16th, the day of his death. The inquest showed that death was due to heart failure following on pleurisy. The medical officer had not previously reported the case, and there were no symptoms to show that the prisoner's heart was affected until the day on which he died. I have no reason to think that removal from prison during his illness would have been in any way beneficial to the prisoner.

Mr. Byrne—Is there any evidence to show that this man died as the result of ill-treatment, and was he ill-treated because he was an Irishman?

Sir G. Cave—There is no evidence of ill-treatment of any kind?

Mr. Whitehouse—Has the right hon. Gentleman made inquiries as to why the medical officer did not report the condition of this man's health?

Sir G. Cave—The matter was thoroughly gone into at the inquest, and it appears that the medical officer had no reason to suspect serious illness until the actual day of the death.

2.—DIED IN THE ASYLUM.

1. ALFRED EUNGBLUT.

Wednesday, 14th March, 1917.

Mr. Chancellor asked the Secretary to the Local Government Board whether he is aware that Alfred Eungblut, a conscientious objector who voluntarily gave himself up on 12th September last, was court-martialled at Salisbury, sentenced to two years' hard labour, sent to Wormwood Scrubbs, and from there to Epsom lunatic asylum; and, seeing that this man was driven insane by the ill-treatment that he received at the hands of the military, and is now in a serious state of health and possibly dying, will he say what action he proposes to take?

Sir G. Cave—My right hon. Friend has asked me to reply to this question. This man was sentenced by court-martial on the 28th September last to 112 days' imprisonment. On the 10th November he was certified to be insane and removed to an asylum. I have no reason whatever for supposing that his insanity was due to ill-treatment by the military, but if the hon. Member has any evidence to support this very serious allegation he should submit it to the Army Council. The case is one for their consideration and not one that comes within my purview.

2. JOHN TAYLOR.

Tuesday, 13th November, 1917.

Mr. King asked whether John Taylor, a conscientious objector at the Wakefield work centre, recently attempted suicide by cutting his throat; whether this man is the John Taylor, No. 23,162 D Company, 3rd Battalion, Essex Regiment, who was granted a non-combatant certificate by his tribunal, was forced into a combatant regiment, ordered to do rifle drill, and afterwards subjected to field punishment No. 1; whether it is owing to this and subsequent treatment that the man was driven to attempt suicide; whether he has now been certified insane; and whether inquiries will be made into this case with the view to fix responsibility?

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir G. Cave)—The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. I have no information as to the allegations contained in the second part, which should be addressed to the War Office. As regards the third part of the question, six of Taylor's friends among the men employed at Wakefield have voluntarily supplied a report on the facts of the case and on Taylor's mental condition. It is not suggested in this report that his condition was in any way due to his treatment while in the Army or in prison: on the contrary, it is mainly attributed to anxiety caused by an explosion near his home and by subsequent air-raids in London. Taylor has now been certified insane. I see no ground for further inquiry into the matter.

Mr. King—Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this man is now in a dangerous condition and that his friends have been sent to see the last of him?

Sir G. Cave—I have not heard that, but I am sorry if it is so.

Tuesday, 5th February, 1918.

Mr. R. Lambert asked the Home Secretary whether John Taylor, a conscientious objector, has recently died in Wakefield work centre; whether an inquest was held; if so, what verdict was returned; and whether he will have an independent inquiry by persons other than officials concerned into the circumstances of the deaths of the various conscientious objectors who have died during the last twelve months?

Sir G. Cave—This man died on the 20th January at the West Riding Asylum, of which he had been an inmate for over two months. His death was the result of wounds which he inflicted upon himself on 2nd November while he was an inmate of the Wakefield Work Centre. As regards the causes leading up to the suicide, I would refer the hon. Member to my reply to a question addressed to me by the hon. Member for North Somerset on the 13th November, from which it appears that at the time when he committed the act he was in great anxiety as to the effect of the air-raids upon his home in London. An inquest was held on 25th January, and a verdict of felo de se was returned. I see no ground for any further inquiry.

3.—RELEASED TO DIE.

Tuesday, 30th October, 1917.

Mr. Snowden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make any statement as to the health of Thomas Darling Matchett, a schoolmaster, of Bath, confined to a Dorchester prison as a conscientious objector; whether his wife has been sent for as the man is not expected to live owing to haemorrhage of the lungs; and can it be stated what circumstances brought about this condition?

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir George Cave)—This man, who had not previously been in bad health, had on the 12th October a severe haemorrhage from the lungs probably arising from latent tuberculosis, and his wife was sent for. He is now much improved, and is no longer considered in immediate danger. If his friends can arrange for his reception in a sanatorium, I shall be prepared to exercise my power of release under Section 17 of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914.

We propose to exhaust completely the questions in Parliament concerning the treatment of the conscientious objectors during the Great War. Also we shall reproduce some of the splendid debates in both Houses.

The list published in the Christmas issue, under the heading: "CONCHIES, 1916-1919," should be corrected. The line reading: "B.S.P. Objector . . . 21" should read "S.L.P. Objectors."

CONSCIENCE STRUGGLE: 1916-1919

Told in Press Cuttings

Those conscientious objectors who have not been deemed genuine by the Tribunals are facing a great struggle. For them the 1916-1919 struggle will have some interest. Part of the story is related in the press cuttings we reproduce. The Daily Herald had become The Herald for the duration of the war. With all its faults, it endeavoured to be some kind of a workers' paper during the Great War of 1914-1918.

GUY ALDRED.

Guy Aldred, a conscientious objector of indisputable sincerity, whose views were widely known long before the war, has been in prison since May 17, 1916, without intermission, and has just been re-sentenced to two years more of imprisonment. We are informed that his state of health is such as to make the sentence highly dangerous; but, indeed, this endless torture would break the health of the strongest man. We call upon the Labour movement to do something about these outrages.—The Herald, September 7, 1918.

THE ABSOLUTISTS.

Whether the Government cannot, or whether it will not, understand the attitude of the absolutists, is immaterial. Certainly it does not. And the Wakefield scheme is only the latest of its follies. Some 120 men who had consistently demanded absolute exemption and had refused the Brace scheme, or any other system of industrial work under semi-penal conditions, were brought to Wakefield and offered the following conditions:—(1) nine hours' industrial work a day; (2) 3d. a day pocket money, spendable at the canteen; (3) free association with each other after 6.30 p.m.; (4) one censored letter and one visitor a week; (5) "idleness" or "misconduct" to be punished by confinement in a separate wing under ordinary prison conditions. The inevitable result has followed. On Tuesday a general meeting was held to consider the position. On Wednesday 11 men were transferred to "Wing F" for "idleness" or "misconduct." A second general meeting by 102 votes to 1 rejected the scheme, and a unanimous vote proclaimed (a) a strike while any men remained under punishment, and (b) refusal to do any prison tasks or to recognise any prison discipline while in Wakefield. The Government's answer is to return the men, in small batches, to various civil prisons. So ends a futile scheme. Meanwhile Guy Aldred at Wandsworth is undergoing solitary confinement for refusal to work. There are, indeed, only two courses open to the Government—the old course of brutality or a wiser one of decency. Is their imagination so dead that they still cannot see that they have everything to gain and nothing to lose by respecting their own laws and their own pledges, by granting to these men that absolute exemption to which they have so gallantly proved their right?—The Herald, September 28, 1918.

Mr. Guy A. Aldred, the conscientious objector, and editor of "The Spur," has been released from prison owing to failing health. He maintained a six-day hunger strike.—Daily News, January 7, 1919.

GUY A. ALDRED RELEASED.

After six days' hunger strike Guy A. Aldred, the well known Shepherd's Bush Socialist and conscientious objector, was released on Monday last from Wandsworth Gaol. Readers will remember that he put up a very elaborate defence at Blackdown Camp, where he was last court-martialled, but was for a second time, following two shorter sentences, sentenced to two years hard labour. He expressed his intention to work strike from the beginning, and this he carried out with a discipline strike at the same time. He hunger-struck with the commencement of the new year, and his health failing, was released under the Cat and Mouse Act for one month. He is now in a very bad state of health.—West London Observer, January 10, 1919.

CONGRATULATIONS.

Fourteen absolutionists—including Guy Aldred—were released from Wandsworth Gaol on Tuesday after hunger strike. Congratulations to them on the success which has rewarded their pluck and determination. They are out under the Cat and Mouse Act; and it is now up to organised Labour to see that they are never sent back again.—The Herald, January 11, 1919.

CONSCIENCE MEN IN PRISON.

Of the 1,500 conscientious objectors who are still in prison 700 have served terms of hard labour amounting to 2-year sentences. By the end of February 140 will have completed 2-year sentences without any break whatever; 115 have been court-martialled since the armistice. Of the 54 men who have died since arrest 6 committed suicide; 37 men have become mentally affected; and 189 have been released because of their shattered health.

Mr. Guy Aldred, a conscientious objector, has been released from Wandsworth Prison after hunger striking.—Daily News and Leader, January 31, 1919.

Mr. Guy A. Aldred sends us a protest against the desertion of the C.O.'s in prison, and calls for a general strike, both inside and outside prison, to effect their release. He himself is to be re-arrested under the "Cat and Mouse Act."—Forward, February 22, 1919.

HUNGER "STRIKES" IN GAOL.

Mr. Henry Sara, formerly assistant editor of the "Spur," and eleven other men are on hunger strike at Winchester Gaol. Mr. Guy Aldred, editor of the "Spur," was released on January 8 after a work, discipline and hunger strike. Fourteen men in all have been released from Winchester and 14 from Wandsworth under the "Cat and Mouse" Act, but it is understood that warrants have been issued for the re-arrest of some of the men.—Daily News, February 27, 1918.

Over 60 conscientious objectors have been released from Wandsworth, Maidstone, and Winchester Prisons. They include Guy Aldred, Henry Sara, and P. C. Herbert.—Daily News, Tuesday, March 4, 1919.

THE "SUPER-MOUSE."

G. Aldred, editor of the "Spur," was yesterday again released from Wandsworth prison under the "Cat and Mouse" Act after hunger striking for four days. This is the second time this year he has been released after hunger striking.—Daily Express, Thursday, March 6, 1919.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—At the request of my husband, Guy A. Aldred, I send you this intimation of his arrest this afternoon on Clapham Common, after addressing a meeting protesting against the treatment of C.O.'s. He proposes to pursue the policy of hunger-striking. I have great fears of the effects forcible feeding will have upon his system, weakened as he is by three-years' imprisonment. May I through you urge upon the House of Commons the cruelty and futility of forcibly feeding men who have suffered so much already at the hands of the law for the sake of principle, and pray that such barbarous treatment as was recently meted out in Wandsworth Prison may be ended?—Yours, etc.,

THE COWARDLY PERSECUTORS

By George Lansbury.

Last week we briefly announced the fact that the "Herald" petition, containing nearly 130,000 signatures, asking for the release of conscientious objectors, had been presented to Mr. Shortt, the Home Secretary, by myself and Gerald Gould. I would like readers of the "Herald" to understand that these martyrs for conscience sake are being kept in prison and persecuted simply because of the callous indifference of their friends in the Labour movement. I know that organised Labour does not desire these men to remain in prison, but I also know that organised Labour does not desire their release strongly enough to take drastic action to compel the men in office to release them. The latest reports from Wandsworth Prison prove how vilely some of these men are being treated, and prove, too, that we should demand a full and impartial inquiry into the charges brought against the Governor and other officials at that prison. Guy Aldred and scores of other well-known men are being dragged back to endure again the tortures of hell in prison. . . .

The C.O.'s, whose only crime is that they have demonstrated in the most definite manner their claim to receive the relief accorded to men of their faith by Act of Parliament, are now persecuted by being kept in prison, and Ministers, when asked to explain, sit like mutes. They refuse any explanation, and take their stand on what those men have been deemed to be by the tribunals.

Where The Real Power Lies.

I appeal not to Governments but instead to those with real power, if only they will use it, to Miners and Railwaymen, Engineers and Dockers; indeed to all my fellow men and women, who care for righteousness, who care for justice, to get together, and by the organised force of will compel the Government to forthwith release all political prisoners of every sort and kind, including the C.O.'s and soldiers.

—The Herald, March 15, 1919.

THE LIVERPOOL CONSCIENCE TRIBUNAL

The personnel of the North-West Tribunal for Conscientious Objectors, sitting at Liverpool, is the same as that of Manchester.

This Tribunal was dealt with very fully in the February issue.

On Thursday, December 7, 1939, Charles H. Lawton, 63 Karslake Road, Liverpool 15, a Methodist local preacher, said that he was prepared to bring food on any merchant ship that was unarmed, or to serve in an ambulance, but not in the Royal Army Medical Corps. He stated that he would not be allowed to preach "Love your Enemy" in the Army. This would be interpreted as incitement to disaffection.

He was registered as a conscientious objector, conditionally on undertaking approved civilian work.

James Lowe, Pearl Lane, Chester, a Methodist and Sunday School Secretary, said in a written statement:—

"Try to imagine Christ in khaki, saluting a Union Jack!"

To imagine Christ murdering a man, just because he was a German, was utterly fantastic! The mind of God, he explained, could not be altered at will by Act of Parliament.

Lowe said if he joined the R.A.M.C. he might be called upon to resist a so-called enemy, and he would want to assist wounded Germans. He had no guarantee that he would be allowed to remain in the R.A.M.C.

The Chairman—But you have. The Minister of War has given it.

Lowe—I regard the guarantees of such Ministers as quite worthless, in view of the Prime Minister's guarantee that conscription would not be introduced. Ministers might plead circumstances.

He was registered conditionally on doing civil work to be found by the Ministry of Labour, and, in the meantime, on rendering suitable civil service.

James Maddocks, 28 Speedwell Road, Claighton, Birkenhead, had his name removed from the register of objectors. We hold that this decision was wrong.

Maddocks said he could not accept training to kill his fellow-men. He had been a violinist in most of the prominent orchestras of the North of England, and had attended the St. John Ambulance classes, but if he joined the R.A.M.C. he would lose his freedom of conscience.

The Chairman made the point that Maddocks had changed his attitude towards the R.A.M.C. since June. Maddocks could do much to encourage and to cheer his comrades in the army. As Maddocks is only 20 years of age, too much might not to have been made of his changed attitude towards the R.A.M.C. Older men have been known to change their attitude towards questions and institutions.

On Tuesday, December 12, the Tribunal heard the case of Ernest Allen Mann, 12 Alexandra Street, Warrington, a communicant of the Church of England, and a member of the Anglican Pacifiist Fellowship, partly in private, at his own request. He alleged victimisation and gave details in private. The Rev. John Lowe, of the Anglican Church, spoke to Mann's sincerity.

The tribunal directed that Mann should be registered as a conscientious objector, conditionally upon his undertaking civil work under civil control, provided by the Ministry of Labour. Meanwhile he must qualify for first-aid work, and then attach himself to a recognised local first-aid unit.

Gordon Russell Kirby, another member of the Church of England, 62 Margaret Road, Liverpool 4, said he did not mind going into danger, but he would not kill because he felt it would be a mortal sin. He had volunteered for service on a minesweeper.

Replying to the chairman, Kirby said he would not give orders for a minesweeper to ram a submarine, if he were in a position to do so, because that would be taking life. He would not mind losing his own life.

The Chairman—If a job is found for you on a minesweeper, are you prepared to go?—Definitely.

The Chairman said: "This is a most refreshing and inspiring case."

He declared that Kirby's powers of reasoning were somewhat primitive and his use of words was limited, but his courage was supreme.

"We believe there is something innate in this man which tells him it would be wrong to kill," added Judge Burgis.

Kirby was entered on the register of conscientious objectors, without conditions, and the chairman said steps would be taken to enable him to serve on a minesweeper.

Walter J. Jannaway, Oak Street, Southport, is a Christadelphian, an assistant air-warden at his work, and a student of first-aid. He was registered unconditionally as an objector.

Registration subject to doing civil work to be specified by the Ministry of Labour, was granted to: Bertram W. Knight, 6 Hicks Road, Seaforth; Percy Lionel Hallam, 12 Matlock Avenue, Southport; Edgar J. M'Coy, 172 Hawthorne Road, Bootle; Edward Makin, St. Polycarp's Parish Church, Everton.

The previous day John David Frimston was registered unconditionally as a conscientious objector.

Alderman C. Aveling cross-examined the Rev. Hubert Watson, of the Richmond Baptist Church, Liverpool, as to his own views on pacifism, when he appeared to testify to the genuineness of the views of an applicant who is a member of his congregation. The question occasioned a demonstration in court.

On the Thursday, Judge Burgis explained the reason for the cross-examination:—

"Mr. Watson took the point which he was perfectly entitled to take, that such cross-examination was irrelevant; but I allowed the cross-examination to proceed; I held that it was relevant in order to test the value that should be put upon Mr. Watson's evidence.

"There is a very well-known rule of law that, if a man gives evidence contrary to his own interests, or in support of a person whose views are contrary to his own, then that witness is entitled to a high degree of credibility. But it does not follow that a person who gives evidence in support of another whose views correspond with his own is not entitled to credence.

"Mr. Watson's views as a pacifist in support of a pacifist may well be entitled to great respect, but if Mr. Watson had been a militarist or an army chaplain, and had been giving evidence as to the views of a pacifist, his evidence would have been entitled to still greater credit, as he would have been giving evidence in support of a person whose views were contrary to his own."

Douglas Armand Sissons, Okehampton Road, Liverpool 16, a Methodist lay preacher, was asked a number of fool questions as to what could be done to persuade Hitler to act differently. The Tribunal never faced the fact that Hitler's power had been built up by British support and most active assistance. Rev. John T. Gray testified to Sisson's sincerity.

The Tribunal directed that Sissons should be registered as a conscientious objector, conditionally on undertaking civilian work to be provided by the Ministry of Labour. Meanwhile he must qualify for and join a recognised first-aid organisation. Sissons agreed to receive this training.

The following were registered unconditionally as conscientious objectors:—Stephen Emlyn Roberts, 152 Harrowly Street, Liverpool 6; Arthur Scott, student, Emmanuel Bible School, 1 Palm Grove, Birkenhead; Malcolm Jones Service, 43 Link Avenue, St. Helens.

The Tribunal directed that the name of John David Roberts, 26 Brazenose Road, Liverpool, should be removed from the C.O. Register without qualification. Roberts was condemned for making an honest statement:—

"I refuse to fight, not because I dislike war, but because I am not going to fight to protect a system which has never given a man a decent chance." He added that he would be willing to serve if there was a Labour Government in power.

On December 13, the Tribunal registered Eric Graham Chirgwin, 210 Claughton Road, Birkenhead, as an objector. He is an arts graduate of the Liverpool University and approved student for the Presbyterian Church of England ministry. He could have avoided military service without having his case heard by the Tribunal, but insisted on having his conscientious objection registered.

Sydney Cattrell, 19 Storeton Road, Oxton, Birkenhead, a railway clerk, now employed at Hoylake, said that if his work was connected with the movement of munitions he was, and had been, prepared to give it up. He had worked at fifteen different stations during the past two years. At each he had stated his views, and he had been derided for them.

Cattrell was granted registration conditionally upon his remaining in his present employment.

Unconditional registration as a conscientious objector was granted to:—Keith Malcolm Conway, 26 Snowdon Road, Birkenhead, a member of the Society of Friends from birth; John Gordon Davies, Newton Rise, Chester; Norman Brown, 4 Portia Avenue, Woodley, Rock Ferry.

Conditional exemption was granted to Philip Neville James Chipperfield, 7 Crawford Avenue, Wavertree, Liverpool, an Agnostic, and secretary of the University Biological Society. Chipperfield is a Liverpool University science graduate, now taking an honours course in zoology.

On December 14, the Tribunal granted conditional exemption to Ronald Eric Osborne Taylor, printer, 54 Gonville Road, Bootle. Taylor's father was a conscientious objector during the Great War. Taylor declared that a military uniform was a devil's uniform. Judge Burgis said that the Tribunal thought that Taylor's views were erroneous but deeply sincere and conscientious. He had had pacifism presented to him from his very earliest days.

Thomas Bernard Green, art student, 8 Newry Park East, Chester, was removed, without qualification from the register of objectors, because his objections were based on reason, not conscience.

Green said that the real result of war was waste, to victor and vanquished—waste of money, materials, time and brains—even apart from the loss of life—was enough to bring all progress to a standstill.

Green made a splendid case. His removal is a disgrace to those who reached such a decision.

George Llewellyn Snape, a bank clerk, 27 Knowsley Road, Ormskirk, a Christadelphian, was granted conditional registration. Yet he answered, in the affirmative, the following question, put to him by Alderman C. Aveling:—

"Would you sell £500 worth of War Loan for me to-morrow?"

Snape explained that it would be in the course of his duties as a bank official; but that would not affect his conscience in any way.

William Leslie Cross, 50 Moor Street, Ormskirk, a member of the Ormskirk Parish Church, said that, since he was fifteen years old, he held that his Christian beliefs were inconsistent with soldiering. Douglas Donahue, 23 Rimington Road, Liverpool 17, refused to join any fighting unit. The Chairman said that Donahue had his views but no convictions. Ronald Fowler

Chandler, 151 Orford Lane, Warrington, a member of the Latter Day Saints, said that Christianity was opposed to war.

The names of these three applicants were removed without qualification.

Non-combatant service was ordered in the following cases:—Victor Holdgate Speakman, Devondale, Hoylake Road, Moreton, a member of the Salvation Army; Leonard Gordon Tucker, 89 Parkhill Road, Liverpool 8; Colin Smith, 14 Rufford Road, Bootle.

Conditional exemption was given to Albert Mansel Harrison, 125 Broad Lane, Liverpool 11, a student of Chester Training College.

Unconditional exemption was granted to Charles Tom Griffiths, 32 Oxford Street, Liverpool 7; and Herbert Gwilym Brooks, 25 Kensington Road, Southport.

WHO ARMED HITLER?

Conscription was the subject of full-dress debate at the Scottish Trade Union Congress, at Rothesay, on April 28, 1939.

Mr. Arthur Woodburn, now M.P., but then Scottish Secretary to the Labour Party, said:

"The Labour Party is still against war and the Labour Party believes that war troubles can still be settled by other means than by war . .

"I read in the Press that this country, between September, 1938, and February, 1939, has exported 39,000 tons of pig iron to Germany, against 5 000 tons in any similar period in previous years.

"There is no question at all that profiteers are still supplying the aggressors in Europe with the means of making war."

Mr Woodburn is now a war-monger. But this point about the arming of Germany should be remembered by the Chairmen of Tribunals, when putting stupid questions to conscientious objectors.

HANDED OVER!

What it means

I was arrested at 17 Richmond Gardens, Shepherd's Bush, on Thursday, April 13, 1916, and charged with failing to surrender myself for service under the Military Service Act. I appeared at the West London Police Court the following day, and appeared again at the same Court, on April 27 and May 4. I was never called to the Colours under that Act; and there can be no doubt, and there never was any doubt, that the first Military Service Act never applied to me. I had made myself a nuisance, by championing the case of Henry Sara and C.O.s generally, and the authorities of the time were resolved on my detention or imprisonment. The question no longer matters because sooner or later resistance to Conscription would have come.

To those who now face being handed over it is useful to know how the Conchies felt in 1916. From the columns of The Spur I make excerpts which takes the readers down to my first court-martial. I made notes of all that happened and wrote voluminously. This helped to preserve sanity.

1. POLICE COURT FAREWELL.

West London Police Court, May 4, 1916.

After editing a monthly journal of Socialist and rebel thought continuously since December, 1910, I must bid a graceless farewell to the editorial chair. A flag I do not respect, upheld by a militarism I detest, is being borne aloft. The enemy compels my physical presence, even though it cannot command my allegiance. I must line up with many comrades similarly placed. Our fight is against a foe which gives no quarter, and knows no honour in battle. Only humiliation awaits those who war against Conscription at home and so strive to secure real freedom in the commonwealth. I trust that, in this struggle, I may prove a humble but no mean warrior. Whether I shall survive the fight or not, only a godless providence can say. I hope I may, for in the days to come I have other, but not less important work to do than I am attempting now. Action tests the strength of one's thought: and it is good to be tested. But there are days of thought and quiet in which one accomplishes more solid work than in those moments of storm and stress. And besides, the present strife is but guerilla warfare. To the future belongs the real battle, in which passive resistance plays no part, the great campaign of social revolution.

2. IN THE HANDS OF THE MILITARY.

Davis Street Barracks, May 4, 1916.

I was taken from West London in a taxicab. Refused medical inspection there, but was treated courteously enough. Brought here. Refused to put on uniform, but was treated courteously and reasoned with. Am going to hunger strike, I think.

Fovant Camp, 5th May.

I am a good few miles from Hurdcott Camp (Sara was at this time at Hurdcott). I have little to say, beyond stating that I am standing firm by my principles. My journey down here was pleasant enough. I am in one of the finest companies of men one could be amongst. Did I believe in soldiering I could ask for no better comrades, but I do not. In other times, my civic virtues would be recognised as splendid qualities. But now, well good men as well as bad are opposing each other. It is a shame and a fact. My attitude, from the military viewpoint is unforgivable. There are opposite views of duty!

Fovant Camp, 6th May.

When I was taken to the Davis Street Headquarters of the 9th London Regt. I refused to sign for my kit or to don khaki. I was sent down here under escort with the kit. I refused to don khaki or to strip for examination. Was charged to-day with six charges of "refusing to obey orders." After this, I was forcibly examined and put into khaki. But my protest remains. On Monday, I shall be called upon to sign my papers and to drill. After this I shall be put into the guard room to await court-martial. I put up a hunger strike till to-day. Received a decent dinner on condition that I withdrew strike until end of week. It is possible to get two years for my refusal to drill.

Fovant Camp, 7th May.

I shall go back to the Guard Room to-day, as I intend to refuse all parade, all drill and shall finally strip off the uniform entirely. I am told that if I persist, I shall get 3 years' penal servitude. At Hurdcott, Sara lays down on parade. He is terribly treated.

Fovant Camp, 10th May.

On Monday I refused to put on my puttees and hat to go down to breakfast. Was ordered to do so by Sergeant Mortimer and replied that I would take no breakfast. Was charged before Capt. Henderson, and then got my own way. Refused to button uniform, so the Regt. Sergt.-Major did this for me. Later same morning charged before the Colonel. He remanded me till afternoon parade. Capt. Henderson came into the hut and ordered me to assume equipment and to go on parade. I refused. Was taken under armed guard again before the Colonel. He said one man like me caused more trouble than 100 good men. He asked me to accept his punishment and I demanded a court martial. He seemed surprised and said it would be secret and that I would gain no cheap notoriety from it. I retorted that I wanted no cheap notoriety, but would stand by principle. Was then taken back to detention room and marched out again under armed escort to Major Willoughby, who drew up particulars of evidence. I am still kept in close confinement, without exercise of any kind, awaiting court martial.

Fovant Camp, 12th May.

On Thursday, the Colonel visited me. He is bitter, but not bad. He complained that it was against the Army regulations to mention liberty in my letters. Asked me to reconsider my position since I was a man of intelligence. Complained of people writing to me as "conscientious objector." Told me I had no sense of duty. I smiled. Wanted to know what would happen if all men were like me. Admitted there were a few like me in Germany, but failed to realise there were a few here. I am awaiting my court martial—D.C.M.

I want you to know that solitary confinement finds me reflective, strong and bold. I am awaiting the day when we shall destroy this cursed system of lies and misery. Believe me, the day will come. Our tyrants have not all the power they think.

13th May.

Colonel again visited me. Said he was sorry, seeing my fine intellect that I should remain in such a position. Urged me to change. Asked what 500 or 600 men in London and such a number in Berlin could do to end war. Agreed that war was wrong and horrible. But admitted that England must maintain a large Army ready for more war! Finally said I was in a minority and must suffer for my principles. Confessed his regret that I could not throw in my lot with the others.

3. DETENTION ROOM MUSINGS:

[These "Musings' were published in The Spur, June 1916. Only part are printed. Penned while waiting my first court martial.]

I believe that the warriors of the world are the curse of the world. Do you then think that either cajolery or menace will make me ally myself to a curse? Whoever thinks so knows me not at all.

The working women of the world are doing the Manual work of the world. They are being told that they are equal to man because they are driving man to self-slaughter. When they proved mental equality, women were jeered at, and brutally treated. Now they are showing slavish equality, they are applauded and told they should have the vote. But who will the vote benefit? Working women or their mistresses?

The great argument against Socialism was that it made all men equal in servility. That was said to be the vice of Socialism. Now magazine articles are being written to show how nobly militarism accomplishes this task. How funny despotism becomes when it tries to argue.

Militarism can starve, cage and chain. But it lacks prestige. It boasts the trappings of pomp, but lacks the soul of majesty. To want majesty is to be without power. Finally militarism will fail. Only revolution has majesty. That is because revolution means liberty.

Militarism is a machine. You refuse to do up a button, and the machine is out of gear. You refuse to wear a hat and half the machinery is at a standstill. You refuse to "right turn" and the machine is scrapped.

Militarism is at an extremity. Its cogs are thinking, thinking and becoming clogs. They feel themselves gripped by trickery and resent the pressure. They have discovered their own sense of worth, and hate to be classed as worthless. So the crude machine is scrapping.

Thought is active and questioning and virile. Thought will be spoken and written and read. Thought will be uttered, communicated and received. In vain are papers suppressed and thinkers jailed. No Bastille prevents a revolution.

What are we Sons of the army of the night, they ask. We are what our martyred forbears were. We are the fates. Let the timid and the powerful beware.

"Be a man,' 'said the Colonel, "and give up these ideas." This is like saying "be a soldier and desert your colours." How wise are those in authority above us.

What can 600 like you do? Asked the Colonel. "Vanquish militarism" I replied.

"You are not like others, you are an intelligent man," exclaimed the Colonel, "which accounts for my position, Sir," I answered.

'Join up with us now," said another officer, "and we'll give you a week-end at home." So much generosity appalled me. But I smiled.

The chaplain has not visited me, and I have not visited him. We are on excellent terms with each other.

"Resist to the uttermost as long as you are able," writes a Glasgow comrade, in a letter which escaped the censor. Quite so, and after that—I'll resist again.

The king of beasts is reputed by hunters to be the most cowardly of brutes. Is that why the military machine can tame it?

It was after I was getting used to being marched about the camp under armed guard. I was brought in contact with an officer, who was blazing with fury at my "tom-foolery," as he phrased it. "'The army," he exclaimed, "can cast out demons." "I am sorry, sir," I replied, "but I am only one. It will need to cast me out however."

Life here resembles somewhat civilian life. In the city, the more crimes you commit, the less offences are recorded against you. I have committed so many offences since I have been here, that many have been overlooked.

"You have refused all orders," queried a Derby recruit, in wondering amazement. "Yes, even holy ones," I replied.

The Colonel cannot understand me quoting Jesus Christ, since I am an Atheist. And I cannot understand the chaplain preaching Jesus Christ, since he is a militarist.

One of the Captains visited me. "I am not a Field Marshal," he said, "only a Captain. I travelled miles to join up. I wish you could be one of us. But I admire a man who stands by his guns. Shake!" I shook. That was a soldier's greetings—and I welcomed it.

BUILD THE N.C.L.

(By ANNESLEY G. ALDRED.)

Questions and arguments put forward by audiences at recent meetings show, only too plainly, that the "bogey-man" has been well boosted. "Because of one man" cry has been revived effectively. In 1914, the one man was the Kaiser. To-day, it is one who was then hungry and insignificant. The Allies of 1916–1918 deposed the Kaiser to elevate Hitler whose present importance is the product of that "blood-bath," and its aftermath. Now we must destroy Hitler, we are told, in order to "achieve decency in International Relationship." Once more the English and French workers are lured into the position where they must kill, and be killed by, the German workers.

This last point is one on which those of us who are conscious of the full implications of this war, and are actively opposing it, must not allow ourselves to be misled. We must realise that the apparent ease with which working-class acceptance of this war has been won is due not so much to the stupidity of the workers (which is the easy way of dismissing the fact) as to the strength of the war propaganda. Indeed, so insidious is this war propaganda that it is difficult not to be deluded into the feeling that "the British and French cause" has justice on its side and that, even if one is not prepared to kill, one should at least render some equivalent form of non-combatant service or work of national importance. The atmosphere makes one feel that he ought to apologise for his scruples of conscience. It is, in fact, only by realising that the fundamental issue is still the same, that the war is being fought for age-old capitalist interests, that one feels certain that the need for absolute opposition to the military machine is as great as ever, and senses that there is no justification for any relaxation of that opposition, no justification for any compromise.

The Parliamentarians have, as usual, betrayed the workers. They excelled their performance of 1914. In so doing, they have acted exactly as the Anti-Parliamentarians have always said they would. The I.L.P.M.P.s, to their credit, were alone almost on the Opposition benches in opposing conscription, apparently having retained some shred of principle.

The Labour Party, sitting on the fence, and the Communist Party, still trying to explain Russia's alliance with Fascism in the terms of Socialism, are both a menace to working-class unity. The chief danger from the latter organisation, it is true, arises from the confusion and contradictions in the efforts to save their own face and standing. Thus they praise Russia for "saving" millions of Polish workers from the clutches of the Gestapo; and at the same time hail the treaty with the rulers of Germany, who maintain that Gestapo, as a determined step towards peace. Who assert that war is serving the cause of Fascism; and who, in the same breath, accuse those who oppose war of serving that same end find difficulty in dissociating themselves from a rooted belief in parliamentary democracy. We can only say that it makes no difference to the effect of a bomb whether it is dropped with the hatred of a Fascist Dictator or the love and kisses of a Democratic Prime Minister; whether it is dropped on London or Berlin, Guernica or Helsinki, Central China or the North West Frontier. In every case it is the workers who are killed. And any form of government which condones that killing must be intolerable to the workers.

The inference from these facts is obvious. We must oppose the Conservative and various avowed capitalist factions supporting war. We must oppose the Labour Party bureaucracy, now so busy destroying democracy and civil liberties at home in ill-advised pursuits of Imperialist war.

The stand taken by the absolutists in the last war should have shown that there worse things than imprisonment or even death. It is up to those of us who have the knowledge, the understanding and the determination to rally all who are opposed to warmongering, and the system of which war is an integral part. Neither the workers of Britain, nor of any other country, want war. But the old tricks still work; and the threat, which was so illustrated so well in The Spur during the last war, "What would you do if you were threatened with the bayonet?" serves once more to palsy the wit of the man who would oppose the war. So few think. So many fear. So few have the courage to express conviction. So many are too cowardly to disdain the official uniform of seeming courage. The people will not understand that it is they who wield the bayonets, and it is for them to say that they will wield them no longer. Only when they do say this, will war end.

Apart from the challenge of war to the individual conscience, even the use of a bogey-man cannot obscure the social reality of the class struggle. That issue remains the same whether bombs drop on cities or only on battleships. In war-time, as in peace-time, the struggle to attain a saner system of society must go on. Objection to war, to be replaced by direct individual resistance wherever the Tribunal does not recognise the imperative dictate of conscience, is merely the first negative-positive step towards the new social order.

Because I know that this step must be taken, that paralysed and paralysing Labour careerism must give place to direct stand against militarism, I have identified myself with the No-Conscription League.

The developing of a powerful anti-war movement, the emphasis on the supremacy of individual conscience over the herd-instinct of blind obedience, are required at this crisis. Only thus can we arrest the toll the "bogey-man" propaganda is taking of humanity and end its menace to civilisation. Because of the "bogey-man," those now effected by conscription must square their action with their conscience, resist war, and build the movement of war resisters, the men of conscience—the N.C.L.

Views, Comments and Problems.

One of the great problems confronting C.O.'s when they appear before the Tribunals is how they are to deal with the "trick" questions which are put forward in order to lead them into an untenable position. Judging by the reports of the various Tribunals many of the C.O.'s are falling only too easily into the traps laid for them, and putting up a very poor case as a result. The seriousness of this lies not in the fact that the particular individual may suffer as a consequence, however regrettable that may be, but in the deliberate publicity which is given by the press to such cases.

For example at a recent Mock Tribunal held in West London one young C.O. found himself opposing the existence of Fire Brigades! In the obviously friendly surroundings we were able to laugh and pull his leg. But really it was not a laughing matter.

The fundamental error seems to be that most of those who are appearing before Tribunals are hoping to obtain exemption and are basing their answers on that hope. This must not be construed into meaning that they are not genuine, but it does mean that they are bound to be more nervous in expounding their views than one who has no hopes of exemption and is consequently indifferent to the construction which the members of the Tribunal may care to put upon his case.

The answer to the problem seems to lie in the realisation that the Tribunals are not sitting to grant exemption to as many C.O.'s as possible but to refuse exemption, to incorporate into the military machine as many as they can. Realising that one can go forward; state one's case boldly and clearly; and not afraid of admitting what seems to be a slight inconsistency. Such inconsistency proceeds only from being trapped under the system and is not fundamental or wrong in itself. Compromise—or Starve! That is, in effect, the choice which is thrust upon many of those who have shown by word and deed their opposition to militarism and the military machine. A choice that is all the more difficult to make when there are dependents to be taken into consideration; one that may well test the determination of the most ardent. Indeed, one may well wonder if this more subtle, economic weapon is not more effective in compelling support for the war than the Tribunals could ever be.

With the passing of the months and the approach of "Prison Time," this problem looms ever larger and more urgent. In many parts of the country it is being tackled by an endeavour to build up funds to assist the C.O.'s and their dependents. A great task, because our movement is essentially of the workers, and we, none of us, have overmuch to spare. However, the difficulties of collecting these funds need not be enlarged upon here.

What is important is that, having overcome those difficulties, the administration of the funds should be organised in such manner as to ensure that they are not used to defeat our own objects; not used to weaken our resistence to war or to encourage compromise.

One question which must arise is: shall the application of the funds be limited to members of certain organisations? Or shall their application to C.O.'s be non-sectarian?

As far as the N.C.L. is concerned it would seem that this question can be answered in only one way—refusal to give support to members of any organisation which is likely to support an imperialist war. This is, unfortunately, not so simple a proposition as it sounds. It may easily involve a break, at some stage, with other organisations which, whilst quite definite in their opposition to war, are prepared to co-operate with those of dubious integrity. It will, certainly, lead to the accusation of splitting the "United Front" against war. But our cause is surely too pressing, the need for an absolutist stand too necessary, for us to pursue any path which will, inevitably, lead us on to the treacherous quicksands of compromise.

We must remember that in the development of the powerful anti-war movement, which is required at this crisis, the emphasis must be placed on the supremacy of individual conscience over the herd-instinct of blind obedience. Only thus can we arrest the toll that "mass propaganda" is taking of humanity and end its menace to civilisation. Because of this those now affected by conscription must square their action with their conscience, resist war, and build the movement of war resisters, the men of conscience —the N.C.L. And also because of this it behoves those who are conducting the fight outside the prison gates to see that no action of theirs betrays the cause.

Actually the chief danger lies in accepting too easily the fact that it is almost impossible to be absolutely consistent. Having once accepted it the tendency is to smile benignly upon each small concession, and forget to review their sum. With the result that many schemes which start off with quite genuine intent to encourage and assist war resisters, finish up by defeating their own object and being unworthy of either support or attention from any C.O. worthy of the name.

In this respect many "Community" schemes are clearly suspect. One such scheme, for instance, proposes to form a farming community which is expected to be practically self-supporting and, indeed, hopes to be able to supply some produce to a town community to be run in conjunction with it. In fact it is even hoped to run a canteen for the aged and unemployed of the district. A laudable venture—no doubt. But can it be classed as furthering resistance to war. Hardly entitled to claim support from a C.O. fund. For the number of C.O.'s who are exempted conditional upon their taking up agricultural work leaves no doubt that it is work of "national importance." The fact that is undertaken voluntarily makes it no less so. Participation in such a scheme is, therefore, undoubtedly an evasion of the issue. And however unreasonable it may be to expect all conscientious objectors to take an absolutist stand, it is, surely not unreasonable to expect them to face up to the issues at stake. The fact that they may be willing to allow themselves to be drafted in, as unskilled workers, to, say, agricultural occupations does not mean that they should

The CAREERIST DANGER

By MATT KAVANAGH.

The Southend N.C.L. is getting some good work done indoors with "Mock Tribunals," lectures, and debates. So far, we have had two of our members up at Southwark: one obtained complete exemption; the other was given work on the land. I think we can count this as two victories against the "body-snatchers." The real struggle will come when the older groups are called up, consisting of men who have a greater sense of their responsibility, and are old enough to remember the last blood-bath.

Unfortunately, in this town, the P.P.U., the F.O.R., and other like bodies have been reluctant to co-operate with the N.C.L. This lack of co-ordination is not the fault of the N.C.L. Because we advocate mass action (the general strike), as well as individual refusal to serve war, we are denounced as a political body. Yet those who oppose us support the actions of the politicians whom we oppose. The Southend N.C.L. has held the view, consistently, that mere opposition to this war is not enough. Such action is mere sentimentalism. We must teach the workers the cause of war: capitalism and government. To stop this war by negotiation, or any other means, without coming to grips with war and its cause, is only going to prove another armistice. This time, the armistice will be for a considerably shorter period than last time. If we do not eradicate the root cause of war, we are entering on an epoch of a series of wars.

It is because of mental myopia, that such bodies as the P.P.U. will not sell THE WORD. The paper is too sane, too realistic, for these sentimentalists. Rather than use the lancet, and cut out the evil cancer of capitalism, they prefer to apply the futile plaster of State Federalism. They cease to be the opponents of militarism and prove themselves the promoters of future wars. For Federal Unionism is only the old, useless, bankrupt League of Nations. The old long-firm swindle has opened business under a new name.

This mental perversion arises in our intellectuals and pacifists because of their goody-goodiness. They have been bitten badly by the bug of respectability. They sense, if they ally themselves with a group of militant workers, they will not be able to adorn their platform with a crowd of M.P.s, Reverend Sky Pilots, and J.P.s. Why they should stop there, and pause so modestly, I do not know. The Public Hangman would be a bigger draw than any parson or M.P. Was not the Kaiser to be handed over to this public official after the last war? I seem to remember the slogan: "Hang the Kaiser!"

Some of this criticism applies as much to sections of our own organisation, the N.C.L., as to the P.P.U., and the F.O.R. The N.C.L. seems to be becoming a happy hunting ground for would-be M.P.s, dear good comrades who are out to save the soul of the Labour Party! Men who went to prison during the last war, and who have spent a life-time in the service of the movement, who have sought neither place nor power, whose policy has been to give and not to take, are over-looked or side-stepped. They are told they are not platform attractions. Political careerists, seeking the golden letters, M.P. after their names, yearning for £600 per annum, secured income, are given the limelight. The funds of the movement are dissipated callously to make careers for these useless self-seekers. Unless the workers in the N.C.L. guard against this tendency, they will discover that their organisation has been turned into a mere political machine. This tendency is manifest already.

I write in no narrow spirit. The Southend Group of the N.C.L. does not wish to force its opinions on other groups or branches. In a spirit of tolerance, recognising the right of all C.O.s to unite for mutual aid, but denying the right of those who are not really C.O.s to exploit comrades menaced with imprisonment and suffering, we say: if your sport is parliamentary politics—and that is all this political window-dressing under N.C.L. auspices amounts to—join the I.L.P. or the Labour Party.

The N.C.L. is, or should be, above the sordid atmosphere of parliamentarism. The N.C.L. should be a body of class-conscious workers and anti-militarists, who are determined, by the method and weapon of Direct Action, to smash militarism and to root out the cause. The N.C.L. ought not to be employed creating a new set of masters, evolving more careerists, more Judas Iscariots. It should be pioneering a world and era of Freedom for All Mankind.

EDITOR'S PERSONAL APPEAL

This appeal is for a special sum of £166 13/3d, to cover losses on the paper prior to Xmas, 1939, and on the London Law proceedings in connection with the Hyde Park fight. Since then, each issue of the paper has entailed a heavy loss. We set up machinery at great cost. And we are producing pamphlets of large size. Your immediate response is requested to make this work possible.

throw the onus upon the Government to do so. The fact of their doing so of their own accord, and before being forced to do so, constitutes a quite definite evasion of the issue and is reasonably entitled to throw doubt upon the whole basis of their opposition to war.

The only inference is that the ultimate guide in the administration of these funds must be the same as that which directs all activities against the war—the discontinuing of compromise and the encouragement of a firm and definite stand against militarism—absolutism.

Recently, I attended the meeting of one of the branches, where discussion turned on the question of conscience in relation to the social struggle. The chief point that seemed to arise—as far as I could tell, between the I.L.P. section on the one hand, and independent and unattached comrades on the other—was on the question of "Militant Pacifism." The I.L.P. comrades maintained that they could conceive of circumstances in which they would be prepared to (a) defend a Socialist system against a counter-revolution at the barricades, and (b) would if necessary be prepared to execute such people as they considered were likely to incite or conspire towards a counter revolution. The arguments against seemed to be that essentially Socialism was based on what might be called (without any religious meaning) the "sanctity of human life," and that consequently we had no right to urge such a procedure as (b); and also that it was a dangerous proposal to advocate in so far as one was paving the way for Fascist acts of violence which they could justify on the same grounds.

The C.O. Tribunals are reported very scantily and very poorly. If those in other parts of the country are like the London one, each Tribunal has no standard in its decisions. The result is a pure gamble, which has no relation either to reason or to conscience. From the reports, some of those removed from the conchie register in London seem to have more claim to be registered as C.O.s than those left on the register. Another iniquitous expression of a rotten system.

ADAPTABLE "COMMUNISTS"

William Gallacher stood as C.P. candidate at Dundee in 1922. He issued an election address full of hot air. It opened thus :—

"Comrades and Fellow Workers—On November 15th you will be called upon to make a decision that will have far-reaching consequences for you and to the future of our class."

Had Gallacher been elected at that time, his speeches at Westminster would not have lightened the load of the jute workers in Dundee for a moment. The hooters would have blown and they would have bent their backs to the yoke as before. Gallacher's election for West Fife has not benefited the miners in his constituency one little bit.

Gallacher's election address proceeded to describe Parliament as a sham. He added hastily :—

"If it is your will that I shall carry on the struggles in Parliament, I will give my whole strength to the task."

Only James Russell Lowell's classic vernacular poem on "I'm just a candidate in short," could do justice to Gallacher as a nice adaptable man.

He made a mild reference to Russia, to prove that the revolution was not so hot after all :—

"Recognition of Soviet Russia means an opportunity for the workers there and work for the unemployed here."

He promised to support movements towards national independence in Ireland, India, and Egypt, and added :—

"In general, I will support the Labour Party."

Which makes nonsense, since the Labour Party does not stand for such national independence.

In his concluding sentences, Mr. Gallacher says he has "neither respect nor loyalty for the Monarchy and the Constitution." He fell over himself three times to demonstrate his loyalty when Edward VIII. abdicated, in his haste to prove his capacity to swear allegiance to the Monarchy.

In The Commune we referred to Gallacher's articles in the Workers' Dreadnought and the Worker. In February, 1920, in the former paper, he wrote scathingly of Parliamentary action and those seeking Parliamentary honours. Writing in the name of the Scottish Workers' Committee, he said :—

"This Committee is definitely anti-Parliamentarian. . . . We represent the revolutionary movement in Scotland. . . . For a considerable time we have been sparring with the official Parliamentarians. . . . But this state of affairs cannot continue long. We are winning all along the line. The rank and file of the I.L.P. in Scotland is becoming more and more disgusted with the idea of Parliament, and the Soviets or Workers' Councils are being supported by almost every branch. This is very serious, of course, for the gentlemen who look to politics for a profession, and they are using any and every means to persuade their members to come back into the Parliamentary fold. Revolutionary comrades must not give any support to this gang. Our fight here is going to be a most difficult one. One of the worst features of it will be the treachery of those whose personal ambition is a more compelling force than their regard for the revolution. . . . The official I.L.P. is bitterly hostile to the Third International, the rank and file is for it. Any support to the Parliamentary opportunists is simply playing into the hands of the former."

The New Leader, in its issue for September 23, 1938, published the following account of the C.P. Congress :—

"The Communist Party of Great Britain held its annual conference at Birmingham last week-end.

"I had not attended a C.P. Congress before and looked forward to it with interest. The opening by Willie Gallacher was disappointing. . . . He appealed to 'all who love peace and progress' to accept C.P. policy. He appealed 'in particular to the people of the Catholic Church who throughout history have shown such devotion to the cause of progress'."

The writer later on describes the Congress :—

"The second session was what one might call the opening of the serious 'Pollittics' of the Congress. Harry Pollitt read his printed report—it took him exactly two hours. Again one had the impression of the product of the machine.

"From this time on speakers were called to the platform according to a pre-arranged programme. With one exception they all automatically repeated the Party line.

"The one voice raised in opposition to the platform was in some ways more telling because it was pathetically confused and aggressive. It was the voice of Jock Cunningham, an early leader of the International Brigade. 'If any man wanted to come up with a point in opposition, or not quite in line with something, I am damned sure he couldn't do it!' Cunningham exclaimed.

The writer concluded his account :—

"As the Congress proceeded I found the uniformity of the speakers absolutely terrifying. Their tone, manner, phrases, even the adjective before every noun, were repeated time and time again. Nothing new was said after Pollitt's pronouncement except for the two speeches to which I have referred and a few reports from districts of actual work done.

"The C.P. is evidently as much an automaton as any Nazi party. The delegates acted as one man, sang the 'International,' clapped, shouted 'Hurrah,' stood up in respectful show of admiration, waiting for signals to cheer or sing, just as you would expect a trained corps of Nazis to do.

"There can be no hope that a party of this kind can bring human liberty."

William Gallacher is the parliamentary leader of this outfit, now defending under Moscow orders the Soviet alliance with the German Government after shouting for war with Germany, and upholding the bombing of Finnish towns : an unforgiveable outrage when committed by Fascist or ordinary capitalist armies, and an indescribable horror and blasphemy when "justified" by alleged Socialists. But has not Gallacher for hireling pay, justified the execution of his old masters—Zinoviev, Kameviev, etc., on bogus charges?

The adaptable Gallacher has been "boomed" in Scotland as the real leader of the Opposition to Chamberlain. If he leads the Opposition, it must be in answer to Chamberlain's Unitarian prayers. For no Premier was ever blessed with such an incapable and such an adaptable opponent. The only thing Chamberlain has to fear is a new change of front. Willie might decide to support the Government as servilely as he obeys Moscow.

With Gallacher has been boosted "the Youth leader," John Gollan. Here is a paragraph from the New Leader, issue quoted already in this essay, on Gallacher's associate :—

"John Gollan, leader of the Young Communist League, spoke at the National Congress of the C.P. on the 'attitude of the Communist Party to religion.' He did not point out how the Church backs the vested interests, how the Bishops acted as recruiting sergeants in the last war—and will do in the next; how religion is a 'dope' of the people (the original Communist view). He contented himself with 'rejecting the slander that Communists are anti-religious'!"

Which proves how adaptable and how servile the "Communists" really are. Without principle or vision, they must perish. No wonder they hate conscientious objectors!

Lest Parliamentarians Forget

Speaking at the I.L.P. Conference, on Easter Monday, 1919, Philip Snowden—who became a member of the First and Second Labour Governments, and followed Ramsay MacDonald into the National Government, said :—

"In industrial matters the Parliamentary Labour Party was doing well, but it was disappointing in regard to such fundamental questions as civil liberty and economic and international policy. It had remained silent while conscientious objectors had been tortured in prison, while the Government had used its powers unconstitutionally to subsidise private commercial enterprise by a veiled form of Protection, while the military forces had been used to suppress the just aspirations of the subject-peoples of Egypt and India, while statesmen had been conspiring in Paris to deprive the people of the promised just and lasting peace, while the infamous blockade had been starving millions to death, and while the British armies had been employed to suppress the new European republics."

We anticipated this general treachery when we left the parliamentarians and the S.D.F. in 1906. Snowden earned a title developing the treachery. We recall the passage to-day because of the Labour Party attitude towards the conscientious objectors and war. The folly of Labour parliamentarism must be apparent to all but those who, either from fear or from interest, are blind.

A SCOURGE OF SMALL CORDS

"The Scourge of Christ" was translated from the French of Paul Richard, and published in English, about seven or eight years ago. The book was recommended by Rabindranath Tagore. The Indian poet and philosopher found this book "full of suggestions and surprises." The idea of the book is taken from the passage : "and he made a scourge of small cords."

Paul Richard's book is actually a commentary on the life and teachings of Jesus.

Describing the 70 missionaries that are reputed to have been sent out on the first Gospel Mission, Richard says :—

"To-day should the Seventy start on their mission, they would first take out an insurance policy."

Probably, it would have been the Wesleyan and General Assurance Company!

Richard attacks hypocrisy bitterly in the following passages :—

"Twelve apostles.....and that even was too high an expectation!

"'Peter followed afar off'—and the Church follows Peter.

"When the cock crew, Peter wept; his successors choke the cock.

"For greater security, Christians have put off the second coming of Christ—until the end of the world.

"The good Christian yearns for Heaven . . . without impatience!"

Paul Richard treats us to some definitions that improve with lapse of time :—

Life—the time allotted to men for dealing death to one another.

Civilisation—the privilege of a few peoples estimated by the number of their firearms.

Barbarism—not to have your firearms up-to-date.

Moralist—one who has a high sense of other people's duties.

Dogma—the living faith of the dead become the dead faith of the living.

Christian—a person who believes that Christ was like him.

Patriot—a man who feels pride when his mother-country slaughters or steals.

Colour Prejudice—a species of skin disease especially malignant amongst white people.

With Christian nations preparing for and against bomb attacks, with the skies declaring the glory of hell, it is well to know how to handle Richard's scourge of small cords. Hypocrisy is not merely individual but national. In time of war, national established hypocrisy is privileged in every country, to the suffering of humanity and the devastation of the world.

Richard's comments prove what a living book the New Testament is.

He quotes : "Woe unto the rich." He adds : "Not Lenin, but Christ said this."

Richard quotes again :—

"Go to now, ye rich, weep and howl for your miseries that are coming upon you, for your riches are corrupted.....Ye have lived deliciously on the earth and taken your pleasure.....The hire of your labourers.....which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth out, and the cry of them that reaped hath entered into the ears of the Lord of Hosts."

He comments on this passage : "Not Trotsky, but James the brother of Jesus, wrote this."

In a powerful passage, replete with wisdom and understanding, Richard says :—

"When the rich assemble to concern themselves with the business of the poor it is called charity. When the poor assemble to concern themselves with the business of the rich it is called anarchy."

Richard attacks sectarianism with a cord that binds rather than lashes :—

"What matter cults or sects: the Spirit pours its wine in all the cups that men hold out."

There is hope and comfort in this thought for those who frequent doctor and saint, and hear much argument, and depart by the same door as in they went! Comfort, also, for those who see war succeeding war, clouded skies, the black-out of humanity, and no promise of dawn. Rebukes Richard :—

"Impatient man! Does the tree complain because it bears fruit only in the autumn?"

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Comrade,—I have received the Xmas issue of THE WORD. May I, as a present-day C.O., congratulate you on your courage in standing so solidly for true democracy and Socialism against the black reaction of militarism and capitalism. Your excellent magazine is awaited by me eagerly each month.

I am a member of the I.L.P. and P.P.U., which seem to have been consistently anti-militarist. But I must confess that I am much attracted to Anarchism, as this seems to be the only consistent doctrine of real freedom.

With Best Wishes,

ALBERT McCARTHY.

Shirley, Southampton, December 22, 1939.

Dear Sir,—I would like to thank you very much for sending me THE WORD. It is inspiring, and was a fillip in a dull moment.

I have been before the Fulham Tribunal and objected on Religious Grounds, but was given R.A.M.C., against which I have appealed. I now await the summons to appear before the Appellate Tribunal.

It was a grand experience and I felt that I was walking in the footsteps of Our Leader, Jesus; and those of Paul and all the others who have stood for Truth and Freedom in the past.

Thank you for THE WORD. I would like my friends to have it, and send you the names of some who would like to hear the news as you give it.

I wish you well in your future efforts. May success come to us soon, although it is a slow and sure way we head. We must not expect too much.

Yours sincerely,

WILFRID I. DALLY.

Ilford, Essex, 30/1/40.

Dear Friend,—I have already expressed an appreciation of your paper.

Douglas Jackson, a member of this pacifist community initiated by Max Plowman, was given unconditional exemption at Cambridge on Tuesday, January 23.

The important point is that he appeared to receive exemption on purely pacifist and fully pacifist grounds. I mean not as a Christian, or a politician, or a rationalist, but because he renounced war and sought to live a pacific life and to build up a peace-making society. The tribunal was fair and courteous. Another applicant from here was granted unconditional exemption before Christmas. Incidentally the local paper reported that both were "conditionally registered as C.O.s"—a meaningless phrase.

Another interesting case was that of a man who was plainly incapable of writing out a statement of his conscientious objection. He had no verbal language or means of communication. He was advised to say so frankly, and added that he would probably be unable to answer many of the tribunal's questions; that nevertheless he could not participate in war. The tribunal granted him unconditional exemption. As the Chairmen said to Mr. Barrett, it placed them in an awkward predicament; they had in truth little or nothing to work on, to question him on. The decision seems one of exemplary fairness.

Yours sincerely,

LEONARD READ.

Colchester, January 28.

Dear Comrade Guy,—If the workers capitulated before the war machinery was started, how are they ever to control economic conditions, or stop the war now?

No: it will be left to the individual: to those individuals who have learnt that as Ibsen says: "The strongest man in the world is the man who stands alone." Not alone, after mass enthusiasm for wrong ideals has evaporated. The Labour Party's acceptance of the last weapon of Imperialism, will say that enthusiasm for the Labour Party, along with the Fascists, will be discredited.

I am reading the literature you sent with painful pleasure. Yes, indeed, I have been through the Pope's indecently wealthy palace: alabaster baths, original statues from Greece. It takes one hour to view it all, even in a superficial way. As one of them said: "All this we get out of the fable of Jesus Christ."

But for the creeds, and supernatural trimmings, with which he is dressed up, Christ would be misrepresented to-day, as Wat Tyler and other Christs have been. To our way of thinking, he is not only misrepresented but ignored.

There will be a press gang always, so long as capitalism exists.

A parliament that can have rich and poor under the same constitution in a land overflowing with milk and honey, is Parliament—the People's enemy.

Yours fraternally,

CLARA COLE.

Kirby, Essex. Feb. 4, 1940.

Dear Comrade Guy.—Many thanks for copies of THE WORD. Your essay, "Word To The World," was indeed fine: comparable to your old prison-written essay in THE COMMUNE, entitled: "Why Jesus Wept." Your essay has strengthened us here, in our determination to retain our manhood and uphold THE WORD till the last.

Fraternal greetings in the Cause,

SIDNEY KAYE.

London, N.W.10. February 6.

Dear Guy,—I note your remarks about political objections. I can confirm your conclusions after attending a comrade's hearing at the West London Tribunal. My view is that the Bench deliberately attempts to confuse, belittle and intimidate the C.O.s. Alderman Marshall, especially, makes no attempt to conceal his animosity to the applicants. Young lads—who, obviously are sincere in their conscientious objections—are made to feel like criminals. It does no credit to those "learned and able debaters" on the Tribunal. They aim to trick the lads by most irrelevant arguments.

One applicant, Mr. J. Bull, remarked that his nature was one of kindness. Alderman Marshall remarked "kindness is not a moral objection." He called the lad a humbug. Deep-rooted kindness may define and express moral objection.

Every attempt is made to ridicule sincere, Christian principles. Honesty of belief in moral principles is ridiculed by the learned Court as an evil infatuation to be abandoned in time of war.

The practical silence of A. B. Swales—except for constant reiteration: "Will you accept work of national importance?"—shows what careerism involves.

In the case of A. L. Cohen, who took the Socialist stand, the Tribunal was not eager to participate in discussion. Cohen is appealing. No doubt you will mention this case in THE WORD.

Cohen stated his objections in written form. He maintained that, as a Socialist, he was opposed to war. He stood for the Brotherhood of Man and would not kill his fellow-worker in the interests of capitalism.

Alderman Marshall sneered. Swales asked him to take civil work under civil authority. Cohen replied that he would not assist the war, directly or indirectly. Mr. Coker, from the Shop Assistants' Union Legal Department, spoke of Cohen's sincere work in Trade Union affairs. I spoke from long knowledge of Cohen's sincerity. Swales was impressed and said to Judge Hargreaves: "There is no doubt of the sincere conviction of Mr. Cohen." But the Bench refused exemption.

I have found your "Letters to the Editor" deeply interesting. Let me pay tribute, once again, to your untiring devotion to the class struggle and to the cause of Freedom. I only wish that your pen and voice—too long and too frequently silenced—may continue long to batter at the fortress of capitalism. You have held high the torch of Freedom—keep it burning.

Yours for Socialism,

ALEC KAYE.

Mile End, February 6, 1940.

Dear Comrade.—In response to appeal published in last month's issue, I enclose £1, being a small contribution in appreciation. May I congratulate you on such an excellent paper. It has been a pleasure to read THE WORD.

COMRADE MARSHALL.

Kirkintilloch, February 6, 1940.

Dear Guy Aldred,—I am very glad to know that you are still going strong and to have the journals you are publishing.

Yours sincerely,

A. CREECH JONES.

Transport House, London, S.W.1.
12th February, 1940.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—I went to Romford yesterday to see my old friend, G. F. Dutch. He says THE WORD is good and remembers you at Wandsworth. Dutch is making enquiry into the case of George Plume and I hope to report that something useful has been done for this comrade in the near future.

Wishing you all the best,

C. JONES.

Willesden, N.W.10.

Finally, he would have us witness against war. We must not serve Caesar or wear his honours: "Let thy crosses make of thee—a Christ."

Witness during the night even though the dawn reveals your corpse hanging on the gallows-tree! Witness during the night, that the morning might reveal your witnesses, and consecrate your purpose. Witness—that war and want might end and brotherhood be realised. Witness—that Freedom may come with the Sun.

PRISON: WHAT IT MEANS AND REQUIRES

An Essay for Conscientious Objectors

II. Thomas Dowd.

In life, Dowd seemingly was a very ordinary person, a man of criminal impulse, unworthy thought. He was a thief, with no claim to goodness. He worked alone, and shrunk from the society of his fellows. He possessed no gift of speech of writing He enunciated no philosophy. His language was the argotof the underworld. Whatever wisdom inspired his struggle, it remained his secret. No public opinion upheld his attitude and he sought no admiration from any man. Not even a cause enthused him. Yet he stood alone against almost unbearable torture within the solitude of the prison and won two wonderful victories towards a very poor and very ordinary freedom. He proved one thing—that he was indomitable This courage deserves to be remembered for all time. Every conscientious objector, who, being inspired by a cause, yet faces his captor sometimes with doubt and often with fear and trembling, must learn, as must every champion of liberty, how to be indomitable. Thomas Dowd taught that lesson. He led a useless life that preached the greater a.. most useful of all sermons for all time. Through courage, his life, of shabby detail and sordid error, has been transformed into a wonderful saga of untiring patience and heroism, so unostentatious as to seem commonplace in its grandeur. In death, poor, unknown, criminal Thomas Dowd mounts the pulpit of good faith, and bids all those who have the cause of humanity at heart, to battle without fear. To declaim this message faithfully may have been his destiny.

Thomas Dowd died one dull autumn day, in 1911, in the town of Lanford, North Carolina. He was shot to death whilst resisting arrest. There is nothing glorious in such a death. Nor is there in the details that police records of the United States supply for his biography. He is described as an expert cracksman, master of trick escapes from jail. Altogether an undesirable character. It has been said that there are sermons in stones. No one has avowed that there may be inspiration unto patience, courage, and virtue in a criminal. The real story of Thomas Dowd is replete with "inspiration." The burglar and thief came from the environment and mis-education of the man. This aspect of the man was the product of the social system into which he was born. His courage and patience belonged to him as an individual: was, in fact, the man himself.

The story begins some years before August, 1911. Thomas Dowd and his brother, Vince, were engaged in a housebreaking expedition at Asa Bradley's store, in Birmingham, Alabama. The two brothers stole furtively up to the back window of the store, started to pry it open with a jemmy. They found that the window had been unlocked. They climbed in gently, discovered an old-fashioned cash drawer, emptied its contents, and found themselves the possessors of 27 dollars in bills, and $3.65 in coin. After making certain that there was neither safe nor strongbox, the brothers gathered up the implements of their craft, and turned back to the shaded rear windows by which they had entered.

Unfortunately, the brothers' movements had been noticed by Officer Joe Chapman, who turned back to Officer Smiley, on the next beat, for reinforcement. The Dowd brothers made their exit almost openly. They had secured so little that they felt that no crime had been committed. Chapman and Smiley ran to intercept them. Vince was ahead of his brother, caught the flash of the policeman's shield, ducked aside, crying out: "Look out, Tom."

Vince and Tom found shelter of a sort. Chapman and Smiley closed in with great caution. Each had drawn his revolver.

"Step out, you two," Smiley ordered, "and come out with your mitts in the air!"

Vince answered impulsively with a shot. Both policemen fired. Vince fired again. Then Tom took a hand in the fight. Vince's third shot struck Chapman full in the face and killed him instantly. The Dowds made a dash for liberty as Smiley bent over Chapman. Seeing that his comrade was dead, Smiley gave immediate chase to the pair of armed and now desperate criminals. He fired as he ran, with greater accuracy, considering the uncertain street lighting. One bullet grazed Tom Dowd's head. Another struck Vince's elbow. A third bullet struck Tom in the thigh. He staggered, pitched forward, and fell with one leg doubled beneath him. A few feet distant was an open cellar entrance. Vince turned back to help his brother. "Go on, kid—beat it," Tom ordered. With amazing quickness and fortitude, he dragged his injured leg to the cellar entrance, and literally dived down it. "Keep going, kid—you can outrun any of 'em," Tom's voice urged. "I'm set!"

So far as Vince could see, his brother had secured a miraculous hide-out. He was accustomed to his brother's fast thinking. He ran—and ran so as to draw the chase right away from Tom's impromptu cover. He leapt clear of the show, and crossed the street deliberately beneath an arc light, and so exposed himself to Smiley's accurate fire. The policeman's gun got him in the cheek. He ran on recklessly and might have escaped but for his very fleetness of foot. He ran into another blue-coat and gleaming shield. The officer fired and missed. Vince fired and missed. It was his last shot. Smiley charged round the corner and fired—and did not miss. He did not die but lingered in the hospital, recovered, was put on trial, and hanged.

Tom Dowd lost hold of his gun when he fell. But he had the jemmy and other tools in his pockets. His clothes were sticky with blood. Crouching there, unarmed and spent, he heard the relentless, pounding steps that passed by in pursuit of his brother. Shots were heard from a distance. There was much excited discussion between people who passed near his haven. Odds and ends of phrases finally pieced themselves together in his mind. If caught, he and his brother would hang for a crime that netted them only $30.65.

Hoping that his brother would escape, Tom Dowd made a heroic effort to ensure his own safety. His wounded leg was numb. His body was scratched and bruised. He had a small electric lamp. From time to time, when the footfalls sounded some distance away, he held his coat as a kind of canopy and flashed the torch to examine his wound. At last, he opened the cellar door with his jemmy, and dragged himself inside. It was mouldy-smelling but he was out of imminent danger. He shut the door, located a semi-disused water-tap, found the water undrinkable, but used it to dampen his bandages. He knotted a handkerchief to mask the lower part of his face and hugged the shadows. An old negro caretaker appeared. Dowd told him to be silent; exchanged clothes; bound the old man up gently enough; discovered a cork and burnt it, blended it with dust, and made himself appear like a negro. As the dawn broke, he made his way to the negro quarter of Birmingham, sick, feeble, yet plucky and persevering. The cellar from which he had escaped was in litigation. The caretaker he had captured was its sole resident. Tom Dowd discovered this sometime later, after he had gained a place in which to hide and nurse his wounded leg. He was sheltered and cared for tenderly and loyally by an underworld friend. Tom Dowd's thigh-wound had turned to blood-poisoning. But the attention of his undercover samaritan saved both his life and his leg. Otherwise his leg would have had to be amputated and he would have become a cripple.

He learned sadly of the fate of his younger brother, Vince, who lay, dangerously wounded in five places and closely guarded, in a prison ward. Everything was being done to nurse Vince back to health in order that the State might hang him. The authorities had traced the bullet in Chapman's skull to Vince's weapons and announced that he alone was the killer. Although weak, Tom Dowd left his hiding place, pulled off two burglaries, and gave the proceeds to the lawyer for his brother's defence. Although he never saw his brother again, he contrived to cheer him and to communicate with him, and did all he could for him, up to the very moment of execution. After his brother's death, Tom Dowd resolved, for the future, to work alone.

Tom Dowd wandered through the country, attacking safes in villages and small towns. At last, in Bloomington, Illinois, he broke into a general store, exploded the safe, but jarred the telephone wire. This acted as a burglar alarm and the store was surrounded by armed men. Vince had been dead two years and Tom was unarmed. He surrendered and was tried and sentenced to the Illinois State penitentiary at Joliet for a term of fifteen years. He settled down mildly to prison life, and although the police had declared that he was a lone and resolute marauder, no one dreamed that he would attempt an escape. Joliet was said to be impregnable. In his heart, he believed that there was no such thing as an unbreakable jail. He had heard of others who had failed, even when aided with big sums from outside. Dowd had no money and no confederate. He belonged to no organisation. He was utterly alone. And he was unconquered within. He determined to escape. To do this he had to discover the flaw, mental or physical, in the prison or its system. This job of unearthing the "soft spot" was subtle and extensive. It demanded resourcefulness and patience. After two years he discovered what he wanted. One way and another, he had inspected every inch of the prison except the hospital. Then he managed to get into the hospital, and studied it thoroughly. One department remained closed to him—the insane ward. He resolved to penetrate this chamber of horrors.

After several more weeks of waiting and trying, Dowd got himself attached to the gang that cleaned the prison. One day he strolled into the ward of those whom crime and punishment had driven insane. His work was almost complete, when the keeper or warder in charge left the ward for a few moments. Dowd dashed to the windows and found one of the gratings loose. He left his bucket behind "accidentally" and reported it: was reprimanded, and sent in the next day to recover it. He owned a file, stolen during his "visits" to the machine shop. He slipped this behind a water-pipe before he left the maniacs' ward. And now, remembering how he had played the Negro in Birmingham, he resolved to play the maniac in Joliet. His aim was to be transferred to the maniacs' ward, and then to the room, in which he had concealed his weapon of liberty! What a man!

Tom was clever. He again waited a few weeks before going crazy. It would never do to assume madness immediately. At last the time came to execute his stratagem. One morning, a keeper found Dowd lounging in his cell, flushed with fever apparently, rambling extravagantly.

"Tell the warden," he airily instructed the amazed keeper, "I'll have my breakfast served in the cell after this. Get me some good cigars. I'm going to change a lot of things around here. No work before noon, and not much then—"

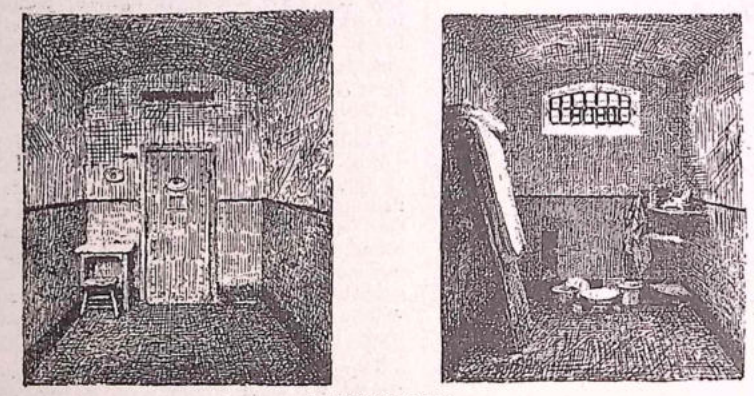
C.O. PRISON REVOLT

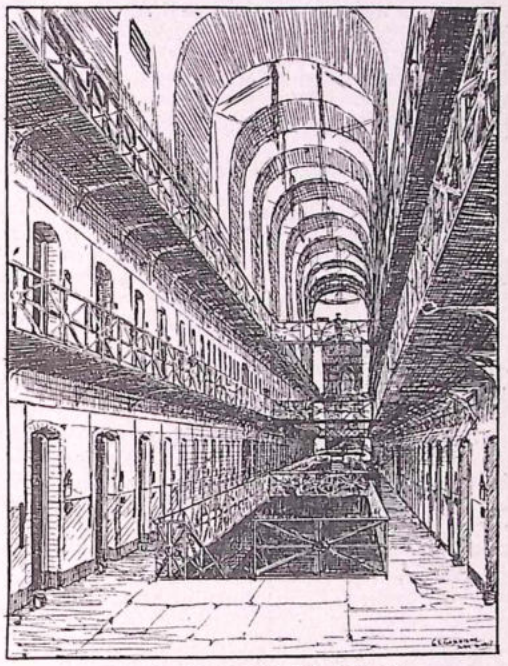
Official Wandsworth Story of when the C.O.'s went on Work, Discipline and Hunger Strike



A PRISON CELL.

Sketched by E. M. Wilson, a conscientious objector.

(1) Looking from the door, showing spy-hole in door, and gasbox above table. The glass was broken and this was used to speak through. (2) Window looking up to exercise yard in basement cells. The bed-boards were used as sounding boards. The speaker held them over him when he spoke, slanting from floor towards gasbox. Many lectures were delivered in this way.



C-HALL, WANDSWORTH PRISON.

Drawn in June, 1917, by G. E. Gaxoigne, a conscientious objector.

This was the hall in which the C.O. strike took place in 1918 and 1919. The picture shows the stairs leading to the basement in which the editor and about 30 other C.O's. suffered solitary confinement for several months.

"During my three years I was in seven prisons (if one includes the Tower of London and Chester Castle, which were places of military detention). Until I got to Liverpool I was never in a place long enough to learn the ropes sufficiently to organise a revolt; there a prisoners' committee practically ran the prison hall for ten days, though the revolt collapsed when the five ringleaders were deported and segregated in isolation in other prisons.

"At Wandsworth the revolt, led, I believe, by Guy Aldred, lasted longer. But under normal conditions such common action would be well-nigh impossible in local prisons with their changing and unrelated populations. We were organised political prisoners, and most of us were doing sentences of two years."

—Fenner Brockway in "The New Leader," September 18, 1936.

Mr. Albion Richardson, C.B.E., M.P., was appointed by the Home Secretary, on March 11th, 1919, to hold an inquiry into the allegations made against Major Blake, the Acting Governor of Wandsworth Prison.

Major Blake subsequently became Governor of Pentonville Prison. In 1926, he published a series of articles on prison life. In one of these, he described the last scenes in the Thompson-Bywaters case. As a result he was summoned, at the instance of the Director of Public Prosecutions, who alleged that his series of articles contravened the Official Secrets Act. Major Blake was committed for trial at the Old Bailey, where he was found guilty. But he escaped imprisonment. Sir Travers Humphreys, prosecuting, outlined the case in the Mansion House Police Court, on Thursday, November 15, 1926.

The case was taken at the instance of the Home Office, and with the approval of the Attorney-General. Sir Travers Humphreys prosecuted.

Prosecution was brought, Sir Travers Humphreys declared, for the purpose of establishing once and for all that persons in confidential positions under the Crown who received information in their official capacity and subsequently published it were liable to be prosecuted for criminal offence.

In the month of January, 1923, Counsel continued, Major Blake had under his charge a man named Frederick Bywaters, who had been convicted at the Central Criminal Court of murder—the murder of a man named Thompson—and who was executed in that prison. At the same time with Bywaters there was convicted a woman, Mrs. Thompson, the wife of the murdered man, and she was, of course, confined in a different prison, where she was executed.

On October 27, 1926, there appeared in the Evening News an article under the heading—"What Bywaters Said to Me, by Major Wallace Blake, ex-Governor of Pentonville."

Major Blake explained in the article how on the day before the execution of Bywaters he had him in his room and had a long talk with him, in the course of which Bywaters told him the story of his life. Major Blake proceeded to recapitulate this story for the benefit of the public.

Major Blake went on to say that at the end of the interview on the day before the execution, Bywaters asked him as a favour to come to him the next morning at 8.30—the execution was fixed for nine—and have a last talk with him.

Major Blake kept his promise to see Bywaters. The ex-prison Governor described the interview in these words:—

"The young man shook me warmly by the hand and said, 'It is her I want to speak to you about, sir. I will swear she was not guilty.' I said, 'My boy, that is no good now. She was tried and found guilty; she appealed and there is nothing left. In any case it would not be a very happy life for her after all that has happened.'

"He said, 'I cannot bear to think of them mauling her about.' I replied, 'They will be very gentle. Don't think of it. There is only a minute or two left. I should like to hear you say that you are sorry for what you did.'

"'I am, sir, d——d sorry,' 'said Bywaters, and then the door opened and they came in."

"They" meant the executioners, for the purpose of pinioning the young man, explained Sir Travers.

Counsel resumed the quotation:—

"We shook hands and he said, 'Yes, sir, I really am sorry. Good-bye.' And they marched him to the shed to send him on his last voyage."

Counsel explained Major Blake's offence from the Home Office angle. Not the least, perhaps the most, undesirable part of the Major's story, was that it purposed to say that the last thing Bywaters said was, that a woman was innocent of murder, who, in fact, was executed on the same day as he was.

Counsel added:—

"It is most undesirable to publish abroad such a statement inasmuch as there are persons who believe wrongly that what a man says just before his death must be true."

Sir Travers Humphreys described Major Blake's account as "a little doubtful" and adduced the evidence of two warders who were in charge of Bywaters, to prove what took place in the condemned cell during the last few minutes of the life of Frederick Bywaters. He made a complete confession, and used the words: "I am sorry I murdered Thompson." But he made no reference to Mrs. Thompson.

Travers Humphreys assumed that, perhaps, at some time, Bywaters did make a statement about Mrs. Thompson to Major Blake. It was not made during the last few minutes of life.

"If he did make such a statement," Sir Travers said, "in the submission of the prosecution, Major Blake was not entitled to publish the information."

The punishment inflicted on Major Blake was nominal, although it recorded conviction against him.

We record the fact here, because, if the Home Office is entitled to accuse Major Blake of false statement in one instance, and under such circumstances, his official word is open to grave doubt under all circumstances. The Major's subsequent conduct is a substantial evidence of character.

Mr. Richardson opened the Inquiry at Wandsworth Prison on March 15th and continued it on March 19th and 22nd, when it was concluded. This report, dated April 2nd, was issued on May 7th, 1919, as a white paper at 2d. nett (Cmd. 131).

I.—THE C.O. MUTINY.

Describing the conditions prevailing in the prison prior to Major Blake's appointment as Acting Governor on February 20th last, the report says:—

"For some months previous to Major Blake's arrival at the prison it had been in a condition of progressive disorder, and by February of this year the position had become one of great gravity, and there was reason to fear that a serious mutiny in the prison was imminent.

"The prison is divided into two parts; one wing of it is used as a detention barracks which is under the control of a military Governor. In it prisoners who are under sentence of detention as distinguished from imprisonment, are confined. The rest of the prison is used as a civil prison which is in charge of a civil Governor. It is of the civil side of the prison that Major Blake was appointed Acting Governor.

"About the middle of last year a certain number of 'Conscientious Objectors' confined in the prison decided to protest against their continued imprisonment, and they proceeded to set the prison rules and the prison officials at open defiance. From this time until Major Blake arrived at the prison, these men constantly held meetings in the prison at which they addressed their fellow prisoners, and at these meetings extreme socialistic views were promulgated. 'The Red Flag' and other revolutionary songs were constantly sung by them during the day and the evening. Nearly every night they disturbed the whole prison by banging their cell doors with stools and bedboards, in such a manner as to deprive their fellow prisoners of their sleep and of the necessary quiet to enable them to read in their cells during the time reading was permitted. Many protests were made by the other prisoners against the misery and hardship which the conduct of these 'Conscientious Objectors' was causing them, and complaints were also received from local residents in the neighbourhood of the continual noise and disturbance created by them.

"The military prisoners confined in the part of the prison used as a detention barracks are drilled during the day in a square in the prison which is adjacent to the 'C' wing where the 'Conscientious Objectors' are confined. The cell windows of one side of the 'C' wing look out into this square. It was proved by the evidence of sergeants from the detention barracks that on several occasions from November of last year onwards, 'Conscientious Objectors' confined in these cells incited these military prisoners to mutiny and to attack the sergeants in charge of them. On December 23rd a mutiny of the military prisoners at the detention barracks which had been carefully planned, was narrowly averted . . .

"On the 17th February some of the military prisoners confined on the civil side of the prison mutinied and attacked their warders. There can be no doubt that the conduct of the disorderly section of the 'Conscientious Objectors' and their direct incitements to their fellow prisoners to set the prison authority at defiance, was one of the main causes of this outbreak.

"By this time all attempts to enforce discipline in the prison amongst the disorderly section of 'Conscientious Objectors' had apparently been abandoned.

"While the promoters of the disorder in the prison belonged almost exclusively to the prisoners classed as 'Conscientious Objectors,' it is right to point out here that a considerable number of 'Conscientious Objectors' from the first refused to take part in the disturbance, and have used their utmost efforts to prevent it.

"The truth is, that the prisoners in Wandsworth Prison classed as 'Conscientious Objectors' belong to schools of thought which are widely separated. They may be divided into three classes, the first consisting of those who have a sincere conscientious objection to any form of military service, the second of those who falsely pretend to hold certain religious views in order to escape from its perils, and the third composed of men who profess anarchical doctrines, who deny the validity of the law, and the right of the State to trench upon individual freedom. It was to this last class that the disorder in the prison was mainly due."

II.—MAJOR BLAKE'S CONDUCT.

After the attack on the prison warders on February 17th, the Prison Commission decided that, to restore order the Governor should be given leave of absence for one month, and Major Blake appointed as Acting Governor in his place. The report adds that Major Blake had a long experience of convict prisons, dating from the year 1902, and had successively filled the positions of Governor of Borstal, Worcester, Lewes, and Chelmsford Prisons.

This gallant gentleman arrived at Wandsworth Prison on February 20th, at about 2 o'clock. The complaints made as to his conduct on that date refer to incidents which took place within half an hour of his arrival and during the time that he was making his initial inspection of the prison in the company of Chief Warder Brown. Major Blake in his evidence gave the following version and explanation of these incidents:—

"I said to Mr. Brown (the Chief Warder) about 2 or half past 2, 'Let us go inside.' When we came inside the prison there was in that hall you have just seen, C.2 they call it, a gang of men, I did not know who they were, drawn up, and they were singing and making an awful noise absolutely unheard of in any prison I had been in. I said 'silence.' One man shouted out, 'Get your hair cut,' another made a disgusting and offensive noise with his mouth, some other men made some other remarks, and somebody shouted out from the back, 'Who is this bloody swine?' or 'Hark at the bloody swine!'"

Questioned by Mr. Richardson, Major Blake stated that the man who appeared to be the most impertinent was Ralph Frederick Harris, the author of the petition demanding that measures of restraint should be taken against the C.O.s on strike. Harris did not say anything abusive, but he was grinning and giggling.

"And I said, 'Take that man down below.' He was taken down below. These men were marched off, and I went round the yard and into that big workshop. I wanted to see the other men at work. There are 100 Conscientious Objectors and 450 other men here. I was not particularly interested in the Conscientious Objectors. In the workshop there were some decently behaved people sitting down and working quietly, and the officer in charge reported 'All correct, Sir.' Then from the other door marched in, singing 'The Red Flag,' a gang of these Conscientious Objectors. They were noisy, and I saw the other men were getting restive at once. Nearly all the prisoners are soldiers, you know. There was a restive look about them. I said, 'March these men out.' I rather think I said, 'March these noisy devils out of here. I won't have them disturbing the decently behaved or respectable prisoners.' I had a purpose in saying that. As they went out they started shouting and yelling, and so for the benefit of everyone concerned I shouted to these men, 'You damned mutinous swine, I have come down here to restore order, and if you do not behave yourselves I will give you hell.' . . . I did not know what to do with these fellows. The prison was in an appalling state; I simply cracked a whip at them; I lashed out at them with my tongue. I called them 'Damned mutinous swine,' most disgusting words to use, but I am not apologising for it. It was the only thing to do. The consequence was their tails went down at once; they have never misbehaved since."

III.—SOME PASSING COMMENT.

We will interrupt this report to point out that the pretence that Major Blake restored order to the prison by his bullying tactics or cowed the strikers is nonsense in view of the fact that the bulk of the strikers had been released at this time under the "Cat and Mouse Act." Major Blake was cowing, mostly, the men who had refused to strike and were opposed to striking. It is also false to deny, as this report does, that they had been subject to rigorous punishment for several months prior to their release. The Prison Commission discharged them first and then boasted of Major Blake's powers to cow them when they were not there. Intelligent, truthful Commissioners!

Continuing, the report states that Major Blake "denied that he called a prisoner named Fox 'a Bolshevist,' as Fox had stated, but admitted that he had applied the term to a prisoner named Guy Aldred. It is right to observe in this connection that the last named man had been previously convicted and sentenced to prison for publishing a seditious libel, and is in connection with a paper that propagates anarchical doctrines."

May we point out that this reference to Guy Aldred was quite gratuitous? Aldred was not a prisoner in Wandsworth at this time, and it is hardly in keeping with prison discipline for an Acting Governor to go round discussing the political opinions of an ex-prisoner with the men whom he is "disciplining."

IV.—PROVEN CHARGES.

Mr. Richardson's report finds Major Blake guilty of using "indiscreet language." The following "findings" are quoted from the report:—

(1) "As to the complaint made with reference to the treatment of Harris, the account that Harris gave was that Major Blake having said to him that 'he would not have any of his damned impertinence' (words which Major Blake admitted he might have used), he ejaculated 'By Jove!' and Major Blake then ordered that he should be taken down to the strong cells and placed on figure 8's, which I learned was the name for a form of handcuff which has not been used in any prison for many years, and of which there were none in Wandsworth Prison. It may be, however, that the expression is used colloquially amongst prison officials to describe the form of handcuff at present used. The version given by Joseph Goss, an ex-prisoner, who gave evidence in support of some of the charges against Major Blake, was that Major Blake said to Harris: 'Take that man down to the punishment cells and put him in irons, or in the 8's if necessary.' I think this is probably an accurate version of the words Major Blake used."

(2) "As to the allegation that on the 20th February the Governor without sufficient cause threatened all the 'Conscientious Objectors' present with bread and water, this charge was developed at the Inquiry by several witnesses, who stated that this threat was made on the way back from the association shed in the afternoon, and that it was coupled with the order to put the men in irons. I have no doubt that language of this kind was used by Major Blake on this occasion."

(3) "I think the proceedings at the hearing of the charges made against the men on the morning of the 21st February were too hurriedly conducted, and that it would have been better if more time and care had been given to their investigation."

(4) "It is clear that in some cases in which Major Blake ordered forfeiture of privileges there is no time limit imposed. Under the Regulations the Governor has no power to order the forfeiture of privileges for more than one month, and the form in which he made the order in these cases was irregular."

(5) "The allegation with respect to the prisoner Ford that he was roughly handled by a warder named Miller refers to an incident that is alleged to have happened on the morning of the 21st February. . . . Miller admitted that Ford was screaming most of the way to his cell. Ford made a complaint next morning to Dr. James Smyth, the Visiting Surgeon of the Prison, in reply to his inquiry, whether he had any complaints. The doctor, as he admitted in his evidence, merely observed, 'you probably got what you deserved' and passed on. . . . Ford had not in fact taken part with the disorderly section of the prisoners in the disturbances. . . . The conclusion to which I have come upon the evidence is that Ford was treated with a considerable degree of unnecessary violence by Miller in removing him to his cell. I cannot accept Miller's story that any force he used was due to Ford's struggling and resisting."

(6) Major Blake admitted that he used strong and violent language on February 20th. I think he used language of the same kind to many of the men who were brought before him on February 21st, charged with disorderly conduct on the previous day."

(7) While the occasion called for stern treatment, in employing these epithets, Major Blake, in my judgment, showed a want of discretion."

V.—A COWARDLY PETITION.

The disgraceful petition of Ralph Frederick Harris is published as an appendix to this report. We cite the following passages from this petition, in order to indicate its tenor and purpose:—

(1) "Humbly sheweth causes for measures of restraint to be taken against existing disorder among prisoners known as conscientious objectors."

(2) "Chronic disgusting and outrageous noises created night after night, before and after 'lights out' by many men who are categoried as C.O. prisoners."

(3) "These pervivacious and wretched night brawlers."

(4) "When I am settled down in the natural quiet of the prison, I receive a very violent attack to my nerves from these sudden and formidable noises."

(5) ". . . it has a most violent and pernicious influence on my nerves as a helpless and unfortunate hearer."

(6) "The noises produced from the mouth [i.e. speaking and singing] . . . are sufficiently exasperating to make it quite impossible to study or even to read intelligently, and it makes also the task of labour increasingly difficult to perform by reason of painful headaches brought on by all the noise, and sleep is entirely out of the question for at least one or two hours after all the noise has ceased, owing to the excitable state of my nerves."

(7) ". . . this nightly performance of all the evil rows these men can create is nothing short of being tortuous, and it is against this mental torture that I implore the Home Secretary's order of protection."

(8) "On Wednesday of this week I was forced at last to make a protest to the Governor against the disgraceful behaviour and the unconscionable noise of these men, and to beg of him to take strong and immediate measures against this deplorable outbreak of hooliganism, so as either to prevent of lessen it in the future. The Governor was sympathetic and concurred with me in that it was desirable to bring this disorder to an end but deprecated his inability to do so. I now, therefore, petition the Home Secretary to urge him to consider the advisability of authorising the Wandsworth prison officials to take such steps as are useful and, I would submit, necessary to restrain these noisesome and turbulent prisoners."

(9) "I would earnestly solicit that my condition of imprisonment should not be allowed to be made intolerable by the actions of a few unreasonable men who persist in imposing their obnoxious noises on my quiet. The mental strain of prison environment and existence I find all sufficient to bear without having in addition to suffer further mental burdens, especially those resulting from the childish acts of irresponsible men."

(10) ". . . these so-called comrades have by virtue of their revolting and loathsome conduct forfeited every right to my consideration of them as comrades and fellow C.O.s."

(11) ". . . little more than obstreperous and unruly prisoners and I submit accordingly that they should be dealt with as such."

(12) "Strongly trusting that the Home Secretary will see his way to taking measures that will right this annoying state of rowdyism."

This is the man who had to complain of the Acting Governor's treatment, when that gentleman was sent to restore "order" so much desired by Harris. Did ever a man draw up a more contemptible attack on his "comrades"? But we have no doubt the movement will appreciate his conduct at its true worth.

W. A. RATHKEY.

(Concluded from 3rd column.)

cuffs were taken off on board ship, I was locked in the cells until the ship was well out to sea, and I was also in the cells below ship across the Mediterranean. I was escorted by Sergt. Williams and Corpl. Findlay, of the 103rd Training Reserve, Portobello. I was told at Barlinnie that I was to be flattened out. I was told by a friendly N.C.O. on board to bolt as soon as I arrived at Alexandria. I was told at Gabarree that I was to be finished off. . . .

"I have been in chains and handcuffs, crucified to a tree in the broiling sun nearly every morning and evening, and for five months bread and water and solitary confinement. I refused to do any work whatever, so I leave you to guess what five months alone in a cell, doing nothing, is like. Seven times I went down with dysentery, and seven times I managed to get on my feet and face the music. I fainted, and had to be driven away in a barrow. This tropical sun and chaining up nearly drove me mad. I stuck it, and got finally bowled out, and was sent to 19th General Schools Hospital for 17 days. I was offered R.A.M.C. work. I refused it, and asked to be sent back to prison to do full six months. I left hospital next day, and was doing seven days No. 1 P.O., chained up in the sun, etc., when suddenly I had the chains taken off and I was released. They have discovered at last that they cannot break me. They failed at Barlinnie, and I intend them to fail here. I am determined to sacrifice all rather than give in. Many times I thought I should hang in the sun and die. I pleaded with the sentry to shoot me. I cannot tell you the misery of it. . . .

"I was flooded for weeks in my cell with water, two buckets of creosol were thrown in, and I was gassed. I was naked for several days and nights in chains. I had to lie on the concrete floor. However, I believe the doctor stopped these horrible proceedings."

TAMING THE C.O.

TWO STUDIES IN MILITARY TORTURE.

The following studies in the treatment of C.O.s during the Great War were published in the famous N.C.F. paper, The Tribunal, for September 14, 1917.

"A. P. Catherall . . . has been recently court-martialled for the fourth time at Prees Heath Camp, and from there has sent us an account of his experiences in France. It will be remembered that Catherall was injured while tree-felling in the H.O. Scheme, and was therefore returned to Dartmoor on convalescent work, when, at a minute's notice, he was arrested and returned to the Army at Bath without any charge being made against him. Here he was sentenced to 84 days' hard labour, which he served in Bristol Prison, and was then again returned to Bath. He was forced into uniform, dragged to Bath Station, and sent over with a draft to France on 6th December, 1917. On his arrival in Camp 8, Havre, he had thrust on his head an improperly-adjusted gas-mask and, with his hands behind his back, was compelled to pass through a gas chamber.

"Still he persisted in disobeying orders, and was sentenced to 84 days' Field Punishment No. 1, in No. 6 Compound. Refusing to work under military control, he was sentenced to serve 21 days in a small black painted iron-lined cell, with a concrete floor, on alternative diets of 8-ozs. and 14-ozs. of biscuits and water. He was 'leg-ironed and handcuffed night and day,' and in addition roped to posts during the two hours at night. His limbs were freed each day for only a few minutes while he washed. In reply to the customary 'any complaints?' he asked if his treatment were legal as he had not been violent. For this 'threatening conduct' his hands were handcuffed behind him for three days and nights.

"On about the twentieth day of this torment he was removed in irons to another prison, where in company with another prisoner—an ordinary soldier—he was sentenced 'to be shot at dawn.' He was told that night he could escape death even then if he would agree to obey orders. Still he refused. . . .

"He was detained in cells without further charge still handcuffed and leg-ironed, until seven weeks had elapsed when, his sentence being completed, he was escorted to Havre.

"Here he was sentenced to 112 days' hard labour, to be served in Havre Military Prison. Again under military control he refused to work or to obey orders, with the result that he found himself inside a small punishment cell similar to that of No. 6 Compound. This time he was fed with bread and water on alternate days until he was transferred to Winchester Civil Prison—about end of June, 1918."

J. B. Saunders was arrested in May, 1916. He was conveyed to Edinburgh, where he gave in, joined the R.S.F., and was promoted to Lance-Corporal. He remained convinced that war was wrong and felt that he had behaved like a coward. In October, 1916, he was sent home on furlough. He absented himself, was rearrested, taken to Portobello, and sentenced by Court Martial to one year's detention. He served three months at Barlinnie Military Detention Barracks and was returned to Portobello. He was sent to France and was court-martialled for refusing to carry equipment. He was sentenced to seven days' detention and sent to Alexandra, which he reached on April 14, 1917. He was court-martialled for his persistent refusal to render military service, sentenced to six months' hard labour, and sent to Gabarree Prison.

Saunders was released from Gabarree Prison and shipped secretly to France under a false name and regiment.

During this interlude of semi-freedom he wrote a number of letters to his wife, who lived at "Walpole," Halesworth, Suffolk, describing his treatment. His regimental number was No. 315090, 16th R. Sussex Regt., Mustapha Camp, Mesopotamia Details, Alexandria, Egypt.

The following extracts speak for themselves:

"I was kicked out of Gabarree prison on Saturday, 18th August, and since then I have been in this camp. I want you to understand once and for all that I am doing nothing. I will not submit to Conscription. Therefore, I am in the same position I was on that memorable Thursday when I left Walpole, and I am confidently awaiting for the military to reimprison me on another false charge.

"Please understand I will never give in. The authorities here now admit I am a C.O. and I am offered N.C. work. This I refuse absolutely for two reasons. I was sent out here in irons by the most despicable methods anyone can conceive. I was put into handcuffs and chained to another soldier. When the hand-

PICKETING WANDSWORTH PRISON

By CLARA COLE.

[Clara Cole, who played a conspicuous part protesting against the ill-treatment in prison of the hunger-striking suffragettes, adopted a vigorous anti-militarist attitude on the outbreak of the Great War in August, 1914. When the conscientious objectors in Wandsworth Prison staged their work and discipline strike, and finally resorted to the hunger strike, she stood outside the prison with a banner, in support of their conduct, every day for fifteen weeks, beginning Monday, January 15, 1919. Her experiences were related in the columns of The Workers' Dreadnought.—Ed.]

Fred Sellar, Guy Aldred, and T. E. Ellison, after being in prison off and on, during and after the war for three years, finally hunger-struck.

Fred's sweetheart came to me one morning in great distress, saying they were to be forcibly fed.

This forcible feeding was to be done in order to impair their health, their spirits they could not touch.

Forcible feeding, in their debilitated state, might have meant death. I put down the broom with which I was sweeping the floor, went straight to the Governor at Wandsworth, and told him I should bring a rug and lie outside the prison until they were released.

After they were released, and hearing that many others were hunger-striking upon already empty stomachs and with debilitated frames, and fearing that if every man had to hunger-strike before being released there would not be many to come out alive, or if alive it would be with impaired constitutions, I decided to try a protest outside the prison walls, and bring home to those people who have not sufficient imagination to realise it, the meaning of conscientious objection and all it entails.

I therefore began a parade outside Wandsworth Prison on Monday, January 15, 1919, displaying a placard with the words: "We protest against the persecution and imprisonment of conscientious objectors to war," and distributing leaflets printed with the words of Lord Roberts and Captain Gwynn on the injustice of punishing conscience. This I continued each day without a break from about 11 a.m. to 4 p.m.

At first I took up my stand against the walls of the prison, but the head warder came out and courteously informed me that the courtyard in front was their especial property, and remarked that the roadway was just below.

I made a rule never to speak to anyone until they spoke to me, and though more than once I had as many as eighteen soldiers all seemingly hostile, I have never refused to answer a question or return argument for argument. On the other hand I have had the same number listen in respectful silence to my explanations of the C.O.'s position and sincerity.

This last happened early in the first week when an escort after pacing up and down from the door to the road and meeting me as I walked across the front of the prison, finally glancing questioningly at me, burst forth with: "Mother! Have you a son in there?" There was a little lump in my throat as I replied: "You are all my sons, I do it for you, too," and then for ten minutes amid absolute silence I held a peace meeting, for all the others clustered round. Feeling curious as to whether he agreed or not, I ventured to put a test question to the first speaker, a young man about 23: "Would he like to bear a baby for war?" With no hesitation, but great excitement, he exclaimed: "I'd drown it first!"

The sergeants who give "punishment drill" to the poor soldiers who have fought for their country, but who land in prison for overstaying leave or some other trifling offence, were less sympathetic than the escorts and the men who had been to the front.

I was told a hundred times that the C.O. ought to be shot. Then I remembered that if everyone were in agreement with me the C.O. would not be in prison and there would be no need for me to be there, so I continued my slow and limited walk.

One day the escort of Canadians sent to bring a soldier from prison included a black man. If this had happened in Germany!

A touching incident occurred on the first Friday of my picketing, when two lads of 16 or 17, who were waiting outside the prison for over an hour, continually shouted abuse and called me vile names. Four small children just out of school stood a few yards off, saying: "Don't you cheek her!" After an encounter with a hostile group, as a young Canadian airman was going away, he stretched out his hand and said: "I do admire your bravery." Having been on more than one occasion subjected to sarcastic compliments, I asked: "Do you really mean it?" The answer came quickly: "I do, indeed I do." Another Canadian, not in agreement with my anti-war views, told me a long story of a C.O. he had known in Canada whom he had "handled" in his military capacity, saying: "He was such a perfect gentleman, well educated, but nothing could make him obey orders, yet he was never disrespectful." The case had specially interested him, for he found that, though stationed miles away, the C.O. had come from his own town, and they had much in common. The influence of the C.O.'s position is found in many and unexpected places. During one of the arguments on war and atrocities, I told a group of my opponents that we were the first to throw bombs from the air. One young soldier who did not seem to possess a humanitarian side to his nature, said: "Yes, I know it and we were the last." "What an honour!" was all I could say. How effectively the capitalist press has done its evil work has been more than ever brought home to me in these late experiences. The soldiers, the men, women and even the children never express their hatred of the enemy or the C.O. except in the phrases of the newspapers. Their sneers and taunts are the headlines they cull from their only literature, if one can apply such a term to the foul stuff.

One Friday afternoon as two well-dressed men of the interesting military age of 40 to 45 were passing, a soldier called out to them: "Spit on her banner!" and one of these English gentlemen replied: "I should like to." On the other hand a man who passed in a trap each day, said: "Good morning." Once he stopped his horse to inquire: "Are you cold, Mother?"

Another time I had the pleasure of seeing H. Runham Brown, released on failing health. The fact was plain after one glance at his face. Needless to say, I did not detain him beyond a handshake. One C.O. who was entering for a repeated term raised his cap, and I shouted among plenty of khaki; "Stick it, Comrade, someone must object."

The young girls, soldiers' wives, with tiny babies, decked in the latest finery, showing the pride of motherhood, continually enter that small but strong door (it is as hard to get into a prison as to get out). They emerge shaking with sobs and stagger up the road, often saying: "Oh, it's cruel, cruel; after he's been out and done his bit, too."

A mother and daughter, apparently munition workers, carefully read my banner and told the soldier they visited about me. He sent word out by them, that he was going to be a C.O., and that they were to be sure to tell me and remember him to me. As we talked, up came two other women who began abusing me in very strong language. My new friends retaliated on my behalf, the elder woman saying she had four sons at the front, and one had the D.S.O. I had literally to make the peace.

Even the policemen were sympathetic, and each morning greeted me. They accepted my papers pleasantly. Their niceness should be noted.

One lad greeted me each day with: "She's got bats in her attic," and a young snob of 14, in cap which betokens one of the superior schools, passed me hesitatingly for four days, and then said: "I wouldn't stand there doing that for those cowards," quite unconscious of his own cowardice in taking four days to muster up his courage to insult a woman who held opinions different from his own. The principal taunt thrown at me was the question: "Where would you have been if we hadn't defended you?" My reply was: "No man fights in my name," or "That's what they say in Germany," in every country, in fact. "Don't talk of defending women and children when there are NOW more widows and orphans in the world through war than ever there were before!" Strange as it may sound, the soldiers do not seem to have much admiration for the women they have defended and who made no protest at the soldier being pushed in front of them.

The tastefully-attired women with well-groomed babies who turn away and sneer: "The idea!" never realise that if there are no conscientious objectors there is nothing in the future to save their babies from the horrors of war. The woman who passes daily and says: "They should have fought for us and then they wouldn't have to suffer," is oblivious of the fact that those prison doors open far oftener to receive the men who have fought, than for the men who have rebelled and protested. What our dear lads have suffered physically and mentally is the thought that constantly obsesses me.

The majority of the soldier prisoners are young, their ages ranging from 17 to 20. Some of the lads joined up when they were 15, and one soldier told me he ran away and joined up at 14. These young lads cannot stand the discipline. Most of those boys and men would never have seen the inside of a prison but for the war.

As the escort to whom one had been handcuffed rubbed his badly-marked wrists, he said the lad was dangerous—he was only 16 years old. That morning he had asked for a drink of water and, upon receiving it, threw the pail over the officer. "A high-spirited lad" would have been the verdict had he behaved thus to an alien enemy.

Two lads were brought up and, as the door shut, their escorts fumed up and down, declaring they were heroes and ought to be decorated for what they had done, not imprisoned. They had been twice over the top, taken prisoners in Germany and escaped. Then, just for overstaying their leave, they were imprisoned. As a C.O. remarked: "The principle of militarism is to make the men more afraid of their own officers than they are of the enemy."

One day about 50 soldiers went in with fixed bayonets, and from the mutterings around I gathered that ghastly things go on in the military side of a prison as well as in the trenches, but these are committed in the name of discipline, justice, and freedom.

Prisoners going out, and prisoners coming in, meet and greet with little to look forward to in either case, as I am told prisoners are released before their sentences are up, in order that they may be sent abroad and then to the front—a mean way of getting recruits.

On 25th January, a group of French Canadians asked what my banner meant, and offered me money. I thanked them, and said I was doing it for love. They were anxious to know about it; as they knew little English, and I less French, we were getting on slowly, until a soldier stepped forward saying he understood English perfectly and would act as interpreter. After that we had a good talk on The International, Socialism, and the war. They were war-weary, and only anxious for home; agreed with all I said, emphasising each point by sharp nods and gestures, and again tried to press money upon me. Their trusting faces were made for better things than war, and it must be torture for such men to live in the army.

A girl-wife came out of prison and told me her husband and another C.O. who were on the military side were to be sent to France. Knowing what that meant, I understood her state of mind as she hurried off to try and set the indifferent and cumbersome machinery of the War Office in motion, and then, in case he should be sent away without warning, came back to watch the prison for hours in extreme cold, as so many poor relatives and friends of both C.O.s and soldiers do.

A Belgian officer slowly read my placard, which bore the inscription: "We protest against the persecution and imprisonment of Conscientious Objectors to war," then clapped his hands and nodded his head.

As a white-faced soldier read the banner and entered the prison he added: "And for us, too." The door clanged to before I could reply, and my heart surged with pity for him and revolt at capitalism, that has made conscripts of us all in some measure; for is not some portion of every penny we spend used to keep the war going?

One old gentleman of 85 often passed and greeted me with a sympathetic word, and at parting: "Good-bye and God bless you. I am glad to see you here again."

There came a Red-Letter day. I had more sympathisers than usual; one, an elderly working man, asked me to explain my placard. After I had done so, he said: "I should be in prison too, if I were a young man." Then I said: "I should carry the banner for you also."

A woman who said she had noticed me for many days asked me to tell her all about it, afterwards thanked me very much, and said joyfully: "I shall be able to show my friends these papers you have given me." A bluejacket and soldier approved of my banner, and gave me a fair chance to state the case. Another said: "You are a sticker," and two prisoners (soldiers) came out who had evidently changed their thinking, and said my banner was quite right. So, though the snow was falling, these and other signs that people are "coming to" after the chloroform of the Press, made the day more bearable.

An armed escort with fixed bayonets of between 40 and 50 men took in a batch of prisoners, mostly boys. What had they done?

"You are a marvel of endurance," said a warder.

A sergeant, in no way a pacifist, for he would not even discuss my views, wanted to know if I received money for this work. Although not agreeing with my views, he told me that the other sergeants had said I was well paid for the job, but he had maintained I got nothing and wanted me to corroborate it. I told him untold wealth would not buy what was my labour of love.

Saturday, 8th February, an ambulance car, No. L.U. 4470 C39, drove up; out of it hobbled with difficulty a German prisoner with one leg, accompanied by a soldier with fixed bayonet. What tragedy lay behind that and many other strange entrances and exits, I dumbly wondered.

I had a disheartening morning, for some soldiers offered personal violence for the first time during my sojourn for a month. One took me by the shoulders and pushed me along, after threatening to take my banner and trying to make me go away. A woman joined in, and threatened what she would do. I did not remove my hands from my muff, but told them I did not take orders from soldiers, that I should resist no personal violence, but if they took my banner away I should go home and get another as I had 13 more.

A bright girl with pretty hair, waited long and restlessly with a sailor friend; finally the door opened for her and out came her lover. As he stepped over the threshold she flung her arms wide, then clasped him tight, and let him go only to repeat the action. It was so passionate, so spontaneous, that everyone was touched, and as the doorkeeper good-naturedly called out: "Hold on a bit," the tension was relaxed, the sailor friend shouldered the kit, whilst the girl grasped her lover's arm tightly with both hands, as though to keep him from the escort, who smilingly and considerately walked behind.

A sergeant came up to three soldiers to whom I was speaking and told them to clear off or I should convert them to Bolshevism. After they had gone away, I remarked to the sergeant: "You are not afraid of me, are you?" In a friendly voice he replied: "It's a pity everyone else has not got your intelligence." A soldier told me that when a friend of his received his discharge papers, he tore them up, laid them on the officer's table, and said: "Now I am going to be a conscientious objector."

I saw two C.O.s going back to prison. They had been out to attend, one a mother's funeral and the other a sister's. I was looking out for a third, who had just had his 21st birthday in prison, and was out at his sweetheart's funeral.

26th February, 1919.—Three women in wretched health and much worried asked me to protest for the soldiers in prison, and told me the soldier they were visiting had been let off a three years' sentence in order that he might go to the war. He was now rearrested to serve his former conviction. They thought going to the war would exempt him from serving his previous term.

Just as I was rolling up my banner a friend (the governor's housekeeper) handed me hot tarts and a cake. A soldier came up and said: "I was a volunteer, but I am not proud of it." To-day I hear the Australians have mutinied inside the prison.

My fifteenth week; a Canadian came up and said he had seen me weeks ago and wanted to speak but didn't get the chance. He said he had never forgotten "'The Greatest Conscientious Objector' and the picture." This referred to the linen placard I carried, on which was portrayed the head of Christ, crowned with thorns. Surrounding this picture centre were the words: "The Greatest Conscientious Objector said: 'Thou shalt not kill.'"

The Canadian said that this picture and the words had burnt into his brain. He had gone back and told the orderly about it.

A Wandsworth drill sergeant rushed up to me as I carried this placard with renewed enthusiasm, and exclaimed: "Mrs. Cole, you are a hypocrite. You an agnostic, yet carry that." I replied: "I carry the words because they are true, whoever might have said them."

Another drill-sergeant came up to my side and whispered in my ear the very laudable sentiment that "He never went over the top but he prayed he might not kill a man."

But unless men consider before war is declared we shall have war; only one soldier in a thousand—if so many—rebelled after the war started.

The nation that can boast of the most C.O.s, not the most soldiers, will eventually be the greatest. Then women will bring their children into the world to live for one another, not to die in the act of murder, for that is what "killed in action" means.

The importance of the stand of the C.O.s is not yet realised. When War flies in at the window, Reason flies out at the door. On the day the C.O. is acknowledged, the first screw will be twisted into the coffin of General Militarism.

The Conscientious Objector had the helpful confidence of doing right in a righteous cause, the soldier had the hindering fact to combat that he was doing wrong, even if it was in a righteous cause.

Wrong is bred from wrong, and righteousness from right, and we must not do wrong that right may come. If we do, we thereby forfeit our claim to Justice. The soldier had the appreciation of the crowd, but the C.O. had the appreciation of a greater thing—his conscience.

"WE MUST WIN THIS WAR"

Slogan of the Over-Age Conchies

One of the tests of genuineness, addressed by members of Tribunals, to the youths who apply for exemption on conscience grounds, is that the applicant shall pledge his opposition to all war, and not merely to this war. Yet, outside the Tribunal, these same officials consort openly with persons who posed as "conchies" during the last war, and support the present war. In Glasgow, Sir Archibald Campbell Black, Chairman of the Glasgow and West of Scotland conscientious Objectors Tribunal, insists that, to be genuine, a person must be opposed to all war. Yet he leaves the Tribunal and makes presentations, and neat speeches on patriotism, to Lord Provost Dollan, for supporting this war, knowing that the Lord Provost was a "conchie" during the last war. Ought not the Glasgow Chairman to face a test for sincerity? Ought he not to apply his own logic to the Dollan case? Does he not think that the Dollan business is a civic scandal? Dollan is over military age and so he is no longer a conscientious objector. But some of the youths resisting war to-day are genuine in their conscientious scruples against war.

The same conduct is being endorsed and applauded in other cities.

A Stockport reader sends us a cutting from a local paper reporting a meeting held at the Central Hall, Hillgate, Stockport, on Saturday, January 27, last. This meeting was addressed by the Rt. Hon. Herbert Morrison, M.P., leader of the London County Council, who was described as the "Prime Minister of London"! Poor London!

Morrison was accompanied on the platform by the two prospective Labour candidates for Stockport: William Mellor and R. D. Casasola. The Chairman was T. Baldwin. The platform party included Alderman F. Bowler, J.P., and the Labour Party secretary, W. H. Kinsley. It was a wild night of Labour Party careerist and militarist demonstration.

The Chairman said that the Labour Party was a peace party, but it was determined to stop Fascist aggression. This is the rhetorical and hypocritical way of conceding that the Labour Party is a war party. It is calculated to receive huge "Socialist" applause.

R. D. Casasola explained that the Labour Party had made its choice and hated and despised the philosophy of German Fascism. This meant that the Labour Party stood for war and British capitalism. Casasola explained that, after the war was over they had to be sure that a decent economic peace was made. The root cause of war was capitalism, and if they made peace on the same economic basis as the last peace, sons of the lads who were now called up would be fighting the next war.

There is no guarantee that anything like a Socialist peace as required by Casosola will happen when the war is over. The war is a capitalist war and will be concluded on capitalist terms, unless some unexpected social change intervenes. Casosola's remarks are words, words! When the youth is conscripted, he obeys the capitalist militarist machine. All this nonsense about speculative Socialism is not allowed for in the training camp or on the parade ground. The Labour Party know that this fancy window-dressing is undiluted false pretences.

William Mellor made the most disgraceful speech of the evening.

Mellor, described how, after much self-questioning, he decided, during the Great War, he could not support the British cause. He described his fate in consequence:—

> "Mr. Wm. Mellor said that 22 year ago he was languishing in Wormwood Scrubbs, and was later in Dartmoor, Knutsford Gaol, and in a nursery garden working along with German prisoners on work of national importance. (Laughter.)"

Why that laughter?

Mellor stated that Harry Pollitt had persuaded him to change his attitude towards the war. He knew now that he must support grey capitalism against black capitalism. Grey capitalism left the workers the right to free speech and representation; but black capitalism destroyed these rights.

The representation troubles Mellor! It means M.P. after his name; £600 per annum; and economic security for life. He thinks that grey capitalism boasts mighty good prospects!

"I have found my mind changing its viewpoint," Mellor added. "Perhaps I have been wrong."

He depicted "black capitalism" sweeping the world, and added:—

> "Mr. Chamberlain is head of the war Government to-day against his will, because if he were not he would not be in the Government at all. In the challenge now taken up I am at one with the Allies."

Is this not what the "Socialist" militarists said in 1914 when they supported the Allies? Mellor did not believe it then. He was of military age. He believes it to-day, when he is no longer of military age. But the Socialist youth of to-day think and feel as Mellor did in 1914. Perhaps some of these will be war-mongers twenty years hence, when they are over military age!

Having taken his stand for militarism and recruiting, Mellor threw the following sop to Labour feelings and traditions:—

> "This war could be made into a holy war against Fascism and Capitalism, and whether or not it was so depended on ordinary men and women. They must regard capitalism, unemployment and war as one family."

The enunciation of these platitudes led Mellor to his great and ridiculous peroration:—

> "Were I 23 again, I would gladly be in khaki."

Only the war must remain the war of the grey capitalism of Britain against the black capitalism of Germany.

> "It must not be allowed to develop into a holocaust of Imperialism against the Soviet Union."

And a Labour audience cheered this rubbish. Applauded this man, who would not fight when he was of military age, standing for youth being coerced to-day. Listened to this eloquence of futility and careerism, this masquerade of self-seeking!

Herbert Morrison made a patriotic speech, in which he discovered some strange, Socialist reasons, for upholding British Imperialism.

> "In this struggle between nations many Germans believed that they would be rich if they had some British Colonies. But in this vast Empire there were masses of destitute human beings—in the County of Durham, the West of Lancashire, and so on. The mere possession of Germany's Colonies would not make any real difference in their living. The German people had a poor standard of living and so Hitler said to Britain, "You are rich and we are poor, and it is not right." It was economic nonsense, but it was understandable that some of the German people should believe it."

What an argument for supporting Imperialism, Militarism, and Conscription!

LABOUR PEACE TERMS

Recently twenty Labour M.P.s issued a statement of Peace Terms to the press, on the ground that it was vital that no opportunity for negotiations should be lost. We believe that the working-class should cease hostilities and never mind stating peace terms. Peace would follow a determined attitude. It is our business to report all efforts to overcome war.

Summarised, the Labour M.P.s four foundations for peace are:—

(1) New European system, sacrificing national sovereignties for internationally guaranteed general security. All frontiers to be reviewed. Full national and economic freedom for every people.

(2) A standstill in armaments, preliminary to universal disarmament. Simultaneous discussion territorial, financial, and other questions that supply excuses for war.

(3) Economic internationalism; no national monopoly raw materials and food; free use of all the great waterways; removal all trade barriers; free access, all nations, to all major sea and airports.

(4) Self-government throughout the world. Where impossible, colonial areas to be internationalised. Democratic self-determination for India.

WAR REALISTS NOW

Lord Provost P. J. Dollan, of Glasgow, who used to be a pacifist, told a pleasant Sunday evening gathering at St. Andrew's Hall on February 18 last—why pleasant?—why he is now a realist instead, in the war against dictatorships.

> "People say this war is none of our business, and that we would be better to defend ourselves by strict adherence to what are called pacifist principles and by following a policy of non-resistance in the hope of bringing peace. I once believed in that doctrine, too. It is still my ideal. But I would be a fool if I did not recognise that absolute pacifism did not save Vienna, Prague, Cracow, Madrid, and Helsinki —and will not save Glasgow if the dictatorial powers are allowed a free run."

Dollan never explained how it is that he never thought this way until he became too old to fight. Nor did he explain why all Lord Provosts in war-time think this way!

Arthur Greenwood, writing in the Daily Express for March 8, defends Dollan, Morrison & Co. as follows:—

> "There are many among my colleagues who were conscientious objectors in the last war, but are making great contributions to victory in this war. Many of them are national figures. Probably the outstanding example is my colleague, Mr. Herbert Morrison, leader of the London County Council.
> "Are these men being inconsistent? I do not think so. There are two reasons why a man who was a conscientious objector in the last war can conscientiously be an active worker in our great struggle now.
> "Twenty-five years have gone by . . ."

There was no need for Greenwood to say more. Time explains everything.

THE LANCASHIRE CONSCIENCE TRIBUNAL

We have discussed the decisions, approach, and personnel of the following Tribunals in these columns during October and Christmas, 1939, and February and March, 1940: Bristol, Birmingham, Cardiff, London, Glasgow, Aberdeen and Lancashire, sitting at Manchester and Liverpool respectively.

Until the Tribunal decisions are collected and published in book form, comrades should preserve and consult the issues mentioned. This will enable them to follow easily the more general reporting we must follow when recording decisions given by the Tribunals mentioned.

I.—MANCHESTER.

James Pelow, Lansdowne Road, West Didsbury, Manchester, appeared before the Lancashire Tribunal, sitting at Manchester on Wednesday, February 14. Pelow contended that, though he was not yet an Irish citizen he was conscientiously unable to give any allegiance to the British Crown.

Pelow's case was stated by a personal friend, Mr. J. Norbury. The latter stated that Pelow felt it would be wrong for him to recognise the Crown which he regarded as persecuting the Irish people.

Judge Burgis: He need not recognise the Crown to serve in the Army.

Norbury: I cannot conceive how anyone could serve in the Army without recognising the Crown.

Continuing, Mr. Norbury used the phrase, "members of the tribunal, in honour to their consciences." This led to a discussion between him and the chairman:—

Judge Burgis: You need not trouble about our consciences.

Norbury: I am afraid I am greatly troubled about your consciences.

Judge Burgis: That may well be. But you are not entitled to come here and express your trouble. We regard it as a piece of impertinence, and if you use your position for that purpose we shall ask you to sit down.

Norbury: From time to time, the tribunal has asked witnesses to pass comments on the consciences of applicants.

Judge Burgis: The consciences of the tribunal are not in issue to-day. It is the conscience of the applicant that is in issue. We cannot allow you to go outside that issue.

Pelow's statement said that he was born in Dublin in 1917 and he applied for particulars of registration as a citizen of Eire in September, 1938. When the particulars came to hand, the following month he could not pay the £1 necessary for registration and he had been saving up to pay it. He felt he had a moral obligation to the country which had given him hospitality for twenty years and he was prepared to serve in a civilian capacity.

Giving the tribunal's decision, Judge Burgis said:

"The applicant has said that the only reason he cannot join the military forces of this country is that he is a citizen of Ireland. It may be that if he is a citizen of Ireland he is excused, but that is not the point which we have to deal with."

Pelow was told that no conscientious objection was established. If he applied to the Ministry of Labour, he would be given all the necessary information.

William Burley Lockwood, Hulme Hall, Manchester University, lived and worked in Germany from 1939 to 1939. He was in the Netherlands when war came, and had lived in France, Belgium, and Switzerland. He spoke of the fundamental friendship among people of all nations, and said he believed in the possibility of fraternisation among British and German troops to obtain Anglo-German unity from below if it could not be obtained from above. The continuance of the war was helping to keep Hitler in power.

Lockwood was exempted without condition. Judge Burgis said he belonged to that class of man who could see good in every country but his own.

Thomas Gwilym Davies, a teacher, Jackson Street, Gorton, Manchester, was represented by the Rev. J. E. Storey, a Clitheroe Methodist Minister. Mr. Storey was questioned by Sir Miles Mitchell about Davies' attitude to the Abyssinian invasion.

Mr. Storey: I think his attitude would be my attitude.

Judge Burgis: We don't want your attitude.

Mr. Storey: I'm trying to answer the question. If you ask questions involving all kinds of qualifications you cannot have a straight yes or no.

Registering Davies unconditionally, the Chairman said they were satisfied after hearing Mr. Storey that the applicant could not conscientiously take part in the military effort and also that he was alive to his duties as a citizen.

Frank Parker, Royal Avenue, Old Trafford, Manchester, told the tribunal that he was expecting dismissal. A young man employed by the same firm appeared before the tribunal last week, he said, and was ordered to remain in his present occupation and within three days he was dismissed. The tribunal accepted Parker's statement that he had a conscientious objection to fighting, but when he said he would not bind up his mother's wounds in an air raid for fear of helping the war they felt he was speaking not from conscience but from unreasoning prejudice. He was registered as a non-combatant.

Ronald Prior, Field Road, Rochdale, put in a statement which contained an exceptional number of Biblical quotations.

Judge Burgis: Have you heard of the story of the unjust steward?—No.

Have you heard of Lazarus and the beggar?—No.

The Chairman also mentioned Peter and the cock crowing, and Pilate, and the applicant said he had not heard of them.

The Chairman ordered the removal of Prior's name from the register of conscientious objectors without qualification. He commented on Prior's statement and attitude:

"Pilate is an unknown name to him. The elements of the Christian faith are unknown to him. It looks as if he copied out a list of texts from one of the peace papers."

On February 15 the Tribunal considered 22 cases. Its decisions were:

Unconditional Exemption	2
Conditional Exemption	7
Non-Combatant Service	7
Military Register without qualification	5

Henry Percival Clarke, Worsley Road, Swinton, is hon. secretary of the Swinton Allotments Association and has cultivated two allotments since the war. He had done a good deal for refugees. He is a Quaker.

The Chairman registered him unconditionally.

Two other Quakers were registered conditionally. Vernon Lowe, Daisy Avenue, Laysight, Manchester, was ordered to remain in his present occupation as electrical research engineer, "which is one of great national importance." He had to do spare-time civil work to be decided by himself. Roland A. Ransome, Walton Hall, Manchester University, was registered as a C.O. on condition that he obtained agricultural work by July 1, 1940.

Frank Harper Lees, Mayall Street, Waterhead, said he used to be a member of the Communist party. He joined it because he believed it stood for peace. He was expelled last year because he did not agree that we should have gone to war for the Czechs.

He explained:—

"The Communists are a somersaulting party. They change and change and change. What they say to-day they may not say to-morrow. At the beginning of the war they supported it. A week later they were against it."

Judge Burgis, announcing the decision to register Lees on condition that he remains in his present occupation, which is of great national importance, said:—

"He is not lukewarm like some we have had before us. He is a firebrand for peace. We are satisfied that he has a deep conviction. It may be an unreasoning, it may be an unreasonable conviction. But we think the conviction is there."

Allan Edwin Rodway, Heswall Avenue, Withington, Manchester, told the tribunal that both his father and mother during the last war were in prison for pacifism—his father as a conscientious objector and his mother for handing out leaflets in a military camp.

Rodway said that he was willing to do forestry work because he was satisfied that the trees he would be growing could not be used in the war, or agriculture provided he was not releasing a man to go to fight.

Rodway was registered as a conscientious objector on condition of remaining in his present occupation till required to do work in forestry.

Announcing this decision, Judge Burgis said:

"The applicant had an unfortunate bringing up and has had little opportunity at home of forming an independent judgment. He is prepared to do agricultural work, but under conditions which it is almost impossible to satisfy."

John Ernest Young, Lower Broughton Road, Manchester, was removed from the C.O. register without qualification. His statement said:—

"If I were compelled to undertake military duties I should surrender at the first opportunity—whatever the consequences."

II. Liverpool.

On Friday, December 8, at Liverpool, the Tribunal considered the case of Henry Thomas Mundy, 37 Holborn Hill, Tranmere, Birkenhead.

Mundy said he did not accept the Christian faith and he belonged to no political party. The newspapers were owned by capitalists and he could not believe the news they published.

Judge Burgis: Do you value your freedom of conscience?

Mundy: I haven't any freedom of conscience, have I?

Mundy said that his country was no better than any other country and he owed no duty to it. He owed no duty to his fellow-men, and did not think his fellow-men owed any duty to him.

The Judge: If there was an air raid, they could leave you on the roadside to bleed?—Yes, they could, though I should not expect them to.

Judge Burgis said the tribunal thought it a somewhat pathetic case. They felt much sympathy towards Mundy, who was apparently disappointed in life. He wanted to set up ideals, to get rid of the capitalist Government; but he did not know what he was going to substitute. His views on war were indefinite and nothing more than views. The tribunal could not bring themselves to believe he had any deep conviction. His name, without qualification, would be removed from the register of conscientious objectors.

Neville Hiatt Newhouse, 41 Bidston Avenue, Birkenhead, a member of the Society of Friends, a Liverpool University student, refused to call any witnesses. He was registered as an objector conditionally upon undertaking civil work under civilian control, to be specified by the Ministry of Labour.

Frank David Paterson, 45 Queen's Drive, Liverpool, is a member of Hope Street Unitarian Church. His father was a conscientious objector in the last war. His family hold pacifist principles. Paterson was registered conditionally upon his performing civil work under civilian control, the tribunal recommending forestry or agriculture.

John Henry Parry, 4 Ogden Close, Liverpool, is a Roman Catholic. His father served in the last war and was gassed and had suffered terribly ever since. He received only a small pension and Parry's mother had had to go out scrubbing ever since the last war ended. His father and mother were both in the hospital now. Parry had a younger brother and sister to support. He said :—

"I should not like to think that if I joined the Army I should cause anybody the same suffering as my father has been caused through war."

Judge Burgis—Are you frightened of seeing suffering?—I have seen it all my life.

Judge Burgis said that Parry's case was one for sympathy but he had established no conscientious objection to war. His name must be removed from the C.O. Register.

The Tribunal registered the following applicants unconditionally :—

(1) Thomas J. Martin, Inglewood, 35 Orrell Lane, Liverpool. Student for the Presbyterian Ministry.

(2) Harold E. Rawlinson, 21 Harradon Road, Aintree. Candidate for the Methodist Ministry.

(3) Thomas Martlero, 52 Haydock Street, Earlestown. Student-teacher.

(4) John Mawsdley, 9 Dragon Lane, Whiston. Window-cleaner.

(5) Richard George Milne, 35 Oxton Street, Liverpool. Local preacher on trial for the Methodist Ministry.

CONCHIE COMMENT

Since conscription was introduced into Britain in 1939, 26,681 men have registered as conscientious objectors.

The following letter was published in the Enfield Gazette Observer, for March 1, 1940 :—

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS.

Sir,—There is no justification for the abuse that is being levelled against pacifists by misguided people.

Can there be any reason to doubt the sincerity of those men of sterling character who suffered so much in the last war for the sake of the conviction that participation in war was an evil thing.

I suggest that the victimisation of Conscientious Objectors can serve no useful purpose in the cause of liberty which we all profess to have at heart.—Yours faithfully,

ALFRED P. TASSELL.

Orchard Way,
Enfield.

That is a brave letter and the Enfield Gazette is to be congratulated for publishing same.

The West London Observer has published several times recently the following advertisement :—

85 ADDISON GARDENS, W. 14.
SHEherds Bush 5402. NO CHARGE

We congratulate our West London contemporary upon its courage. During the last war it repeatedly drew attention to our court-martials and resistance and pressed for our release, although it did not approve of our ideas.

Utter incapacity to act as chairman of a tribunal was revealed by Judge Stewart at Leeds, on February 20, when he told Ernest Milton Myers that he had "expressed the views of a traitor to the country's interests."

Myers stated that he was associated closely with pacifist organisations.

Judge Stewart said :—

"You come here because you are an alleged objector to military service, and at the same time you are engaged in a series of activities all tending towards urging those who listen to you not to help the country. We hold you in complete contempt."

ABSOLUTE EXEMPTION

Although the decisions rendered by the various tribunals set up under the National Service Act for considering conscientious objectors have rendered some very unfair decisions, all of them have recognised the fact that they can grant total exemption. The behaviour of many of the chairmen and members of the tribunals has been biased. Many persons have been denied exemption who were entitled to it. It may be said that the tribunals have not deduced correct conclusions from the facts before them. At least it must be agreed that they recognised in theory that they could grant total exemption. If they have not translated the theory into practice in every instance that is most unfortunate. In this respect the tribunals of 1939-40 have differed considerably from those set up in 1916 under the Military Service Act passed during the Great War.

The governing clauses of the Military Service Act of 1916, on the subject of the conscientious objectors, read as follows :—

"Section 2, Subsection (1).—'An application may be made at any time before the appointed date to the Local Tribunal established under this Act by, or in respect of, any man for the issue to him of a certificate of exemption from the provisions of this Act :

"'(a), (b), (c) . . . . .

"'(d) on the ground of a conscientious objection to the undertaking of combatant service; and the Local Tribunal, if they consider the grounds of the application established, shall grant such a certificate.'

"Subsection (3).—'And certificate of exemption may be absolute, conditional, or temporary, as the authority by whom it was granted think best suited to the case, and also, in the case of an application on conscientious grounds, may take the form of an exemption from combatant service only, or may be conditional on the applicant being engaged in some work which in the opinion of the Tribunal dealing with the case is of national importance.'"

It is very clear from this section that the Act granted total exemption under certain circumstances. Nevertheless any number of objectors went to prison during the Great War because both Local and Appeal Tribunals decided that they had no power to grant total exemption.

Leonard Henry Caton, 45 Hadham Road, Bishop's Stortford, claimed total exemption as a conscientious objector. The local tribunal exempted him from combatant service only and the clerk to the tribunal stated that the tribunal had no power to do more than to exempt him from combatant service. The Appeal Tribunal upheld this decision on March 18, 1916.

The Wells City Tribunal took the same view in the case of T. C. Bowles, 94 Bove Town, Glastonbury. On March 24, 1916, the Appeal Tribunal, sitting at Bath, upheld the view that Mr. Bowles could not obtain absolute exemption. The Chairman of the Appeal Tribunal, Mr. Somerville, of Dinder House, Wells, used most legal language in returning this most illegal decision. He ruled that the tribunal was unable to grant anything but non-combatant service to a conscientious objector, and therefore the appeal "did not lie."

The West Sussex Appeal Tribunal, on March 21, 1916, adopted the same attitude. The West Sussex Daily News, for March 22, published the following report :—

"A Chichester furniture salesman, aged 28, appealed against the decision of the Chichester Tribunal granting him exemption from combatant service, and asked for absolute exemption on conscientious grounds. . . .

"The Chairman: . . . Have you looked at the Military Service Act, under which we all come, everybody here? . . . It empowers you to make an objection on the ground of conscience, but the objection must be to combatant service; it allows you to object to combatant service only. . . ."

The appeal was dismissed.

Ernest S. Sands claimed absolute exemption as a conscientious objector from the Wem Rural Tribunal, Wem, Salop. in March, 1916. He reported the result of his application in the following letter that was published at the time, dated March 30 of that year :—

"I have appealed to the local tribunal, who stated they were satisfied my case was genuine, but at the advice of the Clerk (who, by the way, is a solicitor), held that they could not give me absolute exemption, as the Act did not provide for absolute exemption for conscientious objectors."

Patrick Hughes, 15 Low Waters, Hamilton, was told by the local tribunal on March 20, 1916, that he had proved his case as a conscientious objector. The tribunal granted him non-combatant service regretfully as they held they could not grant total exemption. The Glasgow Appeal Tribunal on May 22 dismissed his case and held that it was outside the power of the tribunal to grant total exemption. Hughes asked for the right to appeal to the Central Tribunal and was refused.

In the case of Arthur Bruce Gravely, the Wellinborough Local Tribunal on June 27, 1916, declared that his conscientious objection was genuine but insisted that he could not give him anything better than non-combatant service on conscientious grounds.

At least we have not witnessed flagrant violation of the principle of the Act by the tribunals of to-day. The gain is very small and the progress of recognition of the right of conscience very small. The difference registers some small protest.

Turned away from his home by his parents because of his attitude to military service, William Robert Garrad, aged 21, a Blackburn artist, told his story in private to the Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal, at Preston on February 20, 1940.

The hearing of his case opened in public.

Garrad said that, being almost penniless, he went to his parents' home with his wife, hoping that they could stay there. Because of his conscientious objection they were not allowed to do so.

Then he was offered a job on A.R.P. apparatus, but could not accept it.

At this stage the chairman, Judge E. C. Burgis, decided to take the remainder of the hearing in private.

Later, announcing that Garrad would be retained on the register unconditionally, he said that for the sake of his opinions the man had forfeited his parents' goodwill and the family home was no longer open to him.

WEST LONDON NOTES.

N.C.L. Comrades in West London are requested to communicate with me at 85 Addison Gardens, W.14 (Shepherds Bush 5402). The efforts which are being made to organise N.C.L. activities in West London are progressing but slowly. Comrades can help by getting in touch and reporting on activities in their own districts.

Comrades needing advice should also get in touch with me, as above. They can be put in touch with their nearest advisory bureau or, where possible, given direct information.

Recent discussions have shown that there is considerable confusion of thought on the question of the difference between the N.C.L. and pacifist organisations. Every individual member of the N.C.L. in West London have stated that they feel that there is a duplication of activity. Groups who wish to clear up their doubts in this respect should invite an N.C.L. speaker to visit them and state the position.

At a recent local debate between a representative of the Federal Union and a C.O. veteran of the last war, the former fared badly. The admission that the "Union ideas had been received well by everybody except pacifist and anti-war bodies seems to place the matter in its proper perspective. Nor did the suggestion that the Union might house both "Socialist" and Capitalist states give any more justification for pursuing the idea. A dangerous "red herring."

* * *

A member of the National Council for Civil Liberties in a recent indictment of the E.P.A. pointed out that under it the Government had almost dictatorial powers other than the power to impose industrial conscription. What he did not point out was that his case was not only an indictment of the Government but of the whole so-called "Democratic" Parliamentary machine. As for the question of industrial conscription the E.P.A. may not cover it; but if drafting workers from their own trades into others, producing war materials, is not industrial conscription, then what is it?

PRISON: WHAT IT MEANS AND REQUIRES

The keeper reported the matter to the warden. Dowd was brought to his office and accused of play-acting. Dowd gave no heed to the accusation. He replied coldly, formally: "I wish to submit a long list of complaints, with my recommendations."

The warden again accused Dowd of pulling a game on him. Dowd ignored his comments and stared vacantly out of the window for a while. He turned round and swept into a tirade of nonsense. The warden hesitated. "Take him back to his cell," he ordered. "I'll have the doctor look him over—and God help him if he's faking this."

Next morning Dowd was examined by the prison physician, who applied the ordinary simple tests. The doctor grinned, told him he was faking, and suggested that, for his own safety, he should quit pretending. Dowd stuck to his gabble and vacant stare and was slammed back into his cell. He knew that severity unto torture was the only method prison employed to determine whether a convict was sick or acting. In the past, pretenders actually had gone mad in attempting to withstand the tortures denied by prison disiplinarians. Dowd resolved to endure what all others had found unendurable. He entered upon a terrible contest with the authorities of Joliet.

The first punishment ordered by the warden was to have the prisoner's wrists clamped into the "bull-rings"—manacles with teeth on the inside to tear the flesh—and so suspend him from the cell-door, until consciousness left him. Under this punishment, Tom Dowd never winced nor gave way. When he regained his senses, he babbled more mad and impossible instructions and demands.

The warden was amazed, worried, and ashamed. He ordered a further medical examination. The doctor examined carefully and reported that Dowd was sane. The warden recovered from his shame and turned brute again—authority challenged and outraged by defeat. Poor Tom Dowd was strung up to his cell-door once more. The heavy lash was laid on his bare back till the blood ran, and his mind was darkened. He never whimpered nor begged for mercy. Outside, on the streets of Christian and democratic America, they were selling newspapers, advertising the Churches, and parading religious notices.

Dowd's fortitude infuriated the warden and his gang of prison officials. Guards took Dowd down from the cell door and cast his poor, bleeding, unconscious body into a dungeon, where he remained, until the black fog cleared from his tortured brain. At once, he played the lunatic again. The warden summoned him to cease his pretending, confess, and go back to routine work. His reply is to be found in the prison reports on his case. Crippled with pain and physical exhaustion, Dowd instantly answered, with a florid gesture: "Get busy, yourself, warden—you're a lazy dog, you are. My shoes need shining. Shine them, since you've nothing else to do around here."

The warden spluttered with wrath. Dowd straightaway had to suffer an application of the paddle. This cruel instrument of late nineteenth-early-century democratic torture of the English-speaking races, was a flat piece of thin wood, soaked in boiling water to make it flexible. The Joliet paddle contained auger holes and raised blisters at every blow. While being smacked upon the quivering flesh of the prisoner, it was dipped repeatedly in a boiling fluid or hot sand, to add to its punishing power. Dowd bore this terrible infliction without a murmur. The doctor, standing by, felt the victim's pulse, and announced that another blow would be fatal.

Dowd was removed to the prison hospital to recover. He continued his ravings. He was re-examined and declared sane once more. He was ordered to resume work and told the warden to do some work himself. He was punished with more cell-hangings and dungeons. He refused to work and used vile insults to the warden and prison officers, and babbled ridiculous orders, considering his circumstances. Finally, he was strapped into a tub and given the water-cure.

In medieval days, the water-cure was known as "the question." The victim almost suffocates in the torrent poured upon him. It had been used repeatedly in Joliet before Dowd became an inmate. In every instance, the convict had quailed and confessed. Dowd stood it till he passed out. The prison doctor could not hide his anxiety. He intervened to stop the punishment—and doubted his own conclusions. He became sceptically nervous of his own qualifications. The warden also doubted. He asked the doctor for a consultation. Dowd's endurance had virtually convinced him of Dowd's madness. He recoiled from further disiplinary tests. The man within was at war with warden assumed by appointment from without. It was his duty to be severe to make sure that fellows were not faking. If the administrative powers were weak in punishing, half the condemned men would turn the prison into a sanitorium.

The doctor told the warden that Dowd was sane, unless he was suffering from some new dementia as then unknown to science. But he could not understand Dowd standing up to such punishment. He half thought he must be suffering from a new kind of mental breakdown. But he could not certify him insane.

The warden protested that the doctor's report meant that he must keep on hammering at Dowd. The doctor replied that it was impossible for Dowd to stand further hammering. The conversation was noted officially and the warden decided to settle the matter finally.

A few days after Dowd had withstood so bravely the water-cure, the warden appeared before Dowd's celi with a red-hot poker in his hand. Dowd raved at him in his now masterly demented style.

"Still lugs, Tommy!" replied the warden. "Then say, here's a fine sword for you."

He poked the fiery iron between the bars. Dowd saw the trap instantly, and never flinched. He was to be put now to the ordeal by fire.

"What a fool you are, warden, to give away things," he answered. He leapt forward, and seized the searing iron firmly in both hands. He yelled with pain, but made it appear like fury. He clung to the poker and jerked at it with all his might, as the foul incense of scorching human flesh rose in the cell and drifted through the corridors of Jolet. The warden was sick. He dropped the poker and lurched back in horror. Dowd the indomitable had won again.

As the warden dropped the poker, Dowd collapsed, flung the hot iron from him, and tumbled into an unconscious heap on the floor of his narrow pen. He was carried to the hospital, his poor burned hands wraped in soppings of oil and lime-water, his mutterings stilled with an opiate. Here he remained for weeks, nursed and fed, because he could not lift a spoon to his lips.

The warden had made his supreme test and was moved at last by pity and remorse. The doctor urged gentler methods but declared that he could not truthfully declare that Dowd was insane. He remained convinced of Dowd's complete sanity.

At last Dowd's hands healed and he was sent back to his old cell. There he lay while the baffled warden pondered their unequal duel. Dowd determined on the warden's capitulation. He scraped together a mass of filth and sat in his cell, eating it. The warden went to see for himself and spied quietly from a point where Dowd could not see him. He waited for no doctor's report but ordered Dowd to the lunatics' ward. The official report stated: "Dowd laughed all night." He celebrated, with an assumption of quaint, demented, mannerisms, victory.

On the second night, Dowd did not laugh. He stirred as soon as he could, recovered his file, pried open the loose-grating, and let himself down to the top of a shed, using a rope he had made of his sheets. Despite his crippled hands, he gained the wall, dropped lightly to the ground, and escaped from Joliet and the State of Illinois. He was pursued the next day in vain. The warden said to the press: "Well, Dowd's gone! By jove, he earned it."

Dowd remained at liberty for three years. He lived by crime, because he had no other way of living. The United States of America, the capitalist system of society, did not know how to turn to usefulness and honesty Dowd's splendid qualities of courage, patience, and loyalty. At last a "fence," "tipped off" the authorities. Detectives arrested him at Farnington, Virginia. He was senatenced to serve twelve years' imprisonment at Richmond, Virginia. The authorities received a report from Joliet of his mad-stratagem, and the warden warned him not to repeat the trick. Dowd raised his two hands, palms out, and revealed their permanent condition. The warden flinched and noted the conversation:

"Never again, eh, Dowd, he said.

"Not a chance, warden I've put it over once. That tore up my ticket!"

Thirty days later, Dowd was free once more. He made his second great break for liberty, remarkable for smoothness, applied intelligence, and celerity.

After he had been in the Virginia prison a few days, Dowd discovered that it lacked a "recheck" or counting system. The men were marched in from the workshops at dusk, and counted as they left the dining-room. If there were no absentees, the "all-right bell" was sounded, the pickets came down from the walls, lowered their ladders, and went home. The prison was left in charge of the night watch. The inmates were locked-up for the night without anyone taking the trouble to count them again. Dowd realised that this was his opportunity to escape.

For a fortnight he studied carefully the method of conducting the count-up. There were 904 men in the dining-room, 12 in the hospital, 3 in dungeons. The deputy-warden made his calculations in the hall in the dining-room. He totalled it to 919 and found that this agreed with the official roster. Then he gave his signal to sound the bell. Dowd knew that he dared not attempt an escape from the hospital. His Joliet reputation made this impossible. And the hospital was guarded closely. The dungeons were not. He decided that through the dungeons was the road to liberty.

Somehow Dowd contrived to learn all about the dungeons and ot inspect them, under guise of cleaning work. He found that they were dark, damp cubby-holes, situate in the oldest part of the prison. Convicts committed to them for breaking prison regulations were shut up in the dungeons at night and lashed the next morning, when the other prisoners went about their usual work. Dowd examined the cells. He mastered their padlocks and entire structure. He also discovered that the dungeon-prisoners were never checked at night. If a prisoner was consigned to a punishment cell, and then managed to escape from the cell just after feeding-time, he would not be missed till the following day. So reasoned Dowd. It was necessary for him to model a key for the padlock. He was allowed some chewing gum one day by a friendly warder. With this he made an impression of the keyhole whilst working, and furtively modelled a key from the handle of an aluminium pot. He "borrowed" his tools from the machine shop. Finally, Dowd faced the problem of how to get through the solid oak planking inside the punishment cells that had been erected to prevent the prisoner from getting at the lock. He stole and secreted in a punishment cell a hammer, chisel, and a pair of claw pincers—the one punishment cell unoccupied that morning. At the meal hour he broke a rule, abused the deputy-warden, and was consigned to the punishment cell. Late at night, in the detached part of the prison, he worked without attracting attention. He loosened the nails, and had the plank ready for removal. He hid the evidences of his work and took, without flinching, the corporal punishment next morning. He was released from the punishment cells and had to wait for a day when there was no one in the dungeon cells to betray him.

A certain Monday came and nobody was suffering in solitary Dowd waited till late in the day, and then abused a keeper. Dowd seemed to be in a rage and jostled the keeper. He was marched away to solitary and stepped naturally into his well-prepared cell. The door was slammed upon him. No time was wasted in examining the cell. The guards were too indignant at the man who had jostled a keeper. Dowd ignored their taunts as they left him and waited.

At 5 p.m., a keeper brought him a cup of water and two slices of bread. He waited a few minutes; made sure the dungeons were deserted; then set to work. He removed the prepared planks and opened the padlock with his hidden, improvised key. He put the board back in its place, drove in the nails to hold it, and locked the dungeon door as he passed out on his way to freedom. The guards were congregated in the dining-hall and the deputy-warden was ready to take down the count on his blackboard. Dowd darted into the corridor and moved noiselessly towards the door that led into the prison yard. He skulked in the shadows of the kitchens, heard the good-night bell sound loudly, saw the sentries come down from the prison walls, and terminate their duties. Night descended and at last Dowd cut across the prison yard, gropingly found one of the ladders, raised it, reached the top of wall, lay flat, and let go, dropping silently to freedom! For a second time he escaped from prison without aid or influence.

Dowd remained free several years. Then came the day in 1911 when he was recognised in Sanford by a peputy-sheriff, who had been a keeper at Richmond. The deputy reached for his gun. So did Thomas Dowd. Dowd aimed low, not to kill. The sheriff aimed high and hit Dowd in the shoulder. Dowd ran. The sheriff shouted for help and a local policeman confronted Dowd. Both fired, Dowd still aiming not to kill. The officer's third shot struck Dowd in the head and killed him instantly. So ended this strange career of lone adventuring, a wasted lifetime of obvious courage, loyalty, and talent.

As we have said, we tell this story to conscientious objectors, not to commend burglary or robbery, but to commend courage and fearlessness: to bid them stand up to jail and suffering bravely and not to weaken unduly at the thought of prison persecution. Dowd had no ideals that sustain men and none recognised him as having ideals. He was a social outcast. He was honoured by none. Yet he was, in himself, a man: a brave and worthy man. His courage in life, and under persecution, now that he is dead, should inspire those who claim to be moved by ideals, to live bravely and endure well for the triumph of those ideals. Their conscience should give them a backing poor, brave, outcast, lawless, useless Dowd never had. And they have friends also, where he was nigh friendless.

[This essay commenced in February issue. Part I dealt with genius in prison. Part II (now concluded) tells the story of an American rotter, Thomas Dowd.]

"ESSAYS IN REVOLT"

Under this caption, the Glasgow Evening Times, in its "City and Clyde" column, for Tuesday, January 23, last, noticed "Letters to Editor." The critic said:—

> "According to Mr. Guy Aldred's thoughts on the subject, the title 'Letters to the Editor' should be 'Essays in Revolt.' Mr. Aldred is certainly well acquaint with this outlet for opinion, having written numerous letters to various editors in the course of his very active career. He has kept most of his 'essays in revolt' and is now issuing a representative collection, written during the past 35 years, in pamphlet form. . . These letters on subjects of varying interest, many of which appeared in 'The Evening Times,' are outstanding for their frankness, and at the same time give a picture of the author's stormy life."

The reviewer cites the passage from the foreword, in which the respected value of the "letter to the editor" and the pamphlet are discussed, and considers this description interesting. He makes the following extract from my covering letter, when sending the pamphlet out for review:—

> "For many years I have championed Glasgow as a centre of thought as opposed to London. I have made Glasgow my pulpit and from it I have addressed the world and am still doing so."

The same journal, in its issue for Monday, February 19, noticed the pamphlet on John MacLean, as follows:—

> "I wish no harm to any human being, but I, as one man, am going to exercise my freedom of speech. That remark was made by John Maclean, famous West of Scotland revolutionary Socialist, in his speech from the dock in 1918 before he was found guilty of sedition. The historic speech lasted 75 minutes, and it is reprinted at the conclusion of a record of the agitator's life which Guy A. Aldred has republished.
> "The stormy career of the former Glasgow teacher, who was 'Daddy Maclean' to the children of Kinning Park School, is told in forceful language in the pamphlet, which has as its introduction the previous review and tribute paid by Mr. James Maxton, M.P. Mr. Aldred describes Maclean as 'a brave and tireless fighter, uncorrupted by hopes of reward, loved, and hated too, because he served the outraged and the oppressed.'"

Labour's Northern Voice, the Manchester organ of the Independent Socialist Party, in its issue for March, 1940, reviews Letters to the Editor and Socialism and The Pope. Our Socialist contemporary says:—

> "Guy Aldred edits and owns a monthly journal, 'The Word,' devoted to anti-militarism and the cause of the conscientious objector. He is reprinting his essays as 'The Word' Library, and the two under review are Nos. 1 and 4 of the series. The first consists of 30 years' correspondence on many subjects, free speech, secularism, anti-militarism. Aldred is a vigorous and lucid controversialist, who has always spoken his mind and often paid the penalty for so doing. 'Letters to the Editor' get right at the point. Whether you agree with the writer or not, you will admire his keen defence of freedom and democracy. No. 4 is a dissection of and reply to the Encylical 'Quadragemiso Anno' of Pope Pius XI. Aldred claims: 'It is a definite challenge to Socialism in every shape and form. . . .' 'The Pope has made the acceptance of wage-slavery a question of faith and morals.'"

The most strange notice of all appeared in The Vanguard, Glasgow, for March 2. This journal is the organ of the Scottish Protestant League, and is edited by Alexander Ratcliffe. The review describes Socialism and The Pope in the following terms:—

> "An interesting brochure of some 70 pp. dealing with the Papal Encyclical 'Rerum Novarum' (The Workers' Charter) and generally reviewing the Papal attitude towards Socialism. Much of what is mentioned in that regard already has appeared in the columns of this journal, but the brochure contains much other helpful and interesting information. Of course, we do not agree with all the sentiments expressed in Socialism and The Pope. We entirely disagree with the manner in which the author seeks to confuse Religion with True Christianity and spurious Protestantism with genuine Protestantism. Mr. Aldred is generous in his attack on Protestants, as such, but he makes no attack on Roman Catholics. This is significant. On page 12 Protestants are accused that they 'pose, doze and pray on Sunday,' whilst they 'pose, prose and prey (italics his) from Monday till the following Sunday.' We are not denying the allegation, for with many Protestants Mr. Aldred's charge is very true. But why pick out the Protestants? Do not Rome's priests prey upon Roman Catholics from Sunday to Saturday inclusive, every day and every week? The striking feature of

THE ALIEN TRIBUNALS

By LEONARD READ.

The tribunals for aliens have been sitting for several months, patiently investigating the sympathies and records of "enemy aliens." This is a painful word to many of them—the first- and hardest-hit victims of the "enemy's" repression; moreover, they feel a kinship, albeit the negative kinship of a common hostility, with this country. Most of them have been granted either complete or partial liberty of movement, some it has been considered wiser to intern. One may commend generally the care and impartiality that has been shown. Nevertheless some hasty and unwise decisions have been give, resulting in undeserved molestation and stigmatisation.

The primary purpose of the investigations being to winnow into a safe place the traitorous alien masquerading as a refugee; only such evidence as proves their malicious intent should condemn them; and conversely all evidence of a detestation of Nazi-ism, or even a passive neutrality, should count favourably for the genuine refugee. This is not always so.

A German whom I have known for two years has been interned. For over six years he had been at liberty in England, quietly working at his trade and by study increasing his knowledge of politics and Hitlerism. He had had to leave Germany hurriedly by a subterfuge a few months after Hitler arrived, and since has never written to his family nor made his presence known to the German Government, for fear of reprisals. From his record it is clear that he has no shred of reason to favour Nazi-ism; to which his Social-Democratic views are and always have been so diametrically opposed that one is at a sad loss to guess why he was imprisoned and set among Nazis captured and guarded by the War Office. This was in the teeth of a bunch of impressive testimonials from a wide variety of acquaintances.

An Austrian nurse employed in this (Colchester) district, who had fled because of her Christian Pacifist principles (poison to Hitler) was ordered to be interned by the same tribunal. Again one could not discover any sign of hypocrisy in her antipathy to Nazi-ism; all the evidence pointed to an absolute incompatibility between her faith and that of Greater Germany. Why was she not allowed to continue her work? Reports have been published of an eminent German lyrist, a fugitive from Berlin via Vienna and Czechoslovakia since 1933, and an exemplary guest in England, who has been interned. The language difficulty further hampered his examination.

It is true that none of these three was a Jew, but the fury of Nazi repression does not strike the Jews alone. Hence it should not be suspicious that Gentiles seek asylum among us. All were poor persons of humble origin, but since when has poverty become a stigma or suspicion? How does the claim of our "not being at war with the German people" square with these and similar happenings?

The tribunals are conducted in camera and without a jury. These circumstances must be called in question, when such mishappenings occur. Because they are infrequent, protest must be lodged against such aberrations, with the intent to rectify them.

> our modern social reformers is that, whilst they use their pen much in the joy of attacking Protestantism and Protestants, they are mostly very careful not to say too much to disturb the priests and people of the Church of Rome."

We confess that we are unable to follow this notice. From the very title of the pamphlet it must be obvious that we have no intention of compromising with Rome. We will uphold equal secular and social rights for Catholics, with Protestants and Atheists. Just that. No more. No less. But we have no intention, personally, of compromising with priestcraft in any shape or form.

Mr. Ratcliffe is to be congratulated on the anti-militarist tone of his journal. But he should approach criticism with less sectarian bias. Sectarianism is not good Protestantism.

OUR LETTER-BOX

My Dear Aldred,—It gave me great joy to receive THE WORD, and the two pamphlets. I am glad to learn that you are on the side of the angels against this devilish, senseless war. You and I, in our debates, were at cross purposes about words, but fundamentally we are Rationalists and Humanists, except that I believe in some ethical purpose behind the Universe, which is God. You do likewise.

I am Chairman of Coventry Education Committee, which means a good deal of work.

Yours fraternally,
RICHARD LEE.

Coventry, 23.2.40.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—"John MacLean" is magnificent. Also "Socialism and The Pope." With best wishes.

Yours fraternally,
H. W. HENDERSON.

Glasgow, S.1., 24.2.40.

Dear Guy,—It is with pleasure that I write to express my admiration for the February issue of THE WORD. The title of the paper defines the challenge to capitalism, war and the pretence of religion. In the midst of war propaganda, it brings to all who wish to read, the message of Socialism and human dignity.

The short essay on Walter Strickland will give to many the understanding of his broad humanity and passion for freedom. One can only note his last message, wherein he warns the world that the lights of liberty are being extinguished slowly. His last message, at the age of 86, was one that we must heed. It should inspire us to fight for a world that will end forever the sermons of war, poverty, and social conflict.

It was interesting to see a reprint of the anti-war meetings of 1916, on Glasgow Green; and to observe how history is repeating itself.

I must pay tribute to your essay on "Prison—What It Means." It shows that prison does not spell the end of thought. When our conscience is challenged, and prison is our lot, encouraged by your study, we can make it the citadel of our mind and beginning of our future greater struggle. As Thoreau once averred, in a slave state, a man can abide with honour only in a prison.

I hope Glasgow comrades of the N.C.L. and the U.S.M. are struggling ahead in Glasgow. Wishing every success to THE WORD and all comrades in our great and growing movement. Yours for Socialism Against War and Conscription.

ALEC KAYE.

Mile End, London, E.1., 21.2.40.

Dear Sir,—May I thank you for the issue of THE WORD, in which you mentioned my case? I have visited the Appellate Tribunal and can look again at the last sentence you wrote in commenting on my case. I think your remark was a little hasty, for I believe in faith. I told the Glasgow Tribunal that the State thought me too young to think and to vote—I am 20—but not too young to kill or to be killed. My sympathy is with the Socialist movement. After this war, the people might believe what you say and turn to Socialism.

All good wishes,
JAMES McLAREN.

Glasgow, S.W.1., 24.1.40.

Dear Guy Aldred,—Your WORD—for which many thanks—seems to me to be the best guide for C.O.s I wish this awful business would stop. Yet I feel that only intensive education from six upwards will ever make the workers of the world fool-proof. They fall headlong into every bloody trap.

Look at them now! droves and droves of sheep—German, French, Russian and British sheep—all going to the slaughter, and scarcely a bleat! They'll bleat, poor devils, after a few Passendales and Verduns. One simply must stand outside the whole thing. I hope I have the courage of my bitter convictions. Thank you again.

Yours ever,
W. A. RATHKEY.

London, N.W.6., 19.2.40.

Dear Friend Aldred,—Thank you for THE WORD and "Letters to the Editor." I was specially interested in the "Letters." Also, I am drawing people's attention to THE WORD. I sent the February issue to the P.P.U. and asked the Secretary to enquire into the conduct of Bailie Jones, Aberdeen Unitarian Minister, member of the Labour Party and P.P.U., who uses the Bench for war recruiting. I have asked for your facts to be admitted or denied. All the best.

Yours sincerely,
J. W. POYNTER.

London, N.5., 24.2.40.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—It was kind of you to send me the pamphlet on John MacLean. I am glad you are keeping the memory green of the men who have helped to build up our movement. It often seems to me to be one of the tragedies of Labour: we forget so soon and the younger generation never hear of the sacrifice and devotion that makes more tolerable the common life to-day. Your contribution in spreading knowledge about our pioneers is a service of importance. With good wishes.

Yours fraternally,
A. CREECH JONES.

House of Commons, S.W.1., 21.2.40.

Dear Sir,—I wish to thank you for sending THE WORD. I have appreciated it greatly. I will pass it on to friends with hope at least. In any case, I wish more power to your elbow.

Seeing you are applying for funds to clear your indebtedness, I take this opportunity of sending 10/- towards it. I sincerely wish it were more, for your straightforwardness stands out to-day to those that have eyes to see. As you know probably only too well "the People," of whom I am a unit, are either too poor, or too apathetic to their own interests and causes, to help much.

Since I am liable to arrest and what follows for disobeying medical call-up, the likelihood of my being able to read as I choose in the near future diminishes day by day. I rather suspect, therefore, that for you to send the paper to this address (lodging; having to leave my parents for my opinions) for the following twelve months would be a bad investment for spreading the truth in the world.

If not materially or monetarily, at least mentally, I am with you in your efforts "To Rouse the People, To Combat War, and To Speed Commonweal."

Yours sincerely,
ERNEST LANCASTER.

London, E.2., 5.3.40.

Dear Friend,—Reading in a letter: "I am much attracted to Anarchism as this seems to be the only consistent doctrine of real freedom," I am puzzled. How could things be carried on either nationally or internationally without a Government? It almost seems impossible.

I notice reports of the conduct of various Tribunals and I should just like to pay a tribute to the conscientious, fair, and sympathetic manner in which, in my opinion, Judge Longson conducted the cases at the Nottingham Tribunal last Wednesday. Also, genuine international Socialist convictions (Brotherhood of Man) are accepted as conscientious objections.

I was very impressed with your essay "The Word to the World"—splendid.

Best wishes, Yours sincerely,

Boston, Lincs., March 14. FLORA COLLAR.

as I will, particularly as the State has had no part in my introduction to this portion of the earth, nor has it assumed any responsibility for my life in the past.

"So strongly do I hold to my conscientious belief against partaking in the war, that though I might have appealed on other grounds I have abstained from doing so.

"I have held my conscientious objections to war over 14 years, and if you so desire I am prepared to have this corroborated to-night by a witness.

"I submit to you that it is the leprosy of militarism that is to-day rapidly turning Europe into one vast graveyard of the peoples.

"I have enjoyed for many years liberty of conscience, won by the sacrifice of those who in the past have given all for conscience sake.

"I should be one of the most despicable of men if I were not prepared to suffer in defence of those liberties of conscience of which the people in the past have been so justly proud.

"I am prepared to follow in the footsteps of those early Christians who appeared before the Pagan Tribunals of Rome in a similar cause."

In due course, Turner's appeal was rejected by the Tribunals and he was arrested as an absentee under the Military Service Act. He was brought before Mr. Hay Halkett, the famous Metropolitan Police Magistrate, who sat at the Greenwich Police Court. Halkett objected to the Act and to his task and said so definitely from the bench. His remarks are reported in the Kentish Mercury, for July 21, 1916, and go to the root of the matter. Giving his decision, the only one he could give under the Act, Halkett said:—

"It has been held—it is an extraordinary travesty of the English language—that a man who has received notice to do what he has not chosen to do is supposed to have done it: that a man who has not joined the colours is deemed to have done so.'

Turning to the prisoner, Halkett explained:—

"It seems to me that you are as much the victim of the mistakes of the Appeals Tribunal with regard to procedure as you would have been if they had made mistakes on the facts."

"CONSCIENCE & LAW"

FAMOUS MAGISTRATE'S VIEW.

Hay Halkett, the Metropolitan Police Magistrate, who sat at the Greenwich Police Court for many years, was one of the most famous of London magistrates. He never had the courage to act boldly on his view but he protested vigorously every time a C.O. was brought before him for the purpose of being handed over.

Early in May, 1916, K. C. Otley was handed over to the Army by Hay Halkett. In making the necessary order, Halkett protested against the Military Service Act, and stated that he had no doubt that Otley was moved by a genuine conscientious objection to war. This admission was so much but it did not save Otley from subsequent persecution. The consequences of the Tribunal refusing to carry out the Act, and to grant Otley exemption, and of Hay Halkett refusing to take the stand in the matter his clear intelligence directed, are seen in the subsequent treatment of Otley.

On May 2, 1916, Otley was brought before the District Court-Martial sitting in the Institute of the 10th Royal Sussex Regiment, to which Otley was attached. The charge was that Otley "was ordered to join a squad on parade ground on 14th April, 1916. He refused, stating he could not obey any order of the military as it was against his principles."

President: Did he say military or army order?

Capt. Nugent: I could not say.

Otley: Did my answer come as a surprise?

Capt. Nugent: No.

Otley: Did I not refuse because it was against my principles to obey army orders? You know I did not disobey just because I wished to disobey. Did I not disobey because my conscience was involved?

Capt. Nugent: Yes, of course, I knew it was against his principles. You did not disobey out of disrespect to me, but on account of those principles you hold.

Prosecutor: Accused has made much of the point of principle but the Army Act states that religious scruples were no excuse for disobeying orders.

President: Your point is that if religious scruples are not recognised, then there are no higher scruples that can be?

Otley: Of course, I know that religious scruples are not recognised in the army; that is one of the reasons why I refuse to join the army. I have been forced into it against my will.

Otley then spoke at some length and concluded:—

"In my view, if I am sentenced to punishment by this Court, it will not be because I have disobeyed a command, as stated on the charge-sheet, but simply because I am carrying out my intention of remaining true to my honest and sincere convictions."

On May 4, 1916, Otley was sentenced to two years' military detention. The Commanding officer made a most improper speech in which he stated that they "might have to shoot people in England if many more took up that position." In a letter, however, he stated: "Otley's motives are genuine."

Hay Halkett spoke more definitely even in the case of Sydney R. Turner, formerly a member of the Deptford Liberal Association and Strand Liberal Club.

Turner, a member of the No-Conscription Fellowship, appeared before the Deptford Tribunal on May, 25, 1916. He read a statement of his case:—

"I am appearing before you this evening for absolute exemption from the Military Service Act No. 2.

"I believe all men are brothers, and I refuse absolutely to take part in the murder of my fellowmen.

"I deny the right of the State to compel me to undertake any service to which I have a conscientious objection.

"My life is my own and I claim to dispose of it

WHEN THE C.O. REACHES WORMWOOD SCRUBBS

Hints for Prospective Guests

By Lord Provost P. J. DOLLAN

[*In recent issues we have described P. J. Dollan's appearance in the Central Police Court, Glasgow, under the Military Service Act, 1916, and his appeal to the High Court of Justiciary, Edinburgh. In addition to these full reports, we reproduced the questions and answers recorded in Hansard concerning his 1917 status as a C.O. Now we reproduce his account of the C.O.'s lot in prison. This article by Dollan was published above his initials, P.J.D., in the Forward, for Saturday, November 3, 1917. It is dull and unoriginal and worthy of a man who could not stay the distance.—Ed.]

On arrival at Wormwood Scrubbs prison, which, for Scotsmen, is usually about the breakfast hour, the prisoner is "handed over" to the care of the prison authorities, who give the military escort a receipt for the safe custody of the Objector's body. The interned man is then hurried to the reception room, where he is searched, stripped, bathed, and attired in prison garb. All his personal goods and money are taken from him and parcelled against the day of his liberation, and he signs for them before they are packed away. Afterwards the details of his family life and personal beliefs are entered in the prison register, while the librarian presents him, even though he be Atheist or Agnostic, with a Bible and a Church of England prayer book! Then there is the ordeal of medical examination to be gone through, and the "reception" is over.

The reception hospitalities are generally concluded towards evening, at which time all the latest arrivals are marched off to one or other of the four prison halls—each accommodating about 320 prisoners—and then lodged in cells which have been allocated for their convenience. During the first night in a cell you sleep on hard boards. A mattress is only allowed on the fifteenth day. Next morning all the newcomers are taken before the Deputy-Governor, who reads out their names, the totals of their moneys, the religious sect to which they belong, and asks him to confirm his statements. On receiving confirmation, he informs them they can have toothbrushes on demand, and the interview is over.

. . . . . .

The first 28 days following the date of court-martial—all military sentences start from the day of court-martial—are spent in solitary confinement, the only exercise allowed during that time being an hour's walk "in the ring" with other prisoners each morning. The period of solitary confinement may be lengthened beyond 28 days for misconduct, which may consist of untidiness, idleness, talking, or other offence against the numerous regulations. During this period the work usually consists of sewing mail-bags for ten hours a day, and the only literature supplied, apart from the Bible and prayer book, is an elementary book on arithmetic or language.

At the end of 28 days, and provided the prisoner has earned all his good conduct marks—224 (56 for each week)—he is allowed to go on "associated labour." This means that he may work along with other prisoners in "the shed," making mail-bags or ships' fenders, or he may be occupied as a gardener, a labourer, a carpenter, a laundryman, or anything else to which he is appointed. "Associated labour" is much more enjoyable than "solitary confinement," but is always performed under strict supervision, and may be forfeited for "misconduct," which latter, when proved, means at least a return to solitary confinement for three days, with bread and water for diet.

"Associated labour" continues to the end of the prisoner's sentence, unless he breaks the rules, when he loses the privilege for the period of his punishment. The work is not laborious, as it is uneconomical, and there are no set tasks. Each prisoner does what he can as efficiently as possible, and does more than he gets paid for. Sunday is observed as a day of rest, and only duties in connection with the preparation of meals are officially performed on that day. The working day begins at 5.30 a.m.; bedtime is at 8 p.m.; and after that hour lights are put out until next morning. Prisoners do nearly all the work in connection with the prison.

Prisoners may at any time receive and answer business letters at the discretion of the Governor. The latter can be seen daily on request by those who desire privileges, or who have complaints to make. Those who have religious beliefs are allowed to attend Church of England services twice on Sundays, and once on Wednesdays and Saturdays. In addition, they attend the special service of their own sect once a fortnight. During these services the "no chapel" men are shut up in their cells, so that chapel-going, which is optional, has its advantages. Those who want to go to chapel must make this clear when they are questioned in the reception room.

After the first month, each good-conduct prisoner is given a book per week; after two months, two books per week. Also an educational book is allowed every two weeks; and religious literature and a sixpenny dictionary may be had in addition, if the chaplain approves. The library is comprehensive, and there is a catalogue from which prisoners may make a choice of six books, and use the librarian to procure them as they are available, at the rate of one weekly. Each prisoner is allowed a slate and pencil for writing. After two months a prisoner may write and receive a letter, which privilege may be repeated every subsequent month during sentence; also he may receive a visitor each month, and failing a visitor may have instead the privilege of writing and receiving a letter.

In the seventh or eighth week each prisoner gets an opportunity of appearing before the Central Tribunal, which visits the prison periodically, to have his conscience tested. If found genuine, he will be offered the Home Office Scheme in a few days, and, if he accepts the offer, he will be released shortly afterwards, and sent to a work centre to toil as a labour conscript for 8d. a day plus food and lodging. If he refuses the scheme, or is classed as "ungenuine," he will complete his sentence, minus a remission of one-sixth for good conduct, and will be "released" to begin his dolorous journey anew. Scottish prisoners generally serve their second and subsequent sentences in the prison nearest the military depot of the regiment to which they are attached.

LABOUR, TITLES, AND THE LORD PROVOSTSHIP

The following is culled from Forward, Saturday, November 24, 1917:—

"Councillor P. J. Dollan writes criticising the Glasgow Town Council Labour Party for not nominating one of their own members for the Provostship, as they did three years ago, when they nominated P. G. Stewart. He is strongly opposed to the policy of voting for Capitalist nominees to whom the post is but a stepping-stone to a title, and the canvassing, intrigue, and chicanery that goes on to secure votes is disgusting. The election should not be by secret ballot, but should be by open roll-call vote in the Council or more preferably by direct vote of the people."

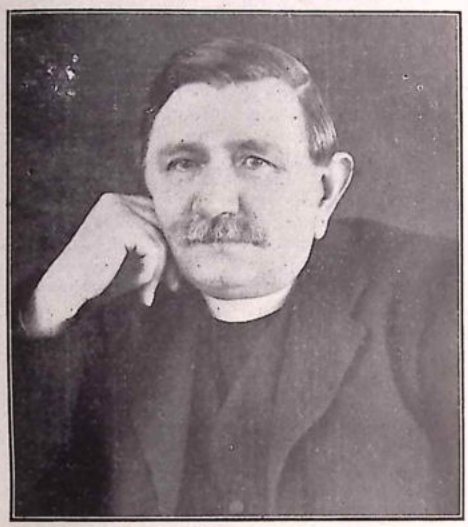
The POLITICAL OBJECTOR

A Statement of His Case

By The Rev. RICHARD LEE, M.A.



(Formerly Minister, Ross St. Unitarian Church, Glasgow: now Minister New Great Meeting House, Coventry.)

[Outline: Distinction between religious and political conscience—(1) Distinction false and illiterate; Historical Position: e.g., the Hebrew Prophets, Greek Philosophers, and Puritan Politicians. (2) Distinction Dishonest; Imperialist Politics are conscientious; The Tribunal in Evidence. Political objections are most cogent of all. The record of British politics proves they helped to bring on this war. The present policy is prolonging this war by ineptitudes and worse. The future of war. No possible peace out of a military victory. H. A. L. Fisher proves the futility of past wars. Why fight for more futility?]

THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN A RELIGIOUS AND POLITICAL CONSCIENCE.

In the last war I remember writing to The Nation pleading the case of the political objector. He was treated with scant courtesy by the Tribunals of those days.. A man whose conscience allowed him to shirk the responsibilities of citizenship and whose knowledge of international affairs was as slender as Mr. Churchill's practice of principle was recognised as having a conscience.

A political objector, whose objection to war was based on criticism of the policies which made war inevitable, was sniffed at by supercilious Tribunals as a rapscallion with no conscience. In spite of the improvements in the attitude and procedure of some Tribunals to-day towards conscientious objectors, this distinction between religious and political objectors is the ruling decision.

It is the decision of local Tribunals and it has been upheld by the Appeal Tribunal presided over by the Right Honourable H. A. L. Fisher, the eminent historian and the former Minister of Education.

CONSCIENCE: MAY 1916—MAY 1940

When certain C.O.s were maltreated during 1916-1918, Government spokesmen denied the facts. When Conscription was introduced in 1939, the Premier and other Ministers stated that the 1916 persecutions must not be repeated. The case of Kenneth Makin shows that May 1940 repeats May 1916. The excuse that Military Detention is not imprisonment will be answered by the editor next month.

THE DISTINCTION IS FALSE AND ILLITERATE.

It is amazing that men with some pretensions to scholarship and intelligence should uphold this distinction and condemn political objectors as mountebanks while they admit the conscience of a Plymouth Brother or a Christadelphian.

In a narrow sense, it may be that Mr. Fisher could justify the distinction between religion and politics just as he could justify the distinction between religion and morality. If we took Sir James Frazer's definition of religion as communion with some higher supernatural power, that might rule out both politics and morality.

It may be that this primitive distinction is far too characteristic of modern religion of all schools, christian and pagan.

But a man's conscience is usually regarded as having some relation to an ethical religion. It is an expression conscious or unconscious of a certain view of man's place in the universe. With such a meaning, the separation of religion and politics is sheer nonsense. One cannot be religious and ignore one's duty to one's fellow-man and society. And to recognise one's duty to one's fellow-man is, at any rate, some part of religion.

I wonder whether these members of Tribunals who pour scorn on the humanitarian conscience or the political conscience ever learnt at school Leigh Hunt's "Abou ben Adhem"?

It might enlighten their minds to read it again.

When an objector to this war attempts to argue that it has arisen through political foolishness or bad economics, or when he states that he objects to kill his fellow-man because of humane reasons, some learned man on the Tribunal benches usually turns upon him with some such question as:—

Have you no farther reason?
What is your authority?
Have you read your Bible?
When did you read it last?

If he can trot out some appropriate text he is treated with deference and remains on the list as a valid conscientious objector. If he upholds his own judgment by political or human arguments, he will most likely be crossed off the list.

This is due to a false, mischievous and illiterate distinction between religion and politics.

THE HISTORICAL POSITION.

The attitude too common in all kinds of Christian churches that the churches should taboo politics is mainly responsible for the growth of Hitlerism in Germany in Britain and in many other parts of the world.

It is one of the main causes of the present war.

I once heard one of the most cultured Unitarian laymen argue that it was a mistake for a Unitarian minister to deal with social and political problems. The church was a place of refuge for the weary, a home of quiet devotion and of refreshment for the soul and nothing more.

It is a position which is inconsistent with the highest conceptions of religion and politics.

Let me name a few examples..

THE HEBREW PROPHETS.

The Hebrew prophets were intensely religious men. Their declarations were made as the servants of the Highest. "Thus saith the Lord" was their formula. But they were intimately associated with politics and economics. They laid down concrete policies both on home and foreign affairs.

Amos was a politician and social agitator. Isaiah was a statesman of insight and with close knowledge of affairs. Jeremiah took sides very emphatically on vital political issues. He did that as a prophet of God and for his political faith was called a pro-Babylonian and put down into a noisome well to perish. The politics of the prophets were matters of religion.

THE GREEK PHILOSOPHERS.

The Greek philosophers, Socrates, Plato and Aristotle had I suppose some pretensions to religion, or at any rate to morality. But with them this taboo of politics as something outside the sphere of the soul would have been only worthy of barbarians.

To Plato the soul of man and the state were bound together in indissoluble unity. Aristotle's ethics and politics really belong to the same volume. The good man with both Plato and Aristotle is the good citizen. If a man can justify himself politically, it is tantamount to a moral justification.

Mr. H. A L Fisher's ruling that a politician has no conscience may be true of his former associates, some of whom have helped to bring on the present war.

But it is a ruling entirely opposed to any worthy and intelligent conception of human life such as was put forward in Plato's Republic or Aristotle's Ethics.

THE PURITAN POLITICS.

The Puritans and for that matter their antagonists the Cavaliers were politicians. They preached political sermons and very long ones.

I do not agree with their politics but at any rate they did not divorce religion from political affairs. John Milton was, I presume, a religious man and wrote religious poems. Even in "Paradise Lost" and "Paradise Regained" there is a political motive as well as in Samson Agonistes or Comus or "Aeropagitica."

To the greatest of the Puritans this divorce of religion and human affairs would have been as repugnant as it is to Plato and the Greek moralists.

THE DISTINCTION IS DISHONEST.

To rule out pacifist politics as non-religious is dishonest as well as false.

Those who denounce most vehemently "politics in the pulpit" almost invariably mean anything opposed to their prejudice.

The Anglican, Congregational or Unitarian who gets apopleptic at peace sermons does not resent a good rousing patriotic sermon on Churchillian lines.

So long as you support the Government and the Constitution and the Empire and sing

"Confound their politics Frustrate their knavish tricks," it is good religion. Only when you go back to the ethics of Jesus or Mencicus or Sakya Muni do you become a rabid politician.

It is curious that those members of the Tribunals who do not like the political arguments of objectors very often use political arguments themselves. It is a political argument, for example, to assert

"Our war is a war to defend neutrals."

"Our war was caused by Hitler's attack on small states."

"There is no other way to destroy aggression save to wage ruthless war."

Such statements as these are being made continually in the little moral lectures of the members of Tribunals.

They are political arguments, which are entirely irrevelant, if a political conscience is no conscience at all. Yet the latter is the final decision given by Mr. H. A. L. Fisher and his colleagues of the National Tribunal.

It is one of the many instances how the violent struggle against Hitlerism by methods immoral and irrational leads inevitably to the wholesale imitation of Hitlerism in its worst phases.

The mining of Norwegian waters is another instance reported over the wireless as I write.

Thus devil casts out devil and seven devils and seven devils more come back to have their fling.

The only politics the Tribunals recognise is the politics of the Class-State which they represent.

THE POLITICAL OBJECTIONS ARE THE MOST COGENT OF ALL.

The purely abstract objections to killing in warfare, however much supported by the dicta of moralists and philosophers, always seem to me difficult to uphold when we come to the concrete affairs of the present world. I hold those objections, but without the additional backing of the political considerations they would be somewhat weakened and unconvincing to the average man. When we face the facts, the political and economic facts, there is no case for the present war. It is utterly senseless and wicked.

On purely emotional grounds, to fight Hitlerism by his own methods makes a popular appeal just as resisting a big bully wins the applause of the crowd (though it is a wretched and foolish analogy). But when we ask "What are the political and economic causes of Hitlerism," the emotional passion is cooled and we strive to get down to basic realities. The Past proves the war is ours as well as Hitler's. There is not a shadow of doubt to any impartial mind that Hitlerism is partly the effect of the unjust and foolish policy of Britain and France at the Versailles Conference and also in making the League of Nations an instrument for achieving the aims of the Allies rather than establishing peace on a basis of justice.

If that is one of the main causes of the rise of Hitlerism a change in Allied policy might have prevented its growth. And the only way the Allies can help to put down Hitlerism is to amend their own ways and express willingness for a revolution in their own political and economic policies. The political judgment in regard to the past has a vital bearing on one's judgment of the war and how to bring it to an end.

Lord Davies in to-day's Manchester Guardian gives his view of the Premier's policy leading to the present situation.

"Mr. Chamberlain's strivings for peace ended in failure because he adopted methods and pursued a policy which were bound sooner or later to land us in war. What grounds are there to suppose that a Prime Minister who has so signally failed to deliver the goods in peace time will be more successful in the conduct of war?"

Lord Davies says in effect, Mr. Chamberlain's foolish policy led us into war. In supporting the war one is backing up the same Mr. Chamberlain, unless he has been radically changed.

"Can the Ethiopian change his skin?"

Take the politics of the next most important member of the British Cabinet. I know intimately Mr. Churchill's political career. He used to be my member of Parliament. I would just as soon trust Adolph Hitler as trust Mr. Churchill's policies as principles. Yet the conduct of the war will be determined as much by him as by any other man in the Cabinet. This is a political objection, yet it carries more appeal to my conscience than all the pacifist sermons I have read or the texts quoted against the theory and practice of war. Yet if I were to urge this, to me, overwhelmingly cogent reason why I should keep out of this war, I should be treated with utter contempt by any Tribunal in Britain.

THE PRESENT IS INEPT GOVERNMENT POLICY.

The same kind of objection could be urged because of present happenings and the policies pursued by the Government.

I could well imagine someone under military age last September hearing Mr. Chamberlain's impressive words :—

"It will be evil things that we are fighting." Saying, "Yes, when my time comes, I shall be in the fight:"

To-day, April 1940, it is a different story.

These months have passed by. We see more clearly what the war is and what has caused it. Russia has been driven into the arms of Hitler. The pathetic request of the neutrals that we should consider ways of reaching peace has been turned down with contempt. Britain and France, in spite of repeated affirmations about unity, give conflicting statements about peace aims. The prevailing French view is the utter destruction of Germany, a view Mr. Chamberlain has denied emphatically on more than one occasion.

Why should any man fight for he knows not what?

International Law has been flouted shamelessly by both belligerents. Germany breaks it first. Then the Allies are justified by way of reprisal in breaking some other law. We shall go on to fulfil Mr. Churchill's prophecy and be ready to break every law human and divine in our lust for victory. Yet Lord Cecil preaches his pious sermon about the War for the Sanctity of the Law of Nations.

I can well imagine the eager patriot of last September saying, "If this cowardly confusion, this multiplication of callousness and cruelty, this refusal to consider anything but the mad mass-murder of innocents, if this is war I will leave the ghastly mess alone." In fact, this is what millions are thinking. The present imbecilities of the politicians make even those who have a fighting impulse revolt against war.

It is a political objection but it goes home to the intelligent soul of decent men.

THE FUTURE OF THE WAR: A COMMUNIST GERMANY OR A NATIONALIST GERMANY?

A thoughtful objector will exercise some thought as to the political future of the war. He will ask what good is likely to come from its continuance. I am sure in my own mind it is generally true, "The longer war the worse the peace." But one should always distrust generalisations. I usually ask war-supporters: "Your war aim is to destroy Hitlerism. What kind of Government do you suppose will take its place?"

It is difficult to get an answer. But my answer is fairly definite. You will have a revolution to the right or to the left. If Communism wins in Germany, Hitler will fade; Stalin will rule the major part of Europe.

Is that your peace aim? Do you think you will get your Europe a Paradise Regained, the dream of Halifax, Attlee, Gilbert Murray and the other moon-struck idealists whose pious faith in another war to end war has not been shattered? If Germany goes right, as I think is more likely, Rudolf Olden, a competent German authority, thinks there will be a sure revival of German militarism.. Hitler will live in a new form. It is extremely unlikely that a Brüning Government of tame Liberals will ever get a chance again in Germany.

We are fighting to put a Hohenzollern prince on the throne. That is Duff Cooper's prophecy. It is either that or Communism. To fight for either consummation is not the lot most British workers would choose.

If they face realities they will say why should I fight in this tortuous, doubtful battle?

The objection is political but again it appeals to the reasonable soul of a decent human being. Why should it be ruled out?

MR. FISHER'S POLITICAL REASONS.

I was reading the other day Mr. H. A. L. Fisher's History of Europe. It is a finely written treatise on non-Marxian lines. But I could find inside its pages as good political arguments against war as in the New Testament.

The three great wars of the past 120 years are the Napoleonic War, the Crimea War, and the Great War. In regard to all three, Mr. Fisher shows their futility. He claims indeed that the defeat of Napoleon gave us forty years of peace. Nevertheless, Mr. Fisher shows that Napoleonism had a long life in Europe. You destroyed Napoleon but gave a new lease of life to Napoleonism and I can see many traces of Napoleonism in the present temper of France.

In regard to the Crimea War, the late Lord Salisbury said we put our money on the wrong horse. Fisher, on page 946, admits that this is fundamentally correct. His judgment on the results of the late Great War are more relevant to our present theme. He affirms definitely the utter failure of that war to achieve its aims.

Let me quote his words (page 1169) :—

"When the Treaty of Versailles was finally signed in the Galerie des Glaces, where half a century earlier the Hohenzollern Empire had been proclaimed, everybody felt that a great opportunity had been missed. The statesmen had not been equal to the grandeur of events. They had made a peace which was no peace. American idealists, who were well content that the doctrine of self-determination should be vindicated in respect of their Red Indians and Africans, joined with English idealists, who were not proposing to march out of India or Egypt, in denouncing the lapses from the high doctrine of self-determination which were noted in the treaties.

"Human nature, it was felt, had failed. Europe had not been made safe for democracy. The bright exhilaration of victory was soon blotted out by the fog of disillusion, resentment and despair."

These words of the President of the London Appeal Tribunal should be shown in large letters on the walls of all the rooms where Conscientious objectors are being examined by elderly men, most of whom believe pathetically that you should have another attempt to cast out the devils of war by means of Beelzebub, the Prince of Devils.

Nearly every speech from Labour, Conservative, or Liberal is dazzled by what Mr. Fisher calls "the bright exhilaration of victory."

Any commonsense political objector who, in a cool hour, looks at the history of the Allied leaders, especially British politicians who shout for victory now, will see already the fog of disillusion. Resentment also will fill his mind that he should be dragged into another vain struggle by sordid methods of cowardice and cruelty to reach peace, security and happiness for the peoples of Europe.

THE WORD for August, 1939, reprinted William Gallacher's attack on P. J. Dollan from The Worker, for August 26, 1922. Gallacher never repented that attitude. In the Daily Worker for Monday, January 9, 1932—that is nearly 10 years later—he wrote :—

"Dollan was a patriot in the early stages of the war, engaged in writing rotten slush for the Daily Citizen. His conscience developed when conscripting was introduced. This 'courageous fight' consisted in accepting the Home Office scheme.

"But he didn't have to complete his time. Does Sylvia Pankhurst know that while genuine C.O.s were undergoing the harshest possible treatment, the authorities allowed Dollan to return to his home in Glasgow? What a creature to be presented as a 'courageous fighter.'"

Some folk have to choose still between Willie Gallacher, M.P., and Lord Provost Dollan.

THE SENTRY

By George E. Whitman.

The morning's rain had filled the streets with mud which, in the mildness of the afternoon, exhaled a thin mist. The veiled autumnal sun hung in the south-west, a lifeless dull-red disc, as though arrested there in its daily course. It was that hour of Sunday afternoon when the life of the London suburbs seems to have reached the lowest ebb of the whole week. The few walked without energy and their faces looked blank and lifeless. They felt oppressed, in their overcoats, by the damp and unseasonable warmth. The occasional cars which passed sounded a little muted in the mist and seemed in no hurry to reach their destinations. So much of life might be observed and the feeble pulse of it seemed to be measured by the doleful monotone of a chapel bell which could be felt, rather than heard, as it came slowly over the housetops from a few streets away. The hour of evensong was earlier now for Britain was at war, and they who wished to meet and worship the Prince of Peace must do so before darkness fell.

The trees which overhung the roadway at the foot of the common dripped upon a shabbily-dressed man who limped along beneath them. He was carrying a tray which held a few boxes of matches, and propped up on the tray was a piece of cardboard bearing the words: "Ex-service man—my only means of support." A policeman strolled past him glancing at him with that look of suspicion which the guardians of our society inevitably bestow upon those who threaten it by being threadbare and miserable. When he had passed, the match-seller turned and looked at his broad back and the red band of beef-and-beer-nourished flesh which could be seen between helmet and collar. But the match-seller's unshaven face was expressionless; it was the face of one beyond resenting, beyond hoping, beyond even despairing. On the breast of his worn coat were two medals. The colours of their ribbons were faded to a uniform dull grey by long exposure to the weather.

More people appeared. The chapel bell and other bells were summoning them. Some were going to the services from the sheer inertia of custom; some from a vague feeling that religion, like the strolling policeman, was a guardian of property and society as at present constituted; a few were going in order to pray. Hymns were being sung and sermons preached exhorting to goodwill, peace, charity and the forgiveness of enemies. Yet the world outside was as pitiless as ever, and at vantage-points all about the metropolis anti-aircraft guns pointed skywards to show how sincerely we hold this our faith of twenty centuries.

Some of the churchgoers were passing an advertisement hoarding. "Freedom is in Danger," proclaimed the posters, "Your Courage, Your Cheerfulness, Your Resolution will bring Us Victory"; "Beer is Best, Stick to Beer." But the passers-by were apathetic. The posters had but little effect on their slogan-dulled minds. Perhaps, here and there, one whose critical faculty was not quite deadened wondered a little at the distinction between first and second persons in the "Victory" poster.

Through the mist the faint, ever-present roar of the great city rose, though dulled, yet even on a Sunday afternoon with a hint of something menacing and terrible in it. Many shops had shutters of unpainted wood over their windows; many were sandbagged. At a street corner was a fortified police post. Two special constables wearing shrapnel helmets walked slowly by with a look of extreme boredom on their faces. A taxicab with ladders mounted on its roof, drawing a fire-pump on a trailer and manned by auxiliary firemen drove past. Quite half the human beings in sight were wearing unforms. It was as though they tried, by surrendering their independence of judgment and action, to avoid their share of the responsibility for the catastrophic situation which was the consequence of the sin of their unawareness.

Still, it was the Sabbath day, and the precept made so long ago at the foot of Mount Sinai incongruously and indifferently observed by us of modern times. As the afternoon wore on many a respectable citizen stirred on the sofa where he had been sleepily digesting the ritual Sunday joint, and stooped stertorously to pick up from the floor the crumpled sheets of his favourite Sunday newspaper. This had been of unusual interest to-day. For the first time for months a topic, in fact two topics, had arisen of sufficient national importance to take precedence over war news: the resumption of horse racing and of football pools.

On the other side of the main road, opposite the common, stood a large church, built of red brick in late Victorian times. Some people, mostly old ladies carrying bibles and prayer books, were entering its door. On a board in front was a poster of the "wayside pulpit" variety. "A Thought for the Week," it said, "Never let a quarrel be your master." At one side of the church was the church-hall, a smaller building also of red brick. The patriotic vicar had placed this at the disposal of the war office and it was occupied by some sort of military detachment.

A little crowd had gathered here to watch a sentry who was on duty at the entrance.

He was a lad of twenty, tall, erect and fresh-complexioned. His body was well-knit and well-proportioned. But his head had been cropped close and encased in a metal helmet; his fine calves were constricted and tied up by puttees; over his left shoulder he bore a weapon which the devoted skill of scientists and artisans had fashioned so that it could be used lethally at a distance of a mile from its victims; from his belt hung a blade of finely-tempered steel cunningly designed for piercing the kidneys of other lads exactly like himself except that they spoke another variant of the Saxon tongue; on his back were a variety of weighty accoutrements for such purposes as scratching holes in the ground, enabling him to breathe in the midst of asphyxiating gases, polishing brass buttons and all the numberless other accomplishments of the "good soldier." He marched stiffly twelve paces in one direction, turned solemnly in three jerks lifting his feet high off the ground, and marched twelve paces the other way, and so on. And even as his body was cased and constricted by uncouth clothes and gear so was his mind hypnotised and strait-jacketed by the drill sergeant. His eyes were fixed and staring; his facial expression, which once had been pleasant and mobile, was stiff and constrained. He looked right through the little crowd of people and the "wayside pulpit." He seemed the very type of those millions of young men in Britain, in Europe, in the world beyond, who have allowed a quarrel to become their master indeed—who have allowed their souls to be bartered to the brute-master of militarism and war.

The sun had sunk below the roof-tops. On the common the wind amongst the trees murmured a threnody. Dusk, the unrelieved, unlighted dusk of war-time London, descended. The mist swirled and thickened. The little crowd that had been gazing at the lad, dully with almost impersonal curiosity, had melted away. But the sentry kept on marching up and down, up and down, twelve paces each way, in the gathering gloom.

A MONUMENT PROPOSED.

Dear Sir,—Isn't your exposure of the "over age conshies" turned labour imperialists in rather bad taste? Would it not be more fitting if you advocated a monument raised by public subscription in recognition of their valuable services given in two great wars?

Yours sincerely,

V. WILSON.

LONDON CASES

On Wednesday, January 24, Frederick South, Hassard Street, Hackney, E., was registered for non-combatant duties only.

His father had served for 17 years in the Army and had fought in the Boer War and the Great War. The father told the Tribunal :—

"I have told my son that if he takes up arms, I will disown him."

On Monday, February 19, Frank Millbank, Grove Place, Ealing, told the Tribunal that he had been brought up by his widowed mother to think that the taking of life was an evil thing. Even if sanctioned by the Government, there would be no justification for the murder of war. He considered war was wrong, even if fought for a good purpose.

As regards non-combatant work, he could not take part in it as it helped the military machine. He would be willing to do work under civil control.

The decision of the Tribunal was that they thought there was a genuine conscientious objection to both fighting and non-combatant services. Millbank would have to find work of an agricultural or forestry nature.

A similar decision was given next day in the case of John Raymond Shinn, St. Dunstan's Avenue, Acton. Since his schooldays, he had thought that all wars were futile and murder. The British Government's attitude after the last war was partially the cause of this war. Not being able to vote, he was unable to vote against this Government. It was barbaric to take any part in warfare. It was contrary to the teachings of Christ, and he would not take any part in it.

The condition in the case of Cecil Kenworthy, a civil servant, employed at the Probate Register, and living at Gunterstone Road, West Kensington, W.14, was that he remain in his present employment. The Tribunal considered this to be useful work.

Kenworthy said that war was a barbarous evil. It made a feeling of hatred, which destroyed any hopes of a lasting peace.

Questioned by Sir Edmund Phipps, Kenworthy said that he could not take part in noncombatant duties as that would be assisting the war.

In answer to another question, applicant said his work was important, but did not help in the war.

A. F. Roberts, Norwood, was granted non-combatant duties. He pleaded on religious grounds and quoted the text : "Thou shalt not kill." He considered that there was not much difference between a soldier and a murderer.

Judge Hargreaves asked Roberts if he thought they should alter the hymn to : "Onward, Christian Murderers."

Roberts assented.

One of the most interesting cases considered by the London Tribunal during its sittings was that of Philip John Kemp, 55 Hazeldean Road, Harlesden, a roundsman employed by the London Co-operative Society.

In his written application he said he had been taught to avoid violence and he did not regard war as a solution to international disputes. "All the world is my country and all mankind my brethren," he wrote.

Later Kemp said he was not at all sure that the object of the present war was what it purported to be.

Sir Edmund Phipps : "You say there was some secret object under the benches when the House of Commons went to war?"

Kemp : "Possibly."

Mr. Rodney Haines, an organiser in the London Co-operative Branch of the National Union of Distributive and Allied Workers, said he had known Kemp for five years. Haines added :—

"Since the present war commenced the London Co-op. Society, through their employees, have set up a 2d. per week Soldiers' Comforts Fund for employees in the Forces, the money being deducted each week from the wages. Kemp has religiously refused to subscribe. At the last branch meeting of the Union there was a very violent discussion. Such insults were hurled at members like Kemp that they were mean about 2d., but Kemp stuck to his guns that even by the 2d. per week he was helping forward the military machine.

"The possibility has arisen of the L.C.S. supplying bread to the troops. Kemp has taken it upon himself to see that he is not mixed up in that."

Referring to the Socialist Sunday School, Mr. A. B. Swales said he knew its principles and they were equal to any Christian teaching in his view.

The Tribunal directed that Kemp be exempted from military service on condition he got agricultural or forestry work.

Kemp : I object to that position. I am going to appeal

At the Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal, held on Tuesday, February 13, 1940, at the Fulham Town Hall, Judge Hargreaves, the President, had to complain of interruptions from the gallery. When the "tittering" did not cease, he requested two men to leave. One of the men was in the uniform of a member of the R.A.F., and he shouted out "If you want my name, you can get it from my Commanding Officer, King George VI."

Henry Ralph Bauckham, a wallpaper designer, living at Hitherbroom Road, Hayes, told the Tribunal that Christ came to save life and not to destroy. Helping the wounded was assisting the war, and he had conscientious objections of so doing.

The Rev. Harold R. Gordon, Minister of Hayes Baptist Church, spoke of Bauckham's sincerity.

The Tribunal decided that applicant should be put on non-combatant duties only.

Arthur Frederick Boccuis, employed as a clothing manufacturer's assistant, and living at Harrow Road, W., said he considered there was nothing more unsatisfactory than war. His objection against war was on Christian ethical grounds. War was wrong, and such a wicked thing that he must separate himself from taking any part in it.

Mr. Charles A. Boccuis said his son was sincere in his views.

The Tribunal came to the conclusion that there was a strong objection to war and non-combatant duties, and he would be conditionally registered provided he remained at his present occupation.

On Wednesday, February 14, Joseph William Curtis, a motor driver, of Windsor Buildings, Cato Street, W.1, said, as a member of the slave class, his objection to war was that it gained nothing for his class but medals and artificial limbs.

The tribunal said there was no matter of conscience concerned, and applicant's name would be removed from the register.

Frederick Harold Dowse, a general labourer, of Poplar Place, Central Avenue, Hayes, said he objected to military service as he had been taught it was wrong to kill. His father had served in the last war to improve conditions, but had found out his mistake.

The tribunal said Dowse would be employed on non-combatant service.

On Wednesday, Kenneth Ivor Foot, an estate clerk, living at Stonor Road, West Kensington, W.14, said that as a Christian Pacifist he renounced war, claiming that no man has any moral right to kill or take any part in war.

Foot stated that he was a vegetarian, as he disbelieved in killing animals. He had a duty to his fellow-men rather than to the State. He would organise resistance, and when everybody believed in passive resistance there could be no war. If they at first sacrificed their own lives, it would eventually stop an intended invasion.

As regards doing civil work under civil control, it would still be helping the war.

Foot was put on non-combatant duties.

Stephen Hathaway Fothergill, of Gunterstone Road, West Kensington, W.14, formerly a clerk but now working on a pig farm, said he was unable to take any part in war, as it was wrong and fundamentally un-Christian.

Fothergill said that if the Germans invaded London he would give them cups of tea and not resist them, and they would be demoralised. Though he had not been there, he believed the average Nazi to be a decent man.

The tribunal said they were satisfied there was a conscientious objection to war and also to non-combatant duties. Fothergill would be kept on the register, providing he continued in his present employment.

EDINBURGH CASES

On Wednesday, January 24, the Tribunal for Conscientious Objectors for Edinburgh and South-East Scotland, held in Edinburgh, granted conditional exemption to three members of the Community of the Son of God.

R. Taylor, 92 Cardross Crescent, Broxburn, was registered as a conscientious objector, on condition that he undertook employment in the oil industry; C. Fisher, 17 West Main Street, Whitburn, on condition that he undertook market gardening; and W. Paterson, 6 Second Avenue, Newcraighall, Musselburgh, on condition that he undertook employment in the coal-mining industry.

Taylor said that he could not serve in the R.A.M.C., because he could not be a bond servant of two kings. He was a bond servant of the Lord Jesus Christ. If he were to drive a lorry wearing the King's uniform he would be breaking the law of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Asked if a postman could not be a Christian, Taylor replied he could not be a true Christian.

A representative of the community of the Son of God said the community did not object to putting on a uniform, but they did not believe in putting on the King's uniform.

Replying to Professor Galbraith, Fisher said he had strong feelings on uniform.

All kinds of uniform?—Yes, the military uniform.

You would not object to be a postman, but you would object to be in the military?—Yes.

Asked by Dr. E. M. Wedderburn if he would rather live in this country or Germany, Fisher replied in this country.

Asked to give his reason, he said—"Because the Government allows us to preach God's Word."

THE GLASGOW N.C.L.

I address these lines to all comrades belonging to the Glasgow N.C.L.

I have resigned from the Chairmanship and Council of the West of Scotland N.C.L., on a matter of principle and policy. Since I became Chairman of the organisation, my idea has been to build a powerful association for assisting, in every way possible, the war resister, irrespective of his grounds for such resistance. I wished to see the Glasgow N.C.L. establish headquarters and build up a C.O. Fund. I know that this could have been done. The end of this month would have witnessed complete success in both directions.

The proper organisation of the N.C.L. is a matter of urgency. During the past year, the Glasgow organisation has had to overcome considerable sabotage, dictated by carcerism and incompetence on the part of the carcerists. The N.C.L. has survived these attempts to destroy it but has fallen into hopeless confusion from want of faith in itself.

I trust that the N.C.L. will recover from this error. I hope that all young comrades, and older ones also, will work for the successful organisation of our movement. For the N.C.L. is our movement. The Glasgow N.C.L., properly organised, is the movement of the conscientious objector, the anti-militarist, and working-class of Scotland during this period of crisis. Sooner or later, and it must be sooner, the N.C.L. must be established on a proper basis in Scotland.

I would have liked to have continued the work to which, during the past year, I have addressed my energies. I am not prepared to compromise my allegiance to the N.C.L., as the actual organisation of the C.O., in order to advance the status and interests of political carcerists. I believe in an absolutely C.O. organisation—in a word, the N.C.L.

I have cancelled all N.C.L. meetings. The service I might have rendered as Chairman of the organisation I cannot render as an outsider.

CONCHIE COMMENT

Norman Case was granted total exemption by the Bristol Tribunal. He returned to his work at the Arnold Glove Co. on Wednesday, February 28. As he entered the workroom, all the men downed tools. The firm was compelled to sack him. All the persons who struck are members of the Glovers' Union, but their strike was unofficial. One of them explained this stupid attitude of reactionary trades unionism to the Daily Herald reporter :—

"We fought in the last war, and some of us have sons now serving with the Forces.

"Why should they fight for their country for 14s. a week when another man can stay at home as a conscientious objector and earn big money?"

A principal of the firm explained : "I had no option in the matter." The attitude of the trade unionist glovers of Yeovil has forced other gloving firms to state that they cannot employ conscientious objectors.

An interesting statement was made at the Conscientious Objectors' Appeal Tribunal for England and Wales in London on December 18. R. S. Hildersey, of New Southgate, was registered for non-combatant duties. His father, Walter Hildersley, gave evidence.

Mr. Hildersley stated that his son would not join the Boy Scouts because of his dread of soldiers. He would not take part in such sports as fishing and shooting because of his dread of causing any pain.

The father admitted that his son had been persecuted at home because of his views. He said frankly :—

"When we knew of his registration as a conscientious objector things became very bad at home."

When the local tribunal decided against the son, and he lodged his appeal, disputes in the house became severe, and the son left home. The father realised that his attitude towards his son was wrong :—

"It was then that I discovered I had a conscience too. I decided it was unfair for me to judge him when he should be governed by the decisions of this court."

Not only was this case interesting because of the father's frank statement. The representative of the Ministry of Labour made an intriguing declaration also. He directed attention to a phrase in the local tribunal's decision that Hildersley's objections "were purely of a political character." The Minister wished to emphasise that it was perfectly possible for an applicant to have definite political objections to the present Government and the present war and yet to have an absolute objection to all war.

It is a pity that the Appeal Tribunal did not grant exemption.

Last July, Dr. A. W. F. Blunt, the Bishop of Bradford, in his Messenger, advised his clergy to help C.O.s to be represented at the tribunal, and to support them if they were victimised. He wrote :—

"No decent persons want a repetition of the persecution to which conscientious objectors to military service were often subjected in 1914-18."

When the National Service Act was passed, Dr. Guy Warman, in the Manchester Diocesan Leaflet, demanded respect for "the real conscientious objector" and asked that the conscience clauses should be administered sympathetically.

The Manchester Guardian for March 11 drew attention to sentences of four years and two years respectively passed the previous day by the Marseilles Military Court on the French conscientious objector brothers, Philippe and Pierre Vernier. Philippe Vernier spoke in Manchester during a visit to England in 1937. He had then already undergone a year's solitary confinement at Lille in 1933 followed by two years' imprisonment, being allowed, after release, to go as an assistant minister to North Africa. In 1936 he returned to France, and on the outbreak of war he came back from Belgium, where he was in charge of a church, but again refused, as a Christian Pacifist, to serve in the French Army.

Now charged with insubordination and disobedience, Philippe Vernier told the Military Court that what was needed was not defence but a Christian offensive against war comparable to that which had been waged against slavery.

His brother, who was charged with disobedience, said he could only fight with the weapons of the spirit.

FREETHOUGHT MEMORIES

The following letter from our comrade Matt Kavanagh is too long to be published in the "Letter Box" :—

"Southend-on-Sea,
"April 2nd, 1940.

"Dear Guy,—The WORD improves with every copy. I hope, sincerely, that it is spreading in other places.

"Thanks for pamphlets, Historical and Traditional Christianity, and Dogmas Dicarded. To me, the latter was the more interesting, for it unfolds and proves a fact of which not many are conscious. This is mainly due to their inability to express themselves. Ideas that come to us, out of our mental volition, in early life, are the main-springs that influence all our thoughts, with modifications, throughout life; or, as in your case, with confirmation.

"You were fortunate in your experience with the clergy. You were much more fortunate than I was. My early associations were such that I became a bitter hater of them; and now, at 64, I look upon them still as the 'Black Gendarmie.' My contact was with the R.C. variety of the pest, as John Most called them; your contact was with the more dangerous kind, the alleged liberal-minded. The liberal clergy, like the good capitalists, excuse the existence of the system in the minds of those who are moved by slogans and not by thought. Unfortunately, this is the majority.

"You have discharged a useful piece of work, in issuing Dogmas. Now, more than ever, should real Freethought be brought into the light. In spite of all the current cant and jargon of progress, there is less heresy to-day than there was 40 years ago. There is more mysticism and obscurantism amongst the would-be intellectuals. Robust heresy is counted bad form, vulgar. If no other reason, I shall be glad when you are able to bring out Bakunin's works. They are needed, badly, to bring a healthy breeze into our social thought, to blow away the cobwebs from out of the brains of the 'Emergent Evolutions' and 'Marxian Scientists.'

"When reading Dogmas, I anticipated references to 'Saladin' (W. Stewart Ross), and the old Agnostic Journal. That, I suppose, will come in the second part. I remember how I used to read the articles of 'G.A.A.', and imagined him some mature scholar of middle-age. How surprised when we met in Liverpool, to find a boy in his early twenties! I hope you will deal with that period of your life, for it will preserve a piece of history which is of importance to all students of Freethought. There is a conspiracy of silence against 'Saladin.' You and I know that there were few who wielded a more brilliant pen against superstition than he. It was, oft-time, a bitter one. Bodies, such as the R.P.A., and the N.S.S., will not do anything towards saving his name from dropping into obscurity, because of ancient feuds. His great crime was, that he was a rebel against hero-worship, of men who were not heroes.

"Looking back, it is interesting to recall the part that Clerkenwell has played in the Freethought, Socialist, and Radical movements. Saladin's shop and office was in Farringdon St. The Freethinkers office is in Farringdon St. to-day. It was off Farringdon St. where Bradlaugh sold the Fruits of Philosophy. The Hall of Science was in Old St. The office of Justice was on Clerkenwell Green. The Green, itself, was the background of the rebels of many causes, all tending towards freedom. As times changed, it replaced Bunhill Fields.

"When reading Dogmas, I remember, as distinctly as if it were to-day, an article of yours, published in the A.J., on Theodore Parker. This is another rebel who is scarcely remembered now.

"All readers of THE WORD should read Dogmas Discarded, because it gives more than a glimpse into history which they are not likely to get anywhere else. This applies, specially to Christian readers. Unless they can see the growth of free ideas, and realise the full implications of that growth, their struggles will lead only to disillusionment and futility. The knowledge of what freedom means and involves, is the only bulwark there can be against reaction, which is found to come either from Right or Left.

"Freethought, prostituted to Commercialism, and Socialism, defining the survival of the slave state, are rank under-growths of the social struggle, that must be destroyed before any real fight can be put up for freedom.

"I will write a review, later, of Historical and Traditional Christianity. I will show, wherein, I do not agree with your conclusions. At present, all I want to say is, that I think the chapter, 'Historic Setting,' the most valuable, if not the deepest. It is, to open-air speakers like myself, an extremely useful collection of facts and figures, not easily procurable. Every speaker and writer should keep this chapter handy for reference.

Fraternal Greetings,
Yours ever,
MATT KAVANAGH."

AUXILIARY FIRE BRIGADE. Is It War Service?

On February 18, the Lancashire Tribunal for Conscientious Objectors, sitting at Manchester, closed its series of sittings with a discussion on the status of the Auxiliary Fire Brigade in relation to war.

The question arose in two cases : Hilton Trippier, Burnley Road, Loveclough, Rossendale, and Cyril Oliver Whyte, Cottam Street, Bury.

In the case of Trippier Sir Miles Mitchell questioned Trippier's minister, the Rev. Emrys Evans, about the relative organisation of the A.F.S. and the St. John Ambulance Association. Mr. Evans replied that the St. John Ambulance Association was in existence in peace-time and wishes to be known as separate from the war machine. The A.F.S. was set up to deal with a war situation.

Sir Miles pointed out that the plans for the A.F.S. were being made by local authorities in 1935.

Mr. Evans agreed, but insisted that it was set up for war purposes.

Alderman Aveling pointed out that the St. John Ambulance had many extra members because of the war.

Trippier was exempted on condition that "if he finds his conscience will not allow him to remain at his present work because it is being used for military purposes he should undertake work on the land."

Trippier's occupation is that of a cotton-spinner. A discussion rose on this point :—

JUDGE BURGIS : If you find out to-night that your output is going to make tents or clothes for soldiers you will give in your notice?

TRIPPIER : Yes.

JUDGE BURGIS : Very well. We shall rely on that.

Giving the decision in the case of Whyte, the Chairman said : "It may be, and I think in this case is, that conscience is not working perfectly, but we are satisfied that he has examined it and to that extent we admire his approach. When it tells him that he cannot take part in the Auxiliary Fire Service we think it is defective. But we think it is working efficiently in another respect. It does tell him he ought to engage in agriculture."

He was registered on condition of doing work in agriculture, and Judge Burgis said to him, "The Ministry will collaborate with you to enable you to find suitable work in agriculture."

"THIS MARCH OF HOMICIDE"

The Late Sir Walter Strickland's Last Letter—on Peace and War, and The International Problem.

SIR WALTER STRICKLAND JUST AFTER HE LEFT CAMBRIDGE.

The Malton Messenger, in its issue for May 6, 1939, published the late Sir Walter Strickland's last letter to us, dated Buitenzorg, Java, Asia, December 14, 1937. The Messenger placed this long and interesting letter beneath headings, which it spread right across its page. These headings, and the editorial introduction, and a further editorial comment, were reproduced in THE WORD for June 1939.

Varsity, the Cambridge University newspaper, reproduced the letter in its columns for May 13, 1939, omitting only the passage beginning "I have received all your letters" to "incapable of dividing up." Varsity employed different textual sub-headings from The Messenger. We were tempted to employ the Varsity's captions but decided to retain those used by the Messenger. The Varsity's sub-titles were most expressive, as witness:—

"A DISEASED WORLD"

"SOMETHING MORE THAN ECONOMICS"

"IT GOES BACK TO 1918"

"SOLUTION IS ONE OF SCIENCE"

"WAR IS NOT INEVITABLE."

These slogans summarise Strickland's letter very well.

Explaining the message, Varsity said:—

"Sir Walter Strickland's last message was a letter to Guy Aldred—and it is in that form that we are privileged to publish it."

Extracting from the letter as the title for the message the phrase now used in this paper, Varsity published the following introductory words above the heading:—

"Sir Walter Strickland, famous traveller and writer, died in Java last year. Before his death he wrote this, his last message, appealing to scientists and scholars all over the world and especially in Cambridge to stop—"

There followed the heading in bold type, "This March of Homicide."

It must be remembered that the people who support war to-day were not openly thinking in war-terms when Strickland wrote, nor yet even when the Malton Messenger and the Varsity published his appeal. The force of his plea remains, and is more powerful to-day than when he wrote.

Walter Strickland was born on May 24, 1851. The publication of his last letter at such a time of world turmoil may be considered a tribute to his memory and an attempt to link his name with that most useful of causes, the struggle against war and disaster in war-time.

Buitenzorg, Java, Asia.

Dear Aldred,—It is now two years or more since I have held any serious communication with the outside world. Last August I had to write my English lawyers, but that was merely a matter of routine. Life here is healthy but deadly dull and thoroughly respectable. The dullness offers a great opportunity for thinking and, at my age, thinking is a most satisfying occupation. I have indulged my opportunity for reflection fully and deliberately, because I wanted a pause in which to consider what I could do, what one person could do, to avert the disaster to which the world, in its madness, is rushing headlong. Over twenty-five years ago I asked, "Is man the last, is he not too base?" and I opined "the extinction of mankind." To-day it would seem that my slogan and forecast were correct, and that to me belongs the satisfaction of being able to say: "I told you so." But I want to use all my remaining powers, and faculties to make my slogan untrue, to stop man's folly for his own extinction, and to rouse man"s protective sense, his love of life and happiness. I know that other men have attempted this task before and all in vain. Some day some men, some generation will attempt and achieve. War will be outlawed and the crime and folly of glory will cease. The question I am putting to my conscience, to my reasoning faculties, as an observer of the pageantry of the great nations rushing to disaster, is: What can be done to save the youth of the world. War calls the youth glorious. Is not the youth too glorious to be maimed and murdered—if only that youth would think, would appreciate the great sport of thinking.

"ITS OFFICIAL SHAMBLES."

I have received all your leading letters during the past two years and also those from Messrs. Westerman, from New York, and hundreds of others, responding to my suggestion to spend my wealth in some scheme to avert war. But I can see no plan, and I have not wanted to reply to anyone, for I had no heart to write when the pig fight was preparing for its official shambles work by conducting so much unofficial slaughter. With the English-speaking world half bankrupt financially, and the entire world bankrupt morally, I could not believe that there existed culture, real serious culture, in Glasgow or Edinburgh, London or New York. I found refuge in dullness. Here one is sheltered for the moment, from the world's madness. Part of the year it is so warm one does nothing naturally. Later, it is so damp that I am obliged to write in pencil to avoid blotting my writing into illiteracy. Anyway, there was the excuse for not writing. Now I feel I must write. The question arises: Will I be heard? I want you to help me here. I pray I may be heard and that I will be heard usefully.

I am a very old man, although I expect to live several more years. Science has increased man's productive powers and lengthened his life-span. Even in unscientific days my family was a long-lived and also a hard-living one. I am the first of my family to live frugally, to be a vegetarian, non-smoker, and to be a drinker only of light wines, unknown in Britain. The late Baronet would scoff at the life I lead.

WORLD HASTENING TO MADNESS.

My life has been spent out of England in warm countries and I have had the advantage of wealth. I should make some return to humanity for this advantage denied to so many millions, but which I was yet incapable of dividing up. I am now 87 years of age and I hope to live to be over one hundred years old. I believe I have another twelve years to live, and I could enjoy those years if I could see life meaning peace and fullness and security to the generations that are growing up. All I can vision is a promise of bombed cities, wars commenced without even the formality of declaration, a world hastening to arms and madness and hysteria, mechanised perfection of horror, and no means of stopping the monstrous error of it all. We five in a world diseased because, in every country, the world's thinkers will not avert the disease. Thought is paralysed by brute force. The mind, which should control brawn, is enslaved to muscle. The doctors stand by the side of the suffering patient and permit death to creep into the room, whereas health could be restored, and the pain and agony and strain destroyed. It is madness, not the madness of action, but of inaction. War is not something positive, but something negative. War is the diseased expression of the paralysed mind of man. That paralysis must be stopped, not by words, but by scientific approach.

This is not a time for good taste or politeness. This is a time for rudeness. I am an old man, and this may be the last serious letter I shall write. I want to write with all the power I have and to conjure up every reason why the world should hear me. I am in earnest, but that is not reason enough. It must be known, if I am to be heard, that I write safely. I am a member of the ruling class. I do not wish to destroy property. I am a Cambridge don. I make this statement, which ought not to be made, because I want the professional, the intellectual class, to listen. Even snobbery and aristocracy must be used if horror is to be averted. I cannot any longer stand aside, stupidly say nothing, urge nothing, suggest nothing to end this hysteria of homicide. My voice is nothing, but if it should be heard other voices may swell the chorus. If only the horror menacing the world can be averted I would surrender, here and now, gladly the hope I have of a few more years of vain living.

"THIS MARCH OF HOMICIDE."

The question of war is not entirely a matter of socialism or class-struggle. The workers make armaments and will not cease such work. If they did war would end. Soviet Russia has intensified her Imperialism and played at secret diplomacy. The poverty problem must be solved, but this war-horror is something more than economics, and must be faced now, apart from questions of reform and revolution. In Russia revolution has not ended murder. More Socialists seem to have been murdered since the Czar's death than during the century preceding his abdication and execution. We must think, and we must find a way to end this march of homicide.

How you can get my message published, Aldred, the message of an old man, appalled at what is happening in the world, I leave to you. Owing to the distance between Glasgow and Java, I leave everything to your judgment, as transactions must take months, if every small detail has to be sanctioned by a letter from me here. What I want done is this: My word, as an old man, a student, a member of the ruling class, a world traveller who has lived in every portion of the British Empire, in America, and in Asia, to be listened to as a call to thought, and then action against war. In my travel letters, which date back to the time I left the University, I made it a rule, as far as possible, only to set down what I saw, felt, or could verify. In this spirit of scientific detachment, personally, I request a hearing not for myself, but for the world's youth—for the world's interest, and for the world's achievement. What money I have, and it is considerable, I intend to give to two causes, which I count as one: the cause of world-peace and the cause of science. I explained this two years ago, but I have heard of no real plan, no real movement.

I did not wish, at my age, to visit Britain, but I think I might do so in May, and see if I can use my money to initiate a world discussion of men of peace and science, to cry a halt to war. I will fly to Britain and come straight to Glasgow, since you are there and can act as my secretary, if you will. Anyway, Glasgow and Edinburgh are famed as intellectual centres, and there I can make contact with men of goodwill, thought and action. The question is so urgent, and I think the key moves must be made by the English-speaking nations, that I must take steps to resume my English nationality, or else assume American citizenship. I do not know what to do in this matter, but the English-speaking world could conquer the war problem.

PROBLEMS GOING BACK TO VERSAILLES.

Here is my view of what is wrong and what must be done. It all goes back to 1918, the conclusion of the war, the tricking of Woodrow Wilson, the hailing of Clemenceau as the "Father of Victory" and the restablishment of secret diplomacy and its development by Socialists and Radicals, as well as by Tories and Reactionaries. The Totalitarian state, the Japanese adventure in China, the execution of my old friend Rakovsky, and the emerging of Hitler and Mussolini would have been impossible but for the grand tragedies of Woodrow Wilson and Ramsay MacDonald. The statesmen, the political leaders, the great orators and diplomats of Armistice Day prepared a grand meal for the world—a meal like the savage chief prepared for the visiting missionary, who had come for the good of the savages, but did not intend to be accepted with such physical literacy and enthusiasm. If the world is to be saved from slaughter, that period must be reviewed. It must be reviewed and discussed solemnly, because the errors can be repeated, and will be repeated.

The world must place its faith in youth; not in the strength of youth, because that may mean youth guided by age. History tells us that youthful strength and the wisdom of age means massacre. But the shining hope and goodwill of youth, the grand irresponsible, generosity of life and joy, of speech and expression. The Armistice went wrong, and everything has gone wrong since, because the world was old, the men were old, and their age broke the world's heart. Clemenceau, the hero of the Versailles peace, destroyed Wilson's fourteen points and damned the world to secret sessions and the old balance of power atrocity, with the cynicism "The good God had only ten." But Clemenceau did not believe in God, and his words were a crushing irony. Once upon a time Clemenceau had been young, had believed in justice, had fought for Dreyfus, had suffered ostracism and loss of public life for his ideals. But he turned realist, cynic, patriot; forgot humanity for nationalism, and imposed a treaty that has shattered civilisation. When he learned that Paderewski, the great pianist, had become Polish Premier, Clemenceau exclaimed "What a fall!" And so it was. Clemenceau's own rise to stupid statesmanship was also his own fall, and likewise the fall of man.

TRAGEDY OF WOODROW WILSON.

I cannot go into all the story of the successful struggle of Clemenceau against Wilson, ending in Wilson's tired surrender to the old world order. The tragedy of Woodrow Wilson was much greater even than that of Ramsay MacDonald, for it was unwitting and unwilling, and was of more consequence to the world. Wilson's failure ended the promise of a new moral world order. When Wilson visited Milan, Mussolini, then but a journalist, issued a sheet which carried a misprint, and welcomed him "in the name of the traditional lies of democracy." If democracy did not revel in "traditional lies" as much as the older diplomacy, war would be impossible.

I do not believe in political assassination any more than I believe in war, but I cannot subscribe to discrimination. The wholesale murder of man is, to my mind, more, and not less horrible than retail destruction. Nor yet can I subscribe to the state of mind that viewed the assassination of Kurt Eisner, the Red Premier of Bavaria, by Count Arco-Valley, with equanimity, because of the status of the assassin, whilst it was shocked by the anarchist who fired seven times at Clemenceau, wounding him slightly.

"Why did I do it?" he said to the Police. "Because Clemenceau is the greatest enemy of humanity. I wished the man who is preparing for another war to disappear. I am a friend of man, not excepting the Germans, a friend of humanity, of fraternity. This is my red-letter day."

NATIONS ARE NOT RESPONSIBLE.

The action may have been unwise and regrettable, but there was much wisdom in the apology. To-day the wisdom is being driven home to us by the force of world events. The partition of Europe, the right of Japan in China, sops tending to new conflagrations in the East and the West, were thrown out that Clemenceau might have one glorious hour of victory over fallen Germany; all that he might dictate to the defeated but protesting Count Brockdorff-Rantzau, and fume at the latter's dignified protest that not Germany alone was responsible for the war. The truth is: nations, as nations, are not responsible for war.

I wish that we could force mankind to view the crudity and barbarity of war, its hopeless, impossible loathsomeness, as the Army of Occupation viewed its work in Germany. General Plumer: "The British soldier would revolt rather than continue to be compelled to see starving children and women on the streets of German towns." It is not the soldiers I fear, but the forces of politics and diplomacy.

This brings me to my conclusion and to my appeal. The solution of war, like the solution of unemployment, which is essentially a question of the distribution of energy and comfort and wealth, is one of science and of thought. Science has solved problems in every field except that of politics and economics. Science has lost its sense of dignity and become the prey of capitalists, demagogues and dictators. Scientists must dare to deal with the basic problem of the world, and so be the savants and not the hired servants. It is a fearful thought that men of science should bow before the world's Hitlers, Stalins and Mussolinis.

SUPERIORITY OF WHITE RACES ENDING

The aftermath of the shambles of 1914-1918 is reducing the supposed superiority of the Anglo-Saxon and white races to a house of cards. Matters could be mended and the Anglo-Saxon race can mend and end. In Canada and in America East meets West, and there is question of Japanese citizenship. In both cases the Japanese should be received into full and complete citizenship and not treated as outlanders. They should be absorbed. Secret diplomacy should be abolished. The question of colonial development is a question of administration and round-table discussion, always having regard to actual facts of development. There is absolutely no need for further war, and if definite address was made to the question, war, at last, could end.

War is not necessary to-day. It is as ridiculous as cannibalism but no one feels that this is so. Still less is anyone willing to end it or to see the end of it. Although there may be no purpose and no delight in war, there is something in intrigue and in all those moves that threaten war, and lead on to its disaster.

I do not underestimate the power of finance or force of economy. War is still unnecessary and not inevitable. But its destruction must be planned scientifically, and I have faith in the intellectually inclined accomplishing the end of war, if only they will develop robustness.

The end of war depends upon the robustness of the men of science and of thought in every country. The universities of the world could end war if the students and professors wished.

I have left this desultory letter too long unfinished and will forward it in its unfinished state, with a view to continuing it at some further time. I will conclude for the present requesting a reply, though much that I intended to have said has, for the present, been omitted.

Yours ever,

(Signed) W. W. STRICKLAND.

ROMAN CATHOLIC WAR RESISTERS

A number of comrades in the N.C.L. are members of the Catholic Church. They intend to make a firm stand as radical war resisters precisely because they are Roman Catholics. To the best of their ability, they applied the ordinary moral principles of their religion to war as we know it—and have rejected war as impossible. They anticipate the time when Pope will outlaw war officially and make conscientious objection to war an item of faith and morals.

These Catholic comrades direct the fellow-members of their Church to consider and to discuss in what circumstances is the evil of war not a sin, but a just (i.e., justifiable) war, as it is called. They recall the conditions that must be fulfilled as stated emphatically by Roman Catholic theologians.

War is justifiable, and may be supported by Catholics, if the following conditions exist :—

It must be a strict right that has been infringed undoubtedly and of proportionate importance to the means invoked (war) to vindicate it.

There must be reasonable hope that the injured nation will be successful in enforcing its right.

The war must be entered into simply with the intention of righting the wrong suffered.

War must not be resorted to unless all other means of settlement have been tried and have failed.

The war must be waged by legitimate methods, that is, those in consonance with our nature as rational beings and (for the Catholic believer) children of God.

All these conditions must be fulfilled—a just cause alone is not sufficient. If only one is certainly lacking, then the war is unjustifiable, and in that case Catholics are obliged by the Church to refuse to take any direct part in or to support it.

To a small but increasing number of Roman Catholics it appears inconceivable that any war can occur in the world to-day in which either side would fulfil all the conditions required for justifiableness.

In particular, there is the question of means. Modern war cannot be carried on for a week without an intensive campaign of hate and blood-lust against the enemy. Moreover, both sides would deliberately direct attacks against the lives and property of innocent non-combatants among their opponents. The deterioration of the tone of Neville Chamberlain's speeches as Prime Minister, in his references to Hitler, and the elevation to War Lord supremacy of Winston Churchill, are evidences of this truth. Obviously, Christians may not co-operate in such sinful proceedings: Moreover, there is general agreement, even among the militants and war-directors, that the evils of all kinds—moral, spiritual, physical—resulting from large-scale war in present conditions must enormously exceed any possible legitimate gains by either side. As the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Cincinnati put it, in calling for an organisation of conscientious non-combatants in his diocese, "War to-day never attains its ends." On this account also, war is unjustifiable and, in the circumstances, monstrously vulgar, anti-spiritual, and wicked. It is opposed to all faith and to belief in God. War denies the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

For these reasons, some Catholics declare boldly :—"We will not fight—not because we are frightened or because war is wrong or horrible, but because the good which mankind needs and which we desire is not obtainable by that means."

These Catholics feel that the human race was redeemed by One Man who refused to use force to resist an aggression. This faith inspires the radical war resistance of such Roman Catholics and they refuse to bear less witness to such faith than is expected from all kind of Protestant war resisters, Unitarians, Atheists, nd Socialists. They confess they have as little, nd maybe even less, success in commending eir convictions to their fellows as have Anglicans, and Socialists with like convictions, and—on the whole—for much the same reasons

Eric Gill, as chairman of Pax, has stated the position of the Catholic C.O. in Peace News, when he declares "THE FIRST STEP TO PEACE : STOP FALSE THINKING."

It is impossible to summarise this excellent statement of the causes of war, of the duty of anti-militarists to direct their energy to the removal of the causes of war. He summarises the need to struggle towards a new social order in a neat reference to Christian tradition :—

"Were the first Christians thrown out of work because Palm Sunday was followed by Good Friday? On the contrary, their work may be said only to have begun after Easter."

We are not entering into all the conclusions drawn by Eric Gill because we believe that, although the cure for war is the abolition of capitalist or exploitative society, the immediate question upon which we have to unite is opposition to the present bloodshed. This is not the time to stress our opposition to the theological concept of the Catholic resister to war, but to insist upon our common cause. The Catholic who refuses to support war has more in common with us than the Unitarian, the Atheist, or the Socialist who does not repudiate militarism and participation in the killing of his fellow-men. Our allegiance to humanity unites us in comradeship and brotherhood with the Catholic war resister.

LABOUR PARLIAMENTARIANS AND MONARCHY

The following extract from "Labour Notes," in the Daily Record, Glasgow, for January 31, 1936, makes good reading and should be kept by Socialists for future reference :—

"Everything tends to show that the I.L.P. is becoming an East End of Glasgow Party, with most of its activities centring round the four M.P.'s and the small I.L.P. Groups in Glasgow Town Council.

"The I.L.P. Group in Glasgow Town Council did not make much impression by voting against the resolution of condolence with the Royal Family. If it was meant to be a protest against Royalty, it was badly timed, and certainly gave Treasurer Dollan an opportunity to make an effective reply against the charges of hypocrisy.

"Treasurer Dollan naturally asked what the I.L.P. M.P.'s in Parliament were doing to carry on Republican propaganda.

"On the same day that the I.L.P. Group in the Corporation were protesting against the resolution of sympathy, the I.L.P. Group in Parliament made no protest against the resolution moved by Mr. Baldwin and seconded by Mr. Attlee.

"Mr. Maxton is an astute Parliamentarian, and realised that a speech of the kind made in Glasgow Town Council would have been merely a jarring note in the House of Commons.

"UNANSWERABLE.

"Mr. Dollan's point that the I.L.P. could not have one policy in the Town Council and another in Parliament could not be answered, and his defence of the Labour Party attitude was all the stronger because it was a reasoned argument in favour of democratic institutions, and not couched in any terms of obsequious flattery of the Royal Family.

"His speech was an expression of what the majority of Socialists think should be the Labour Party's attitude towards the Monarchy.

"Mr. Gallacher, the Communist M.P., did not evidently think it worth while to oppose the vote of condolence, and, if he had, he would have been embarrassed by the fact that messages of sympathy had been sent by M. Kalinin, the President of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and by M. Molotov, its Premier.

"It seems as if the Glasgow I.L.P. Group was the only body in the country that thought it appropriate to protest."

Four years before, the Labour Correspondent of the Daily Record, reminded Campbell Stephen "that only last autumn the working-class of Camlachie were not revolutionary enough to go and vote for him." This reference is culled from the Daily Record for August 12, 1932. The writer discusses the question of Labour Party candidature against John McGovern, and adds :

"John McGovern has long been known as a fighter with little mercy for those with whom he disagrees. At the moment the vials of his wrath are being poured upon the Labour Party, but the attack loses some of its effect for those who remember that not so long ago, when a lieutenant to Guy Aldred, the anti-Parliamentary Communist, and Rationalist, he lashed and lampooned the I.L.P. with the same whole-hearted thoroughness. Shettleston will be a storm-centre."

HISTORY.

"Pax" was formed in the autumn of 1936. The association maintains that spiritual activity and personal integrity are the first means towards the removal of the causes of war. It insists that all men and women of goodwill have the duty to work actively for peace and justice; and that, meanwhile, individuals have the right to abstain, on the ground of conscience, from any sort of warlike activity.

In the spring of 1936, the Catholic Herald suggested that parents should interest their sons in the army as a career. The result was a huge correspondence, in which it was pointed out that modern warfare had become such that a Christian could be justified in refusing to take part in it. Finally, in September, 1936, Pax was organised. On Armistice day of that year, Eric Gill, as Chairman, participated in a joint pacifist demonstration with other groups in the Kingsway Hall. In 1937, the Catholic Worker helped to inaugurate Pax in New York and helped to spread the organisation throughout America.

Pax maintains the right of objection to war and conscription on moral as well as on religious grounds, and works that the time may come when the realisation of the utter unjustifiability of modern war may be so general among Christians, that war will be impossible of declaration or conduct.

BASIC PRINCIPLES.

1. The use of force for the vindication of an undoubted right is in some cases and under certain conditions allowable to men both individually and collectively.
2. But under present conditions warfare involves moral and physical evils so great as to exceed any possible legitimate gain to either side; therefore such warfare is morally unjustifiable.
3. Those who are convinced of the truth of this have the right and duty to abstain from participation in any warlike activity.

OBJECT.

To unite those who accept these principles, whether on grounds of Catholic morality, or simply of natural reason; to give support to those whose fidelity involves them in conflict with authority; to spread the traditional Catholic teaching on the nature and limits of patriotism and the just use of force; and to promote understanding and friendship between peoples and seek to remove the causes of war.

All Catholics who accept the principles of peace and anti-militarism should join Pax. Membership is not limited to Catholics. Any person over 18 years of age, of any nationality or religion, who accepts the principles and objects of the Association is eligible for membership. The minimum annual subscription is 1/- per year, payable on joining, and every January 1 thereafter. There is also a collection for working expenses taken at every meeting and local meeting. All Catholic C.O.s should join Pax and build a group in their area.

A WAR WAS FORETOLD!

Only the Camps were Different

Whenever we read denunciations of German militarism—and eulogies of French militarism—in the Northcliffe press, our interest in war literature revives for purposes of comparison. For example, there was published in 1894, in London, an interesting work for patriotic study, from the pen of William Le Queux. This work was entitled, The Great War in England in 1897. It was dedicated as follows :—

"To my friend, Alfred Charles Harmsworth, A Generous Editor and Patriotic Englishman, I inscribe this Forecast of the Coming War."

At the time of this dedication, Alfred Harmsworth was 29 years of age and Harold Harmsworth was 26. This book was intended to develop the idea of the French menace. Five years after its publication, the Daily Mail threatened to roll France in blood and mud. Anyone who doubts my word can look up the newspaper files specially stored by the British Museum at Hendon.

The preface was a very solemn affair and the story had the approval of Lord Roberts. His autograph letter was published.

The preface carried this grave warning against Britain's Ally in the Great War and ally in the present war (page 6) :—

"The extraordinary preparations now going forward in France and Russia are being made in view of an attack upon England, and it is ominous that the downfall of our Empire is a perpetual subject of discussion in the Paris Press. . . . Russia and France, both barely able to sustain their gigantic armies, are to-day straining every nerve to enlarge their naval forces, preparatory to a swift descent upon our shores."

Contrast this passage against the attacks in 1914 and to-day on Germany. We are told that militarism is peculiar to Germany and was quite foreign to France!

The story begins with a surprise declaration of war by Russia and France upon Britain, the pretext being "the durable pacification of Bosnia." There is the usual William Le Queux spy. In this case he is a wicked Russian posing as an innocent German, and living "the almost idyllic life of a careless bachelor in the Albany." This spy manages to start up the war by discovering a Secret Treaty of Alliance between England and Germany, which is nearly signed but not quite. After the bombardment of Newhaven and Brighton by the French, the invasion of Sussex by the French and Russians, and Anarchist and Socialist outbreaks all over Great Britain—for the wicked Anarchists and Socialists are pro-French in this story—there is (page 54) :

"the greatest rejoicing everywhere. . . . Germany had combined with England. . . Already the brave, well-drilled legions of Emperor William had crossed the Vosges, and passed the frontier into France. . . . How different were German methods to those of the British! With a perfect scheme of attack," etc.

To make the story good, and to curdle the readers' blood, Le Queux makes things go badly in England (Chapter xi.) :—

"Babies were murdered before the eyes of their parents, many being impaled by gleaming Russian bayonets; fathers were shot down in the presence of their wives and children, and sons were treated in a similar manner. . . . [Our italics] . . . The soldiers of the Tsar . . . jeered and laughed at piteous appeal, and with fiendish brutality enjoyed the destruction."

The wicked Russians, with whom Premier Neville Chamberlain just missed forming a war-alliance, did all these bad things in the story.

Eastbourne and Hull were savagely bombarded, but we got our own back on Marseilles and Algiers. Meantime, the great heart of America was profoundly moved (page 130) just as it is to-day, only against the Germans, whereas, in the story and in 1894, it was intended to be moved against the wicked French!

"In Wall Street . . . the struggle to invest was desperate . . . Financiers were determined to assist the greatest Power on earth; indeed, apart from the sound security offered, they felt it their duty to do so."

Imagine Wall St. with a heart! And note the shrewd touch—sound security offered! Almost 1914 and 1940! Only no security seems very sound in 1940!

But the great heart of Wall St. hesitated. The gold rush was not as great as it should be. Wall St. did not invest in time to save Birmingham, Edinburgh and London, and fighting raged in every place on the map of Britain from Land's End to John o' Groat's. The books list corps of Volunteers, and mentions hundreds of commanders by name. Ultimately the tide turned. All the invaders were killed or captured (Chapter xi.) and :—

"Paris capitulated . . . the legions of the Kaiser marched up the Boulevards with their brilliant cavalry uniforms flashing in the sun."

Here is a British journalist's picture of patriotic rejoicing at a visioned German invasion of Paris. The minds that inspired this picture are directing, to-day, war on the German legions.

We have quoted from the preface. The following further pragraph from the preface (page 8) makes most interesting reading :—

". . . To Mr. Alfred C. Harmsworth, F.R.G.S., whose suggestion prompted me to write this narrative; and to Mr. Harold Harmsworth, who on several occasions assisted me, I hereby acknowledge my thanks. While many readers will no doubt regard this book chiefly as an exciting piece of fiction, I trust that no small proportion will perceive the important lesson underlying it, for the French are laughing at us, the Russians presume to imitate us, and the Day of Reckoning is hourly advancing."

The part played by Lord Northcliffe in the last war, and the later activity of Lord Rothermere, their vigorous development of a German hate campaign, lends great interest to their share in this Anti-French narrative, and also to terms of peace with which the story concludes (pp. 326-7 ; 333) :—

"From both France and Russia, Germany demanded huge indemnities, as well as a large tract of territory in Poland, and the whole of the vast Champagne country from Givet, on the Belgian frontier to the Saone."

The British demands included, from France :—

"The cession to us of Algiers with its docks and harbours, so that we might establish another naval station in the Mediterranean, and the payment of an indemnity of £250,000,000."

From Russia was demanded :—

"The whole of that portion of the Trans-Caspian territory lying between the mouths of the Oxus and Kizil Arvat, thence along the Persian frontier to Zalifikai, along the Afghan frontier to Karki, and from there up the bank of the Oxus to the Aral Sea. . . .

"Upon these huge demands, in addition to the smaller ones by Italy and Austria, a Peace Conference was opened . . . France and her Muscovite ally, both vanquished and ruined, were compelled to accept the proposals of Britain and Germany . . . Britannia, grasping her trident again, seated herself on her shield beside the sea, Ruler of the Waves, Queen of Nations, and Empress of the World."

So if the 1897 war had come off, German invasion of France and indemnities would have been right. Also, the seizure of Poland, without any regard to Polish nationality, would have been correct in the eyes of British Imperialists! And they say that behind war is love of democracy and not Imperialist aims and ambitions.

OUR LETTER-BOX

OUR LETTER-BOX.

Dear Comrade,—The sale of the March issue of THE WORD went extremely well. It was certainly particularly interesting and informative to those who thought C.O.s were cowards and had an easy time. Furthermore, I find the library publications are exceedingly good.

With best wishes, I remain, with you in the struggle.

L. PRESCOTT.

Hampstead, N.W.3.

[*Comrade Prescott is Secretary of the Hampstead N.C.L. All North London comrades should make contact with him and help to build the movement in the North of London.—Ed.]

Dear Aldred,—My warmest good wishes are with you in your campaign against the continuance of this wretched war. There are inert forces everywhere which need rallying for an immediate constructive peace. Coventry Labour Party passed a resolution the other day urging that the continuance of the war was not in any interest of Socialism. Yet, two-thirds of Coventry industry is to keep the war going. With warmest gretings.

Yours fraternally,

RICHARD LEE.

Coventry, March 23.

[*All Glasgow comrades will remember the Rev. Richard Lee, of Ross St. Unitarian Church. He spoke at John MacLean's funeral and was a rigorous defender of public liberties and the worker's struggle. Richard Lee twice defended the God-idea in debates with the editor at Ross St. Church. He is now minister (Unitarian) of the Great Meeting House, Coventry.—Ed.]

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Thank you for sending me a copy of THE WORD, containing Bishop Barnes' statement. I was very glad to have that; the Daily Press miss things of that nature. The front page of this particular issue of THE WORD is interesting also. Alfred Taylor (whose portrait you publish) I know quite well. I have heard something of the story you relate from him. Two of my present deacons were in Dartmoor during the last war.

Officially, the churches stand where they stood then; but within them, as without, the pacifist movement has grown considerably, and will grow. The full meaning of pacifism and all it involves will grow too.

With my good-wish,

E. J. KELLY WRIGHT.

[*The Rev. E. J. Kelly Wright is minister of the Lower Edmonton Independent (Congregational) Church. He has been doing splendid work for pacifism and anti-militarism.—Ed.]

Dear Guy Aldred,—You will not remember me—but as a C.O. in the last war, I knew of your stand and greatly admired your courage—without, of course, subscribing to your ideas in full.

I am delighted to see that you are "still going strong" and congratulate you for your admirable work for the C.O.s of to-day. My friend, Joseph McGlinchey, spoke of you a few years back (he was I believe associated with you in some fight for free speech in Glasgow)—otherwise it takes a major war to bring your work to my notice it would seem!

All the best to you.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Comrade,—Thanks for THE WORD. Please send 18 copies and excuse such dribblet orders. I believe you came out 21 years ago to-day, same as myself. Many happy anniversaries and all good wishes.

Yours sincerely,

ERNEST H. FLETCHER.

Birmingham, 28, 8/4/40.

Dear Sirs,—From time to time in PEACE NEWS, I see advertisements of Guy Aldred's writings. I think I used to hear G.A. breaking the peace of C. 3 Wandsworth during the period of 20 months that I occupied C. 3, 13.

Yours faithfully,

STEPHEN WARD.

Bude, April 4, 1940.

Dear Comrade,—I attended Mr. Aldred's lectures at Friar's Hall (Blackfriar's Road, London, S.E.) and had the pleasure of a chat re. Bakunin's Communism and The State, which I suspect has not been published yet. I still have a copy of Guy Aldred's Socialism and War (1915), which I bought with several other booklets from the old SPUR office, Shepherd's Bush. Since 1914, I have never deviated from an anti-Militarist and Socialist ideology, etc., which I owe more to THE SPUR than to any other paper.

Best wishes to all comrades.

Yours fraternally,

ROBERT CHAPMAN.

EXEMPTING CONSCIENCE, 1916!

(Reprinted from "The Spur," April, 1916)

Chairman C. E. Bovill, of the Chiswick Tribunal, is a well-known local Tory politician. He believes that, whether an exemption is granted or refused, the applicant's name should be published in the press. Which is reasonable and just. But he does not believe that the public should be permitted to see him at a disadvantage in any battle of wits. Which is bourgeois morality, worthy of a civic hero of Chiswick and chairman of its military service tribunal.

On Thursday, March 2nd, 1916, we conducted an application for total exemption on conscientious grounds before this body. When the case was called, the chairman objected to the applicant being represented and ordered us to the back of the Court. We cited the regulations and maintained our ground to the discomfiture of Bovill, who had to retreat ungracefully. He then menaced the applicant with the statement: "Of course, you place your case entirely in this individual's hands." The applicant's assent again defeated him. So, with a last valorous effort, Bovill turned to us, challenging our credentials, and remarking: "You were imprisoned for Indian disturbances some years ago." We mildly suggested that he was wrong. Whereupon an apology almost escaped him, and he modified his bluster to say: "So you are not that person." He checked himself, as though all the future was uncertain in his sight, and the ground was slipping from beneath his feet. We came to his rescue with the quiet insinuation: "But if you mean, did I champion the Indian free press in this country in 1909, and receive imprisonment for the political offence of sedition—yes! That is quite different from Indian disturbances." Bovill brightened. He was reassured of his ground. A hurried, "Ah yes, you suffered the penalty," was his ejaculation of his delight. Then he looked at his dumbfounded colleagues who had said nothing. He gazed at the silent military representative. He withered the speechless and unoffending public. He scorned applicant and representative, who were waiting with patience his pleasure. And he turned to the soldier-guard and in his best martial law manner, ordered the Court to be cleared. We wonder why? And we wonder whether the regulations were designed to condone such autocratic insolence?

The Court was cleared but the press did not retire. At least, the Chiswick Times was able to report with fair accuracy, the "private proceedings" which followed. It said not a word about the chairman's preliminary misconduct. But then Bovill is its pride and glory, and it does not wish to record too faithfully all his weaknesses, even though he exhibit them in public. Similarly, it did not record the absurd decision he uttered on behalf of the tribunal: "The application is refused because we cannot decide what constitutes a conscientious objection." Nevertheless, the report that it did publish is evidence that the exemption should have been granted.

This account was published in the Chiswick Times for Friday, March 3rd, under the caption "Opposed to War":—

> "A manager of a picture theatre, aged 25, appealed on the ground that he was 'opposed to assisting warfare in any way whatever,' and that he was the only support of his widowed mother.
>
> "He was accompanied by a friend, Mr. Guy Aldred, editor of the Spur.
>
> "Applicant, in answer to the chairman, said if it was shown his mother would, with a lodger, get 41/- a week and would suffer a pecuniary loss of only 5/- a week, he would be still unwilling to go.
>
> "Dealing with his conscientious objection, applicant held that warfare was inconsistent with civilisation. He began to hold those views about five or six years ago.
> "Applicant desired that Mr. Aldred be allowed to answer the question as to why he thought war was wrong, but the Chairman said they must have applicant's personal views.
> "Aplicant said warfare did not benefit mankind, and had never accomplished what it set out to do—the ending of all wars.
>
> "By Mr. Ward: He obtained his views by reading of the Boer war.
>
> "By Mr. Mason: He was an agnostic, and did not know whether there was a God or not.
>
> "Speaking for the applicant, Mr. Aldred said he had not merely a moral conviction that killing was wrong, but also the militarism which caused it. That was a deep feeling and inspired his whole life. He objected to 'feeding' the war as a non-combatant.
> "The tribunal rejected the appeal."

Our Comrade, John Stubbings, made a fine show at the Southall tribunal on Wednesday, March 1st, 1916. The tribunal sat in the Council Chamber, of the local Town Hall, and Stubbings was kept waiting two hours outside in the cold before his case was called. He was told then to remember the time, to which he tartly replied that he had been remembering the time for the last two hours. After he had explained that he declined to take the military oath, one of the members of the tribunal asked if he had been attested!! Another member enquired if Stubbings was not the sole support of his widowed mother. To this he assented, but stated that he had no intention of urging that excuse, as he claimed total exemption on the ground of his moral convictions, and had no intention of aiding the war under any circumstances.

Councillor J. Culley, J.P., presided over the hearing, which was reported in the Southall—Norwood Gazette for March 3rd, 1916. Stubbings is a striker, but our contemporary calls him a blacksmith, and reports his case as follows, under the heading "Claimed the right to decide for himself":—

> "Appearing before the Tribunal, he said that during a sojourn in America, in a different environment, he had developed ideas that were possibly extreme or advanced. What he was going to say might surpise, in fact, it might shock them. As an individual he claimed the right to decide for himself whether he should be a soldier or not; and denied the right of any Tribunal or any State to decide what he should do. Therefore the decision, so far as he was concerned as an individual, as to whether he should be a soldier or not, had already been decided by him. He had been a law abiding citizen all his life, but when the law of any country said that he must be a soldier, then he had to go against the law. To come to the point of conscientious objection, he was absolutely against militarism, and his conscience would not allow him to take the military oath. 'It amounts to this,' concluded applicant dramatically, 'I absolutely refuse to thrust a bayonet into the breast of your sister's brother, and refuse to butcher your little boy's father. That is my position.'
> "The Chairman: What would happen if the German reached these shores—which they would have had it not been for the men 'out there' and the Navy—and did the same to your mother and sister, that they have done to the women of Belguim? Would you take up arms?
> "Applicant: That all depends on the circumstances. If I saw a man, whether German or of any other nationality, doing as you suggest, or doing violence in any shape or form, I should certainly protect them, and if it came to that point when there was no other alternative, then I should kill him. But it would not be premeditated killing on my part.
> "The Chairman: Have you any objection to non-combatant service?
>
> "Applicant: I have no objection to doing anything for the community; I don't care what it is. But the moment I take that military oath the military authorities have the right, because of that, to do what they like with me. You may say what about the R.A.M.C. Well, I am willing to go and face bullets with any other man, but not under the military oath. I don't take that military oath!
> "Recommended for non-combatant service."

Several claims for total exemption on conscientious grounds were rejected by the Hammersmith Tribunal on Tuesday, March 7th, 1916. John Adam Bispham made a strong stand and was refused because he offended his judges by his straight answers. Alfred Stanley Hughes was denied all opportunity of stating a case. When he retired the following conversation took place:

TRIBUNE PASCAL: Disreputable-looking fellow!

THE MAYOR: Oh! the Army will soon improve him. Claim disallowed!

Thus he was judged not by his claim, but by his looks.

Sidney Levet Reed claimed absolute exemption and declined to consider non-combatant service. He holds the Royal Humane Society's certificate for life-saving, but was told by Colonel Davies that he was trying to save his skin!

William George Dean reminded one of the recruiting posters, when he objected on conscientious grounds. He said that the country did not want him when he was out of work before the war started; and his conscience was such that he refused to help the Government which had failed to help him. This challenge to its class conscience greatly offended Hammersmith's proud body of patriots. None of these gentlemen knows the meaning of class or even self-interest! Oh dear no!

The most interesting case of all was that of William Richard Neil, music editor and publisher, of 46 Wormholt Road, Shepherd's Bush. His case came on at 9.5 p.m.

Neil claimed total exemption from the undertaking of military, auxiliary, or other service to the nation, beyond that of loyally obeying ordinary social duty—which did not interfere with the free exercise of concsience—and fulfilling his present appointed task, useful only from a commercial or economic point-of-view.

As reasons in support of his claim, he urged sincere moral convictions, definable only by actions, as to the wrongness of the intentional infliction of pain, distress, or death, on our fellow-beings, and, consequently, of all war.

In support of this claim, the applicant trespassed on the committee's time with a short statement of his fundamental objections to war, no matter for what purpose it was waged. He wished to help the country in every possible way, but those ways had to be in complete harmony with his moral view of life and its duties. He recognised that the State had a claim upon the individual, but that claim was not absolute. With every thinking man, there was a sense of right and wrong, which he had to follow, no matter what the consequences. He proved his loyalty to conscience and country by pursuing his normal occupation. He advanced his claim, not to avoid danger, but simply to testify to his beliefs. He was not such a hypocrite as to accept non-combatant service.

Questioned by the tribunal, our Comrade stated that these views first occurred to him from the study of history at school. He could not understand how, at one time, the French were our enemies, then our Allies; the Russians our enemies, then our Allies; and later, even the Irish! Since his school days, the study of humanist ethics and comparative religion—that was, accepting the good and rejecting the bad in all—convinced him that, if war was wrong from a political point-of-view, it was a thousand times more so from a moral point-of-view. He belonged to no religious society and his beliefs were quite individual. He believed in saving life, but was unwilling to join the R.A.M.C. That body was part of the military machine and its fundamental purpose was to keep the firing line in as fit a condition as possible. In the exercise of pity for suffering, he could not discriminate between civilian and soldier. The R.A.M.C. existed solely for the soldier. He was too young to have much power, but he followed his principles in business as far as he was able.

Although both Colonel Davies and the Chairman admitted that Neil stated his position very well, this did not prevent members of the tribunal attempting insult and bullying. Referring to the applicant's case for his normal occupation, one member exclaimed: "A nice soft job!" The Mayor said: "I suppose you prefer to stay at home and to give advice!" And the military representative attempted the feeble witticism: "Wouldn't you like to go to the trenches and play tunes?"

When the applicant had retired for the tribunal to consider its verdict, the following discussion and scene occurred :—

CHAIRMAN : Any proposition, gentlemen?

MEMBER : I think this man has made a clear case for exemption.

2nd MEMBER : I second that.

3rd MEMBER : I say the usual—non-combatant.

Disagreement and discussion ensued, ending with a member saying : "I think this man has made his case out for exemption very well indeed." To which the chairman said : "We are not able to give exemptions."

VOICE FROM GALLERY : Why not, Mr. Chairman? Why don't you administer the Act properly? Just as in the case of that chemist! His business is of more importance than your pub! The Government have recognised conscience, but you do not.

Other voices joined in the protest, and a member of the tribunal said : "I propose that we clear the Court, Mr. Chairman." Another member of the tribunal dissented.

VOICE : I think, Mr. Chairman, that the onus of clearing the Court rests with the applicant. You have no power to do so.

Uproar, above which Chairman exclaimed : "Clear the Court!"

The applicant was summoned to enter. Five members of the tribunal were leaving.

CHAIRMAN : Please stop to finish the cases.

MEMBERS LEAVING : Non-combatant.

Applicant was asked to retire again. He was summoned again.

CHAIRMAN : What case is this?

The clerk explained.

CHAIRMAN : Oh! yes. Mr. Neil, the Committee has given careful consideration to your application, and recommend you for non-combatant service.

APPLICANT : I am sorry I cannot accept your decision. May I ask on what grounds my claim for absolute exemption is refused, or whether it is necessary to state this on the Appeal form?

CHAIRMAN : "I have given you the grounds. There is no need to mention it on the Appeal form, which you will get as you go out.

CLIFFORD ALLEN AND CONSCRIPTION

Clifford Allen was Chairman of the No-Conscription Fellowship from 1915 to 1919. We never approved entirely of his enjoyment of this position. When he died a year ago, as Lord Allen of Hurtwood, Barratt Brown wrote of his loss at a time of "revival of military conscription" and "his personal pacifism" and "abhorrence of conscription." We think the eulogy undeserved and false to the history of the working-class struggle.

Barratt Brown wrote in the Peace News for June 16, 1939 :—

"His (Clifford Allen's) chairmanship, indeed, of the N.C.F. during the War, of the I.L.P. in the years after the War, and of the Next Five Years Group more recently, was a signal illustration of the pacifist faith in which he lived."

Clifford Allen's pacifist faith is a legend, manufactured by a section of the I.L.P. and the old N.C.F. It has no foundation in fact. Clifford Allen's pacifism was a sandwich of anti-militarist protest between two expressions of militarism.

Under the heading, "THE 'DAILY CITIZEN,'" the Forward, for February 21, 1925, published the following letter from Clifford Allen :—

"70 Overstrand Mansions,
Prince of Wales Road,
Battersea, S.W.

"Dear Comrade,—My name crept into your columns last week in connection with the early history of the Daily Herald. You stated :

'It may be quite true to say as Clifford Allen has said that the floating of the Daily Herald while the Daily Citizen was being contemplated helped to kill the Citizen, while it may be said also that the Daily Citizen, with its advocacy of war, deserved to die.'

"I doubt whether you were thinking very clearly when you wrote that. It was the Labour Party which advocated the war; its daily paper naturally followed loyally instead of bitter competition. If the Citizen had lived Labour would never have had to struggle so painfully and at such an enormous financial cost to the successful establishment of one daily paper—a miracle which has yet to be performed.—Yours, sincerely,

"CLIFFORD ALLEN."

In this letter, Clifford Allen defends the war-mongering policy pursued by the Daily Citizen under his editorship. Its recruiting was notorious and its militarism as of a most rabid type. If any reader doubts this fact, we are prepared to adduce overwhelming evidence. It cannot be doubted that this activity contributed to the world war and to the present situation. When economic conscripts were being recruited, Clifford Allen assisted the recruiting. This activity was exposed by us at the time in the columns of The Herald of Revolt.

That this is not our isolated or extremist opinion is proven by Emrys Hughes' comment on Allen's letter, published in the Forward quoted :—

"It may be that we were not 'thinking very clearly,' but we do not see what earthly purpose is to be served now by still weeping salt and bitter tears about the Daily Citizen.

"When the Daily Citizen passed out of existence in 1915, Johnston in Forward echoed the opinions of a good many of its Socialist readers when he referred to its death as a 'fitting climax' to the 'steadily increasing volume of disrespect in which the Daily Citizen was being regarded by those whose enthusiasm and energies and sacrifices caused its birth.'

"One is loth to resurrect controversies which one thought were better dead and buried long ago, but a good deal could be said about the Daily Citizen in justification of the reference in last week's Forward.—E. H."

When the Honours List was published on January 1, 1932, it included the name of Clifford Allen, upon whom the King graciously had been pleased to confer a peerage for "political and public service." Allen could not have received this honour for his conscientious objection to war or for his fifteen-months imprisonment. It could not have been for his chairmanship of the Independent Labour Party, 1922-23. The truth is, Allen dropped out of public life entirely for a time; but, when Ramsay MacDonald decided to become the "Socialist" leader of the Conservative Government, he addressed letters to the London Times, in support of MacDonald's attitude. This letter was used to prove that the Government enjoyed working-class support. If one believes that Ramsay MacDonald, first as Labour Premier, and later as Tory Premier, contributed to destruction of German democracy, and so prepared the way for Fascism and war, one can hardly salute the memory of Lord Allen as being that of a consistent pacifist.

Within a fortnight of being made a peer, Clifford Allen published, through George Allen and Unwin, at 1/-, his pamphlet, Labour's Future at Stake. This pamphlet defended MacDonald by accusing the Labour Government of subservience to financiers and bankers and the gold standard. It sought to bring about the closest co-operation between the rank and file of the Labour Party and British Imperialism, in the struggle against the workers and peasants of India, and the mobilisation of a new war.

It is possible to cite Clifford Allen's speeches to prove that he supported Imperialism after his elevation to the peerage. Barratt Brown laments Allen's support of the policy of "collective security" but adds :—

"But we recognised the sincerity and honesty of his mind, and we admired the courage with which he faced, again and again, misunderstanding and loneliness of spirit."

Brown eulogises Clifford Allen for being an Absolutist and refusing to accept exemption "conditional on doing work of national importance." This attitude is right enough but it may mean only that Allen considered such exemption an insult to himself, because of his intellectual and petty bourgeois status. His absolutism should have operated when he was publishing military recruiting advertisements prior to the Great War : and it should have operated to prevent him from paying the price for his peerage, support of the policy leading to war in Europe and the world ; leading to conscription for the second generation. Historically analysed, and although he avowed it very boldly in the pages of Debrett, Clifford Allen's Absolutism seems a very shady expression of conscience. Can it be said that his conduct, either before or after, squared with the brave and true words of his presidential address to the N.C.F., uttered in November, 1915? We reproduce them for all to read :—

"The members of the No Conscription Fellowship base their fundamental objection to conscription on this ground : that whatever else a State may or may not do, whatever infringement of individual liberty a State may or may not effect, there is one interference with individual judgment that no State in the world has any sanction to enforce—that is, to tamper with the unfettered free right of every man to decide for himself the issue of life and death. We contend that the individual conscience alone must decide whether a man will sacrifice his own life or inflict death upon other people in time of war, and that however far the State may impose its commands upon the will of the community, the right of private judgment in this particular case must be left to the individual, since human personality is a thing which must be held as sacred."

The man who uttered these words went to prison for resisting conscription, it is true. But later, he accepted a peerage for building the Government that introduced the second Great War and pioneered it with conscription. Sincerity and conscience, forsooth!

TAVISTOCK PEACE MEETINGS:
Impressions

We shall deal with the Glasgow and other meetings in the June issue. Several complaints have been received that Lord Tavistock favours the Hitler persecution or defends it too much. We believe in the fullest discussion of such charges. Meanwhile we publish three letters, dealing with other matters also, but giving impressions of the London meeting.

Dear Guy,—Many thanks for your pamphlets. I have read them both with deep interest, especially Historical and Traditional Christianity. It is a real pleasure to be able to turn to such writings as a diversion from war reactions. I was impressed by your political development from Boy Preacher to Anarchist and the way in which you broke with your theological training. Dogmas Discarded! More power to your pen to help mankind discard even greater dogmas that confront the people to-day.

I have spoken with Comrade Davis of Shoreditch and I can reaffirm your opinion that he has been ill-advised. He is earnest in his Christian beliefs and wishes to stand by them in this time of war. His appeal has been lodged just in time and I have assured him of our solidarity.

I attended Lord Tavistock's peace meeting at the Kingsway Hall. I was puzzled frankly by the whole tone of the meeting. The meeting reeked with propaganda for the British People's Party, an obviously camouflaged Fascist movement. I recognised several known Fascist supporters as stewards. I repeat, with emphasis, my opinion, that Tavistock is not all that he appears to represent. If ever I heard whitewashing of Hitler, it was by him. Even when he regretted the brutalities of Nazism he still had some justification for such acts. His argument was simply this: "Please accept Hitler's word, for I know he is so sincere." When one thinks of the bodies of the Spanish people, murdered by Hitler's bombs, one asks: "What is sincerity?"

I support every genuine peace lover but I cannot support rabid nationalism: and nationalism is the basis of Tavistock's peace policy. I appreciate his class position and do not expect him to become a Socialist. Indirectly, by supporting Tavistock, I must support a potential Fascist movement, with which he is so intimately connected. That is the difficulty.

If you could have heard those who cheered Tavistock most, shouting: "Jews' War," "Down with Jews," etc., you would understand my opposition to Tavistock, apart from the deeper class struggle that exists between wealth and poverty. Tavistock uttered no word of protest against these Anti-Jewish shouts. Had you witnessed these scenes, you would have asked yourself: "Do these people really believe in peace and individual freedom, or are they merely anti-war because of racial hatred?"

You will understand that I do not analyse Tavistock's activity purely from a racial angle, but I feel and fear that hypocrisy is parading around in the masque of liberty.

John McGovern spoke well and to the point, though I should have liked to have heard from him the real Socialist message. His recitation of "Two Babes were Born" was grand and eloquent and deserves praise. But even McGovern failed to declare that whilst one opposed British and French Imperialism, one must oppose also German Imperialism, no matter what form it takes.

Did McGovern deliberately withhold his voice on the true nature of Hitlerism?

Unless Anti-War agitation is true and honest in every way, it must develop into open or concealed nationalistic propaganda. Hoping you are as virile as ever.

Yours for Socialism,
ALEC KAYE.

Stepney, London, E.1., 4/4/1940.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I have read Historical and Traditional Christianity and Dogmas Discarded. I think your sermons, written when you were only sixteen, very remarkable indeed. The first two paragraphs on page 40 of Dogmas Discarded, especially the words: "Jesus filled the world with compassion and the Christian ages have filled the world with passion. Creed and greed where Jesus taught and exuded love—whimsical, smiling, understanding," will never perish.

It is a curious coincidence that I, too, was only sixteen (I was born in Florence on February 3rd, 1887) when I addressed an "open letter to the mothers of the world" on the issue of peace and war and sent it for publication to the Editor of Il tranvia, a Milan weekly for young people. It was not published, though a short story by my pen had appeared in that paper a few months previously. I regret it was not returned to me as I had not kept a copy. Both the "story" and the "open letter" would make interesting reading to-day. I must tell you also that, as in your case, Theodore Parker has always appealed to me more than Martineau, and I am particularly attached to Parker's "O Thou great Friend to all the sons of men."

What a remarkable and lovable man George Martin must have been, or must be if still alive!

And now I must tell you something that will interest you. Last evening I went to the Kingsway Hall to hear Lord Tavistock and John McGovern. If the meeting over which you presided at Glasgow was as successful as last night's you had a gratifying experience. Lord Tavistock's speech was largely a repetition of the events already made public through his recent book, but I thought he was more quietly effective in his replies to questions. It has been said that the gifts of speech and of the pen are seldom found in the same person; nevertheless, Lord Tavistock stated his case very clearly if not over eloquently. There were frequent interruptions during his speech and when Mr. Williamson was speaking, but only rapt attention when Mr. McGovern was giving the Government what for! I am serious when I say that if that fearless man McGovern could broadcast to the nation and to the Forces what he told the meeting last night, and could communicate to his unseen audience his obvious sincerity, the war would stop the following day. A woman sitting near me was crying during part of his speech and saying: "Go on, brother." It was a great performance and a very effective, if brief, peroration: "End this war before it ends you!"

It all made me feel that I was not doing enough to cause sanity to prevail and peace to be restored—not, as you stated in a recent letter, "a dead capitalist peace, but a state out of which we can evolve a condition of social harmony."

Best wishes.

Yours truly,
GUY FANANI.

Welling, Kent, April 4.

Dear Comrade,—I appreciate very much the privilege of reading the first half of your autibiography. It makes my brain reel to think of anyone thinking so clearly and cleavingly. My sister sympathises deeply with your struggle with Anglicanism. For my own part may I say that if you will, you can be made the instrument of still more wonderful works if you will cast yourself completely on the All High. That reminds one of a Revival Meeting, but it came to me.

My sister says I ought to tell you of Lord Tavistock's Meeting. Considering the nature of the propaganda it went off well. Interruptions were somehow managed so beautifully that they melted into the general buzz. The hall was almost full. A friend told me she had never heard three more magnificent speeches in her life. Some men in khaki, and people from almost all walks of life were there, and of course Mr. McGovern and Sir H. Roberton reduced us to almost tearful mirth. I suppose there wont be any mis-statements in the reports, as there was hardly anything which could be misconstrued.

Yours fraternally,
A. W. MACKEY.

Minister—Rev. RICHARD LEE, M.A.

A Centre of Culture and of Anti-Militarist and Anti-War Christianity.

In his April message, Mr. Lee says:—

"Dr. A. D. Beldon, late of Whitefield's Tabernacle, London, is spending his whole mind and strength on a new effort to unite the whole Christian Church in a ban against war. At such a time as this when Christian nations are bent on war and claim to be carrying out the will of their peoples and the will of God, to ask for a ban on war may seem the most fatuous and futile idealism.

"But Dr. Beldon puts forward some considerations which should not be ignored by thoughtful Christian people. Let me state some of them.

"1. War is a deadly sin against the body of Christ. It is the tragic failure of love which marks the wholesale defeat of the Christ.

"The sorry spectacle of the finest scholars in Europe issuing manifestoes in favour of war and claiming God on their side brings Christianity into contempt.

"2. The Anglican Church in 1938 repudiated war as unchristian. The Roman Catholic Church bases its attitude to war on St. Thomas Aquinas' dictum:—

"'War is legitimate when the vital interests of a community can be defended in no other way.'

Many Catholic Scholars point out that modern war may destroy a community altogether and other ways are open, if all have the courage to try them.

"3. The whole Church should give moral direction to its members in this matter of breaking the body of Christ. Individual protests against war is of little effect.

"The official action of the whole of the Churches could make war impossible and point the way to a peace of justice and love.

"This is Dr. Beldon's idea. He is commending it to some great personages in the Christian Church. It is something which ought to be possible if the Churches were really Christian. But I am not sure that there are leaders who can make the scheme effectual.

"A movement among the rank and file is needed. The Christians of Germany, if they were alive, could curb Hitler.

"If the Christians of Britain were alive they would leaven the world with that spiritual power which alone can destroy evil things. And outside Christianity there are forces waiting for the redeeming advent of the Spirit of Man."

During April, Mr. Lee lectured on Theism, Pantheism, and Deism. He discussed also Sir Richard Acland's Unser Kampf and The Whip of Small Cords, reviewed in the March Word.

Mr. Lee is a member of the Coventry Labour Party, and also Chairman of the Coventry Council Educational Committee. The Coventry Labour Party is opposed to the war.

"EARTH SHALL BE FAIR"

"ALL HER FOLKS SHALL BE ONE"

Sir Hugh Roberton's Vision of Harmony

HEROIC CLACTON WOMEN BY THEIR WARTIME CONDUCT PROMISE THAT THIS DREAM SHALL COME TRUE.

Two months have passed since the Glasgow Orpheus Choir, created and conducted by Sir Hugh Roberton, sung in the Queen's Hall, London, to Gustav Holst's setting, Clifford Bax's magnificent challenge to a war-mad and war-weary world: "Earth shall be fair and all her folk be One."

Hearken to the words:—

"Turn back, O man, forswear thy foolish ways,
Old now is Earth, and none may count her days,
Yet thou, her child, whose head is crowned with flame
Still wilt not hear thine inner God proclaim:
'Turn back, O man, forswear thy foolish ways!'
"Earth might be fair and all men glad and wise,
Age after age their tragic empires rise.
Built while they dream, and in that dreaming weep.
Would man but wake from out his haunted sleep—
Earth might be fair and all men glad and wise.
"Earth shall be fair, and all her people one,
Nor till that hour shall God's whole will be done.
Now, even now, once more from earth to sky,
Peals forth in joy man's old undaunted cry:
'Earth shall be fair and all her folk be One!'"

Attached to the program was Sir Hugh Roberton's foreword. Looking through the clouds of war, and visioning the final loyalties of mankind, Sir Hugh Roberton declares:—

"To say that work of our kind is more than ever necessary at a time such as this, is to say the obvious. What is of artistic or of spiritual portent in our community cannot be allowed to die. We look back on the Elizabethan age and we see what? We see the Armada almost as a mirage; but the names of the giants of literature and of music, the greatest flowering of the spirit in our history, shine and continue to shine to-day with undimmed lustre.

"The implication of this must be faced if there is ever to be a new world, a world fashioned more closely to the heart's desire. And the implication is clear. Out of the seeming impermanence of thought—whether the thought be musical, literary, religious, philosophical or from any other source that seemeth good—comes forth the only permanence that finally counts in the tradition of a race or of a nation.

"The poet strikes fire from words and that fire flames down the ages. The true song is born and not all the powers nor principalities that ever were, or ever shall be can deprive it of life. These with other inspired creations form the intangible permanence of life."

Mrs. Molly Jeffrey is a soldier's wife. She lives at Clacton-on-Sea. Probably she has never read Clifford Bax's poem. Most likely she has not been to the Queen's Hall nor read Sir Hugh Roberton's foreword to the program. But in her soul she listens to the words: "Earth Shall Be Fair." They are the theme words of her life. She is a brave and simple woman, a pioneer of nobler days. On Sunday, May 5, she put flowers on the graves of the four Clacton-crash German airmen.

Her husband has been a soldier for 15 years, and has just been invalided home from France.

Her mother, Mrs. Harry Coppin, is also a soldier's wife,. And she also went to the funeral of the four Germans.

This is what Mrs. Coppin said to the Daily Express reporter on Sunday, by the enemy graveside:—

"There are five Coppins fighting for Britain at the moment. I wonder if those who criticise us are doing their bit as well as that.

"Our thoughts in going to the funeral were that, if any of our boys were killed in Germany, we would all feel a little better for knowing that some one, even if they were Germans, had enough sympathy to lay a few flowers on their graves."

"Earth shall be fair," because so much human understanding and sympathy with humanity is expressed so bravely, and so disinterestedly, by simple folk like Mrs. Coppin and Mrs. Jeffrey in war-time. They redeemed the world from the horror of its bloodshed.

When the German bomber crashed and blew up, two people were killed and more than 150 were injured.

More than 200 people went to the funeral of the German bomber's crew—the women who put flowers on the graves, the women who criticised them.

When children sent by their parents were putting flowers on the graves a women called out:

"Disgraceful! Disgraceful! Fancy sending little children with flowers when these Germans might have killed them!"

One of the women who put flowers on the graves, Mrs. Violet Scuffins, of Clacton, explained the incident to the reporter. She said:—

"I turned round and told the woman that she ought to have more charity. I said: 'I want to bring my children up to love, not to hate.'

"I had a brother killed in the last war, and my mother died soon after from a broken heart. I have a boy of 12 and a girl of 5, and I want to bring them up with a little mercy and charity in their hearts."

The attitude of Mrs. Violet Scuffins is a promise that war shall cease and that the earth shall be fair. Another brave and understanding woman, another pioneer of human peace and brotherhood.

Such understanding is not one-sided, otherwise the promise would be worthless. In the House of Commons, on Wednesday, March 13, John M'Govern referred to the rescue of Squadron-Leader Farquhar, at Berwick, by German airmen, when he brought down his third enemy plane.

John M'Govern asked the Air Minister why the Press had been refused permission to disclose the full story of the rescue, and why the German airmen had not been allowed to receive public credit for their humane act.

He also asked if the Minister would see that, in future, brave as well as brutal acts of Germans were published.

Sir Kingsley Wood—Details of the recent action to which Mr. M'Govern refers were limited only by security considerations.

John M'Govern—Can the Minister state why the fact that two German airmen rescued this British officer was not published? Is he aware that the Daily Mail, on February 23, having published the story in its first edition, was compelled to delete it? Is it in the interests of this country that we should refuse to acknowledge brave acts carried out by Germans while we are condemning brutal acts? Surely there is nothing to be gained by the suppression of this humane act?

Sir Kingsley Wood—Certainly not on general grounds, but in this case there were security questions involved.

John M'Govern—If the place was allowed to be stated and the type of machine and everything connected with it, can the Secretary for Air state what security reasons prevented the story from being told?

Sir Kingsley Wood—No. I cannot. There are considerations other than those which Mr. M'Govern mentions.

John M'Govern—It is a shocking thing, and pure humbug.

The fact remains: German airmen bravely rescued a fearless British officer who had destroyed German machines; soldiers' wives at Clacton-on-Sea honour enemy airmen.

"Earth shall be fair, and all her folk be one.

Fascisms, nationalisms, wars shall cease. Brotherhood and democracy shall prevail. Militarism is transient; brotherhood and democracy are fundamental and eternal.

SIR JOHN ANDERSON

Sir John Anderson is a Scot. He is one of the few men who have attained Cabinet rank directly from the Civil Service. This is hardly a sign of constitutional democracy. It does not follow that he will abuse his powers. Because the Labour Leaders in the new National Government have evolved from Trades Unionism and the Labour movement, it does not follow that they are the born champions of democracy. We state facts and draw no immediate deductions.

Sir John Anderson was born at Eskbank, Midlothian, in 1882. He was educated at George Watson's, Edinburgh University, and Leipzig. Mathematics was his special study. He entered the Colonial Office in 1905. When Sir Walter Strickland wrote to us about him in 1917, on his appointment as Governor of Ceylon, and Dr. G. B. Clarke quoted him at length, in connection with the Ceylon atrocities committed under the former Governor, Sir Robert Chalmers, who was recalled, we never expected we would live to see him Minister of Home Security and Home Secretary in Great Britain.

Sir John Anderson was Under-Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland during "the troubles." Experience of gunmen and despotic government are not valuable democratic introductions. In 1932, he became Governor of Bengal. Here he was shot at three times during his first two years of office. He showed commonsense, humour, and good nature. For he pardoned one of his assailants on condition that he completed his education in Britain. It should be explained that his 1917 report on Ceylon did not spare the administration and was a very frank statement of fact.

Sir John Anderson entered politics at home as member for the Scottish Universities in 1938. He became Lord Privy Seal almost immediately. He is wanting in democratic preparation and has been trained rather to serve the state in times of crisis. The State is one thing: the people, properly and socially so-called, is another proposition. The State speaks with authority, for that is its native tongue. Except when cajoled, blinded, and deceived, the people think in the terms of liberty. It is very hard for the civil servant to understand the voice of the people. It is doubly hard in war-time. The task is not impossible. Is Sir John Anderson equal to it?

Three months ago, Sir John Anderson's now-Cabinet colleague, Minister for Labour Ernest Bevin, was commended in a Daily Express editorial for standing against the compulsion for which Sir John Anderson then colleagues stood. Said the Daily Express:—

> "Mr. Ernest Bevin protests against the growing spirit of compulsion. He says that if the Government invade the liberties of the people, he will lead the movement to resist them . . . He is right to fight for the liberties of the people."

THE MILITARY CELL

[Mr. Stanley, the ex-Secretary for War, stated in Parliament that military detention was less punishment than ordinary imprisonment. This essay, written by the Editor, appeared in The Spur, August, 1916.]

"Hell from beneath is moved for thee to meet thee at thy coming."—Isaiah xiv., 9.

I have been in three types of Military cell lately. One was a detention room, intended to contain four remand prisoners. Another, similar type, half the size or less, was used for a prisoner sentenced to small punishment. These were backwoodsmen's affairs, wooden floored, zinc walled, primitively ventilated and narrow windowed, with only a little of that opened. Then I have been in the finely constructed, large and well-barred though widely opening windowed, stone-walled, iron-gated and iron-doored cell of the military detention barracks.

I have seen men verging on madness after a few days detention in the second and third types of cell. I have been near to men who have tried to shoot, to drown, to knife themselves to escape the solitude of such incarceration. And I have pondered, and marvelled, and understood. I have seen clearly that, in Christian civilisation the Galilean has failed to conquer, and that Cæsar and his lust still rule the hearts of men and corrupt their understandings.

Were Cæsar's dominion dead, the cell would not exist. That is a truism. But the Imperial Tyranny could not last a day longer had but Cæsar's victims the power to gather strength in the cell. In this supreme test of soul, they fail; and, because of their failure, madness rules this chaos termed human society because of its unreasoning and unquestioning animal brutality.

The slave complements the master, and is but the same monster suffering evil fortune. Condemned to the sordid association of collective work in the prison yard, I have seen hireling taskmaster and hireling, victim, sergeant warder, and soldier prisoner, meet cheerfully and merrily on the common platform of filthy talk, worthless morality, and bottomless depravity of vision. My soul has revolted. These men chant psalms in church; and, being prisoners, mumble prayers in their cells, until the dirge drives some silent neighbour to distressful despair. How I have longed to escape their society; and, with the Psalmist they cite without understanding, exclaim, "So I have gave them up to their own heart's lust: and they walked in their own counsels" (Pr. lxxxi. 12). How I have longed to escape with my criminal task to the solitude of my cell."

Given idleness, no books to read, nothing to write on or with, denied labour and exercise, I have preferred the cell to the barrack yard. Here I experience freedom, which, outside, I cannot enjoy. I discover calm, self-discipline, joyous self-communion. I sorrow deeply with Jesus at the world, and weep with impotence, truly; but I feel a greater at-one-ness with the splendid serenity of Gautama's magnificent sayings than with the heroically indignant words of the despised and rejected Man of Sorrows. I reveal quiet earnestness and some little amusement. This is what my masters term punishment. It expresses their idea of torture, and exposes their ambitions, their poverty of wisdom, their paucity of the real power of authority. For what does their punishment mean? That the worst fate that can befall one is to be left to oneself!

Prison with its cell-life thus expresses the irony of life. It shows how little we live from, and think from ourselves in these days of turmoil and tragedy. It proves us the same fools as these Roman slaves who were auctioned in the forum, and used by tyrants in the public exhibition of their insane whims.

What a farce our civilization is! Its very breath is useless. It recognises no individual soul; it spurns personality; and the most thoroughly comprehensive of its ideas is that, in ourselves, we are—nothing. We exist only as appendages to clothes, to uniforms, to amusements. No virtue from within, and only worthless passion from without. So we despise our savage ancestors!

Why not? Do we not worship gods as false as their supreme idols ever were? Do we not talk of God, and know only the devil? When we speak of fairness, do we not breathe foulness? Is not our virtue vice?

In the cell, I vision the kingdom in which we live in all its grime and crime, and I vision another kingdom which is not of this world but is of this earth. The life to come hereafter—here, in our time, when men shall have destroyed the brutality which comes from above to thrive from below.

Ere the solitude of the cell gives place to the silence of the tomb, I hope to see Cæsar die for ever, and all allegiance to his sway depart from the hearts of men. In the cell, I gather strength to accomplish his doom. One cannot live in the cell for ever; but can watch from there for the day of action after the night of thought: for thought is not the dawn but the hour before dawn. When the day breaks fully, the social morn will witness the collapse of the authority that would have maimed in the cell by the power that was gained in the cell. Let us watch patiently and wait bravely.

ANARCHIST C.O.'s EXEMPTED

The London Tribunal, presided over by Judge Hargreaves, is to be congratulated on its decisions in the cases of the two Anarchists, to whom it granted total exemption.

Godfrey R. Munn, Adare Walk, S.W.16, stated:—

> "I am an Anarchist and have worked with Anarchists for the past two years. I credit you gentlemen with intelligence enough to know that an Anarchist is not one who attempts to impose his views on to others with bombs . . . You will appreciate that I do not recognise your authority to decide what I shall do, and as a matter of fact should your decision differ from my desire, it will be found that my apparent regard for your authority is apparent only. If I am asked to give oaths of allegiance to any course of action with which I disagree I might do so under very considerable duress, but I can assure you that I would try as soon as possible to make those who used force on me regret tha they had done so, by making my views known to all I come into contact with and persuading them to rebel against authority."

Ralph P. Mills, 8 Ribblesdale Road, Streatham, stated that he had been active against war, through his trade union branch, by pamphlets, and by the spoken word, during the past three years. He added:—

> "In 1938 I forwarded a resolution to the Annual Conference of my union advocating a general strike against war. It is said that this is a war for freedom. Freedom to me means the right to do what I wish, so long as this does not harm the equal rights of others. I deny the State the right to infringe my freedom by conscripting me to take part in a war to which I am opposed, and therefore refuse to become a uniformed assassin at the orders of the State."

The Tribunal questioned Nunn and Mills at length. The decision was unanimous in each case. The Tribunal was satisfied that there was a genuine conscientious objection to both combatant and non-combatant military service.

To this understanding of Anarchists by the London Tribunal, it is interesting to add a definition of "The Kingdom of God," delivered by the Rev. Harry Goulden, of Pembroke Chapel, Liverpool:—

> "A Democratic Community is one where merit alone conducts to station and where the rulers have identical interest with those they rule. Anarchism is that condition of society where the will of the individual and the needs of the community are in perfect agreement. The Kingdom of God is the same."

Another recent remarkable case before the London Tribunal ended with the decision that the applicant (Mr. S. D. Frances), who based his objection on socialist grounds, should be registered as a conscientious objector so long as he remained at his employment as an estimating costs clerk. The Tribunal were "much impressed by the sincerity of the applicant" and hesitated whether to grant total exemption.

The trade union "representative" on the Tribunal (Mr. Swales) put in a minority report that this was "about the best conscientious objector we have had during the seven months of the Tribunal. . . A definite case for unconditional registration."

On the following Monday Mr. Frances was dismissed by his employers.

READING TRIBUNAL

The Conscientious Objectors Tribunal sat at Reading from Monday, April 29, to Thursday, May 2. Judge Maurice Drucquer was in the chair.

On Monday Judge Drucquer sat with Major J. H. Simonds and Mr. C. H. Davis.

Frederick Arthur Kenneth Baker, of 77 Cardigan Road, Reading, a clerk in the employ of the Reading Education Committee, objected to combatant duties, but not to non-combatant service of a humanitarian kind. He based his objection on religious grounds.

The Rev. E. J. Willis, minister of Wycliffe Baptist Church, gave evidence as to the sincerity of the applicant.

Baker was registered for non-combatant work.

To our mind, this was a most unsatisfactory appeal in every way.

At Tuesday's sitting of the Tribunal, Thomas Aylwin, of "Gayhurst," Butts Hill Road, Woodley, a fitter and assembler employed by Messrs. Philips and Powis, was placed on the Military Service Register without qualification.

Judge Drucquer stated that the applicant was helping the war at his work and could not have any serious objection to war therefore.

Dennis Makepeace Jones, of 25 Belmont Crescent, Maidenhead, a sanitary and food inspector in the employ of the Maidenhead Borough Council, stated that the study of history proved to his mind that war did not end war.

The Tribunal decided that this was not a conscientious plea.

Frederick John Mackey, of 8 Bridle Road, Whitchurch Hill, said he was a sign writer by trade, but was now working as a labourer at the building of the tobacco factory at Theale. He was a Roman Catholic nominally, but had not attended church regularly since he left school. His father was disabled in the war. Four uncles were killed. Two returned but committed suicide because of their war disabilities.

The Tribunal rejected his appeal.

At the Wednesday session, Ernest Douglas Owen, 10 Raglan Gardens, Eavesham, an insurance clerk employed by the Salvation Army, declared :—

"My uniform is international. My father is a Salvation Army Officer and I have been brought up in an actively Christian home. I object to all forms of combatant and non-combatant work."

The Chairman stated that Owen was the first member of the Salvation Army to appear before the Tribunal.

Answering the chairman's question as to peace association, Owen said he had been a member of the Peace Pledge Union since May 1936.

Owen was registered unconditionally as a conscientious objector.

The Tribunal registered Albert Richard Cobb, 50 Bartlemy Road, Newbury, for non-combatant service and recommended him for the R.A.M.C. He is an automobile electrician and a Methodist local preacher and a Sunday School teacher. He based his objections to war on religious grounds. The Rev. J. H. Mortimer, Vicar of Old Marston, Oxon, wrote a letter testifying to Cobb's sincerity.

Harry Albert Aldridge, of Tan House, Headley, near Newbury, a general labourer, said he had served in the Army for 14 months, and he found the life so unbearable that he got his parents to buy him out.

Aldridge added :—

"I swore I would never join the Army again, and you can shoot me or do anything you like."

The chairman said it was obvious that Aldridge had an objection to the Army, but the Tribunal was not satisfied that it was a conscientious objection, and the application would be rejected.

Describing himself as a partner in the Forest Laundry, Broad Lake, Bracknell, Herbert James Barnes said he was a follower of Christ. He was not a member of any peace organisation, although he had distributed pacifist literature since the outbreak of war.

The chairman said that, althugh there was some doubt, the Tribunal was prepared to register Barnes unconditionally.

Frank Rouncefield Bell, a salesman employed by E. Jackson and Sons, Reading, whose address was given as 81 Wokingham Road, Reading, based his objections on Christian grounds.

Evidence supporting the application was given by Mr. J. Illsley, a member of the Brethren.

Bell was registered for non-combatant service in the R.A.M.C.

On Thursday, the Tribunal granted conditional exemption to Arthur Horoman, a student at Reading University, living at 95 Donnington Road, Reading. The conditions were that he complete his studies and do part-time A.R.P. work. Horoman based his objections on religious grounds and stated that he was a Methodist. He was a member of the Reading University Pacifist Federation.

On the question of non-combatant work, he said he could not undertake work which would release a man to do a job which he himself was not prepared to do. He was willing to do A.R.P. work, and to that end had taken a first-aid course. He had already approached the Vice-Chancellor for A.R.P. work.

The Tribunal decided that there was no genuine conscientious objection to either form of military service in the case of John Bryant, a Post Office sorter, living at "Caerglow," Shinpeld Green, Reading.

Bryant declared that war was in opposition to Christian principles, and was the cause of incalculable mental and physical suffering. Force, he added, could not effect a change of heart.

Judge Drucquer remarked that it was sometimes painful to have to read of all the ill-effects of war, and never to read of the good effects likely to result from a just war.

The following question and answer reveal the strange belief of the Tribunal, that no one can serve the Government conscientiously and be opposed to war :—

Judge Drucquer—You are in a Government service which is helping the war. You do not find it inconsistent with your conscience to continue at the Post Office?

Bryant—The Post Office is not an institution for the direct support of the war.

We hold that Bryant was correct and that Judge Drucquer was in error.

From the standpoint of every day commonsense, we contend that, for a man in Judge Drucquer's position, to pronounce officially the view that he did in this case, is a grave and dangerous mistake. The view is mischievous as well as untrue in fact. There must be hundreds of people enjoying official position, whose views are definitely opposed to war and violence. Anarchists define Government as organised crime or violence. That is their sincere understanding. Is this also the view of Judge Drucquer?

The Chairman of a Tribunal is not supposed to enunciate such reactionary sentiments that his remarks become, in effect, subversive. To say that a pacifist cannot be a post office sorter is subversive nonsense, whatever may be the motive that inspires such utterance. It is not the private view of the speaker, but the calculated effect of the utterance that counts in law. We would be loth to conclude that Judge Drucquer's political views are too antiquated to permit him to discharge his legal functions as Chairman of the Reading Tribunal satisfactorily.

The Tribunal rejected, as not being genuine, the application of Charles Jeffrey James Higgins, 37 Northumberland Road, Slough. Higgins is a milling operative, employed by the Intertype Company, of Slough. He was brought up a Christian and said that he was endeavouring to follow his belief. He based his objections on religious grounds, although his views were not those of the Roman Catholic Church, to which he belonged.

Raymond Walter Alcock, "Castlemead," Castle Street, Banbury, satisfied the Tribunal that he had a genuine conscientious objection to combatant military service. The Tribunal was not satisfied as to non-combatant service.

Alcock appealed on religious grounds. He had given up the Church of England because of its attitude towards the war.

An extraordinary decision was given in the case of Robert Carterton Hicks, of Keble College, Oxford. Answering questions, Hicks stated that he was prepared to undertake work of national importance. The Tribunal decided that, since he was willing to do this, he had no conscientious objection to either form of military service.

Has a Tribunal a legal right to insist that one must be either an absolutist or a complete militarist?

Graham Harper King, St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, was registered as a C.O., conditional upon his continuing his studies, taking his diploma, and doing part-time A.R.P. work.

King said he had been a pacifist since he had been able to think about war. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church and of the University Pacifist Association. He had refused to join the O.T.C. at school.

A similar decision was given in the case of Leslie Leather, Jesus College, Oxford.

Leather declared that war was evil and destroyed values—moral, intellectual, and spiritual—which were the hall-mark of civilized life. He based his objection to war on religious and ethical grounds. He added :—

"The only way of breaking the vicious circle of reprisal and counter-reprisal is for one party to swallow its pride and make the concessions necessary."

The Tribunal rejected as non-genuine the claim of John Stanley Messenger, who adopted a very firm and uncompromising attitude. He challenged conscription itself as well as the moral issue of killing.

Messenger registered as a free-lance writer, of 9 South Parks Road, Oxford, but is now an actor for the Religious Drama Society at Leicester. He decided he must be a pacifist at the age of 12 years when he saw the film version of Mason's "Four Feathers." He refused to take Certificate A in the School O.T.C., which attitude was regarded as insubordination.

He based his objections on moral and ethical grounds. He did not think the State had any right to dictate what an individual should do, as it denied him the freedom of distinguishing between right and wrong.

Messenger added that he objected to capital punishment. He objected to combatant and non-combatant service, and also to work of national importance.

BIRMINGHAM DECISIONS

On Thursday, May 2, the Midland Tribunal, sitting at Birmingham, removed from the register of conscientious objectors the name of John L. Mountford, 127 Chell Green Avenue, Chell Green, Tunstall.

Mountford explained that he had been in the Army, but said he purchased his discharge 18 months ago, when he realised that he might have to "go and kill innocent people."

Judge Longson (Chairman)—What did you think when you joined up? What did you think the Army was for?

Mountford—I was too young to realise.

What made you change your mind after you had joined up?—I realised the futility of war.

Leonard Edward Bicknell, painter and decorator, 3 Stourbridge Road, Kidderminster, was registered on Friday, May 3, as a conscientious objector, the condition being laid down that he must continue in his present job.

Referring to Bicknell's employment, Judge Longson said—"The same job as Hitler's."

Bicknell—No, sir. I do sanitary work and plumbing as well.

Judge Longson—I thought there must be some difference between you.

Norman Philip Rowland, shoemaker, of 120 Winson Street Birmingham, was also conditionally registered. He declared :—

"I should not like anyone to kill me particularly, and I don't want to do it to anybody else."

Professor J. G. Smith—Surely that's a question of your personal comfort rather than your conscience?

Rowland replied that it was a question of doing to each other as one would be done to. He had been taught pacifism since he was a child. Two members of his family were "C.O.'s" in the last war.

Eric Sheppard, a scrap metal sorter, 4 Lewis Road, Coventry, and a Christadelphian, was granted exemption from military service on condition he carried on with the same kind of work as he is doing at present.

Questioning Sheppard about his work, a member of the Tribunal asked him, "Do you call it scrap because it is used in a scrap?"

Cyril Walker Stevens, a bookbinder, of 37 Marriott Road, Radford, Coventry, based his objection on "my conception of the teaching of Christ."

A Baptist, Stevens was supported by the Rev. Ingli James, minister of the church he attends, who testified to his sincerity.

Stevens was granted exemption conditional to his remaining at his present kind of work.

On Monday, May 6, the Tribunal exempted conditionally Ronald Charles Tennant, Station Road, Dorridge, a grocery assistant, who described himself as an "active pacifist."

His name was allowed to remain on the register on condition that he remains in his present employment.,

Leslie William Stanley, a Birmingham parcel porter, said he objected to war because it is contrary to Christian doctrine. Asked if his opinion was derived from books, he replied that he could not read. He was exempted.

The Tribunal removed without qualification from the register Robert Stanley Roberts, West Boulevard, Birmingham; and Leslie Claude Slaughter. The latter avowed simply: "I believe I have no right to kill."

The Tribunal treated very fairly Frank Hulme, lorry driver, Weathercock Farm, Biddulph Moor. He based his objection on Christion grounds but said he did not remember what was the difference, generally, between the Old Testament and the New.

After a retirement, Judge Longson said that, although Hulme had not put his case in a very satisfactory manner, they were satisfied he had a conscientious objection, and left his name on the register on condition he carried on with the kind of work he was doing at present.

The Tribunal refused exemption to Leslie S. Jenkins, 165 King Street, Fenton, who based his objection on humanitarian grounds.

"I believe in the sanctity of a human being's life," he declared, and added that his school background had taught him his views. "Killing, he added, "was the worst crime that anyone could commit."

Gilbert Raymond Holt, bank clerk, Sunholme, Wolseley Road, Stoke-on-Trent, put his objection on the simple religion he had been brought up in at home. He was granted exemption on condition that he remained a bank clerk.

We sympathise with the Tribunal in the case of Richard Roberts, 12 Hartington Street, Wolstanton. He was working on the erection of a Government factory. Exemption was refused. Judge Longson said:—

"If you have got a conscience, you cannot toy with it like that. There can be no compromise."

C.O. ARRESTS

The arrests of 1940 C.O.'s are taking place all over Brtain. Here are some May cases.

William Holness was summoned at Redcar for ignoring a calling-up notice. He was remanded for military escort, and when it arrived was taken to Carlisle Barracks.

J. Mitchell, of Oldham, was taken by military escort to Manchester, after trial by the local magistrates. At the local Tribunl he was given non-combatant service.

When D. Wright, of Manchester, was brought before the magistrates, he was charged as "Fusilier" Wright.

He had ignored two enlistment notices, and was arrested at work. He, too, was handed over to a military escort and taken to Chester.

"C.O." WITH "NO SCRUPLES"

The allegation that a conscientious objector had "no scruples whatsoever as to the methods he adopts to evade military service" was made in a letter read by a witness, on oath, before the Lancashire Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal in Manchester on Wednesday, May 8, 1940.

The applicant in the case was Clifford Gregory (26), cashier, of 95 South Park Road, Macclesfield. He did not appear, but his statement was read in court. It contained these passages:—

"I believe war to be irrational, unmoral, illogical, and what to me is the greatest objection of all, a direct violation of the teaching of Christ."

"Pacifism to me is a faith, and as a faith I will cling to it. I will think, speak and live peace."

After a statement by Mr. Douglas Taylor, of the Ministry of Labour, Mr. John L. Wardle, 70 Fence Avenue, Macclesfield, was called.

Judge R. C. Essenhigh—I think you wrote to the Ministry a letter dated April 13, 1940? —Yes.

Are you prepared still to stand by what you state in that letter?—Yes.

Have you any objection to being sworn?—No.

That letter was sent by you and some of your workmates?—Yes.

Wardle was sworn and read the following letter, addressed to the Divisional Controller, the Ministry of Labour, Manchester:—

Dear Sir—I wish to express on behalf of those signed below a strong protest against the acceptance of Mr. C. Gregory of South Park Road, as a conscientious objector. We have all worked with the above person in the same office for upwards of six years, and we can in all sincerity say that up to about six months ago Mr. Gregory had not in any way expressed pacifist views. To take things from the beginning on the Monday after war was declared Mr. Gregory hastily visited his doctor for examination: the doctor passed him A1. From that day he had gradually developed pacifist views, and has openly stated that he would find a way of avoiding military service as he thought we were partly to blame for the outbreak of hostilities.

"But, perhaps, a more significant thing happened later on. Upon hearing that there were several "safe" clerical jobs available in the R.A.F., he made all arrangements to travel to Stoke to volunteer, along with one of those signed below—(this person is quite prepared to swear on oath to this while I myself looked up the necessary train services). Unfortunately, our employer refused to sanction their volunteering, otherwise he would today be serving with the R.A.F.

"Finding that his job would be placed in a precarious position if he volunteered, he immediately became an active Peace Pledge supporter, and has developed views and ideas which we all know have been instilled into him by his tutors. We have no doubt that he will know all the answers to the majority of the tribunal's questions as he spends much time memorising and studying similar questions and answers. He contributes regularly a proportion of his wage for the comfort of his fellow workers serving in H.M. Forces, and has been studying German for about six months. He is a professed atheist, and does not believe in patriotism to one's country.

"In conclusion, may we say that this statement can be substantiated by the majority of his fellow workers, and although we cannot present any better proof than our word, and this statement, we can assure you that Mr. Gregory has no scruples whatsoever as to the methods he adopts to evade military service. His only thought is that he shall live in safety and be able to continue his pleasures whilst others fight for him."

Jack Bebington gave evidence and said he agreed with this letter. Subsequently, it was stated that there were nine signatures to the letter.

Judge Essenhigh addressed the witnesses:—

"The tribunal desires to express thanks to you for coming forward to do this public duty. There are men who, from time to time, present themselves as conscientious objectors, and it is well that they should know that, if any evidence is forthcoming at all to the contrary, so far as this tribunal is concerned that evidence will be adduced, and here we have got conclusive evidence that this man, Clifford Gregory, is not, and cannot ever have been a conscientious objector. Therefore, the opinion of this tribunal is that he should be taken from the register of conscientious objectors without any qualification whatsoever."

The witness, Wardle, felt the importance of the occasion. He rose to say that he thought it ought to be generally known that people could come forward if they wished. They themselves (the signatories of the letter) at first did not know this, but they made it their business to find out.

Judge Essenhigh—In these circumstances I think it would be only right that where information can be obtained it should be sent along to the Minister, or, perhaps, to some representative of His Majesty's Government, who might deal with the matter. I am much obliged to you.

The failure of Gregory to attend the Tribunal pre-supposes the truth of the charges as to his insincerity. If he is misjudged, he has his own conduct to blame. Conscience demands consistency. If his conscience is really active, and will not permit him to serve as a soldier, no amount of misjudgment, and no power of man will convert him into a soldier. The matter is still in his own hands.

How much prejudice inspires the letter of protest against him is a matter on which he would like enlightenment. The charges of "atheism" and of "want of patriotism" are indictments that will not commend themselves to intelligent people. When the late Horatio Bottomley became converted for the duration of the Great War, the press forgot his atheism, which was notorious, and overlooked the cash basis of his "patriotism."

We condemn as being utterly unprincipled the conduct ascribed to Clifford Gregory. The man is probably a hypocrite. But we cannot discover a high moral tone in the communication of his workmates. There are passages that indict them badly. Their lofty claim to consideration is incompatible with unfortunate phrases no moral mind would employ.

Whether we live or whether we die is a small matter. To live wholesomely is the important thing. If we cannot live, and preserve our integrity while living, we should submit to fate, and calmly invite destruction. Even in an age of sordid materialism, integrity counts above honours. Integrity is life.

When Judge Essenhigh thanked and warned, from very love of wisdom, he should have rebuked also. One of the wisest of the Roman Emperors maintained that the State was in danger when justice depended on reformers.

HYDE PARK REPORT

The Hyde Park arrests are in their eight or ninth week. Yesterday there were six arrests, comprising members of the P.P.U. ("Forward" section), S.P.G.B., and I.L.P. I do not yet know the result of the cases and I am angry that the London movement did not support the editor of THE WORD when he made his stand on the question of literature circulation in November 1938, and May 1939. The Marlborough Street hearing is reported in THE WORD for June 1939. The High Court report has to be published yet and is overdue. If the editor had not been allowed to stand alone then, the struggle would not be necessary to-day. Meetings, without circulating literature, are a farce.

Last week there were several dismissals, but one friend of mine—Howard Whitten—got seven days. The solicitor, supplied by Civil Liberties, made a bad hash of this case and played right into the hands of of the prosecution.

The whole case was trumped up, and there was absolutely no obstruction. My evidence was quite clear on the point but many important questions were not asked.

So far, none of our N.C.L. speakers have been arrested, but some speakers (I think Fascists) have. Up to now I have been fortunate. Whilst I have no desire to seek trouble on minor issues, I am convinced that it is not going to be very long before the fight for free speech again becomes a major struggle—and one which I certainly cannot and would not avoid.

I have found that with London crowds these days one point is put forward regularly every ten minutes: "If you were in Germany you wouldn't be allowed to say that: you'd be in a concentration camp!"

This is wishful thinking. The implication is that a concentration camp ought to be our fate. It even suggests that such a camp probably will be our lot before the destruction of Europe is completed. I see no great reason for virtuous "self" righteousness on the part of those who think in these terms of repression.

ANNESLEY ALDRED.

London, W.14., May 6.

HERESY IN HIGH PLACES

Last month we drew attention to Clifford Allen's attitude towards conscription. His imprisonment during the last war will be recalled to-day by C.O's now suffering durance vile. Just over a year ago the Bishop of Winchester officiated at a Service of Remembrance held at St. Martin-in-the-Fields for Lord Allen of Hurtwood. This is the official description in the sacred pages of Debrett, of the former "conchie" jailbird, Clifford Allen. An unusual heterodox feature of the ceremony was the reading by Francis Meynell of a poem that was frankly Rationalistic. An apostrophe to the spirit of the late peer and former "conchie," the poem boldly proclaimed Humanism as his sole religion and the supreme passion of his life :—

"... Surely not by nature is Man evil:
Such was your faith ...
Yours was no doctrine subtle and remote,
No popular gospel or transcendental creed,
But the plain verity that we, being men,
Must learn the wisdom of humanity ...
Dear to you was this world of men, and dear
The beauty of the earth."

The tone is pagan throughout. Listeners in that place of Christian worship heard no mention of the Christian God, no word of Christian hope or consolation. Only tribute to the spirit that had passed. Could Agnosticism find clearer utterance than in the words with which this poem closed? :—

"Never were you tempted by despair
Into morose rebellion or vain hate
Against that unknown Power, what'er it be,
Which, blind or intelligent,
Friendly or indifferent,
Controls the flux of things and human fate."

Strange words, these, to form part of an Anglican service, with a Bishop of the Established Church presiding—words that were followed immediately by the anthem "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring.'

Our cuttings include the following extract from a daily newspaper, dated February 2, 1939 :—

"The Duke and Duchess of Windsor have sent £20 to Dr. Marie Stopes for the benefit of her birth control clinic in Cardiff. The cheque arrived with a very charming letter. It said: 'Knowing the wonderful and humane work that this clinic performs under your auspices, the Duchess and I have great pleasure in sending you a gift of £20, cheque for which I enclose with our good wishes for the certain success of your undertaking.'"

There was a time when Labour leaders courted the society of the Prince of Wales. When he became Edward VIII., he said many things that commanded respect because of their radical implications. His manner of leaving the throne did him greater honour than it did his enemies. We are opposed to kings: but we commend the courage of Edward, Duke of Windsor in supporting openly the cause of birth control in opposition to the superstition that clamours against rationalism in this matter.

The crisis through which Europe and the world is passing compels us to recall the Munich agreement and the broadcast address of thanksgiving of the Archbishop of Canterbury in October, 1938. His Grace declared that the effect of the prayers for peace which had ascended to God during the previous few weeks was now obvious to all! This seemed strange reasoning at the time, considering that the Archbishop also expressed his sense of gratitude to the statesmen in all countries who had brought about the settlement.

Since 1938, the world has decided that the settlement was due to Mr. Chamberlain and not to God. That is because it has lost all respect for a settlement which proved no settlement, but only a prelude to war. Obviously, the premature thanks of the Archbishop of Canterbury belongs to the category of either heresy or blasphemy. To thank God for what God did not do and ought not to have done is bad theology. But it was acceptable at the time.

Lady Oxford confessed to certain heresies in the Daily Sketch a year ago. She objected to people who did not believe in a future life and asked: "Do they believe that we go into manure when we die?" This query was absurd and orthodox enough but her view of God ranks as heresy. Here it is :—

"There is no doubt that religion does not appear to occupy the minds of men to-day as much as it did before the War (which is a danger as well as a misfortune). Though few of us believe in eternal punishment or 'original sin,' we have no reason to believe that because God is good He is good-natured."

The idea of God being recognised as being "bad-tempered" is, without doubt, heretical theology.

Even the present Prime Minister, Winston Churchill, was accused of heresy at the 40th Annual Dinner and Reunion of the Rationalist Press Association, held at the Trocadero Restaurant, London, on May 13, 1939. Lord Snell of Plumstead, C.B.E., presided. After various complimentary references to various rationalists, he quoted Hilaire Belloc's lines :—

"When we are dead .
May it be said:
'Their sins were scarlet
But their books were read.'"

Lord Snell recalled the famous controversy that arose when, a generation and a half ago, the Duke of Rutland wrote to the Times asking that journal to beseech the nation to pray for rain. Great discussion resulted. Sir Edward Marsh, in his reminiscences, referred to it by quoting some lines which he ascribed to Winston Churchill :—

"The Duke of Rutland asked the Times to pray
For rain; the rain came down the following day.
The pious marvelled, sceptics murmured 'Fluke,'
And farmers late with hay said: 'Damn that Duke.'"

As a matter of fact, Lord Snell's reference did not do justice to Winston Churchill's irony in connection with this subject, as recalled by Sir Edward Marsh.

In the solemn style of a letter to the Times the present Premier deals with the confusion caused by sporadic and vague appeals to the Almighty for rain. He suggests the formation of a Royal Commission to establish a really scientific basis of climatic reform, defining the proper proportion of rain to sunshine, relegating the rain largely to the hours of darkness, and arranging fine weather for crops and holidays.

"These reforms, when duly embodied in an official volume could be made the object of the sustained appeals of the nation over many years, and embodied in general prayers of a permanent and not of an exceptional character. We should not then be forced from time to time to have recourse to such appeals at particular periods, which, since they are unrelated to any general plan, must run the risk of deranging the whole economy of nature and involve the interruption and deflection of universal processes, causing reactions of the utmost complexity in many directions which it is impossible for us with our limited knowledge to foresee."

SOCIALISM AND THE POPE.

64 pages. Price 4d. Postage extra.

New matter deals with Spain, Cardinal Manning and the Workers' daily struggle, etc. This is No. 1 pamphlet of the new Word Library.

The following note was published in Forward, December 15, 1917 :—"Tom Kerr, after many legal battles, has been fined and handed over to do his bit for K. and C." Which means that Kerr became a C.O. and resisted conscription.

To our mind, these questions are fair, pertinent, and unanswerable. But we think that Mr. Ratcliffe would have made comment stronger and more effective if he had not used the phrase: "This Irish Paddy." That savours of prejudice and abuse. The cause of peace must be served by the most severe respect for the rules of dignity. The argument against the Lord Provost is one of conscience and war and inconsistency of conduct. His views, whether they are Papist, Protestant, or Atheist —do not enter into the indictment, if sincerely held. His nationality does not enter into the discussion.

PROTESTANTISM AND WAR

Mr. Alexander Ratcliffe, Secretary of the Socttish Protestant League, and editor of The Vanguard, is to be congratulated on his stand for conscience and Anti-Militarism. Mr. Ratcliffe now publishes his paper from his own address, 2 Endrick Drive, Bearsden, Dumbartonshire. The annual subscription is 3/-; single copies, 3d.

In the issue for March 30, Mr. Ratcliffe denounces the churches and the clergy for their attitude towards the shambles of war. He deals with the issue of "small nations" and retorts on the "so-called Christians and Protestants" who object to his anti-war stand. He asks what was done to defend Abyssinia, and Albania against the Fascist invasion of Mussolini, aided by the Pope. He adds :—

"When Spain was invaded by Hitler and Mussolini, did Mr. Chamberlain on that occasion demand that we should go to the help of the Spanish Government, a Government at that time which was giving religious liberty to the Protestants?"

In the same issue, The Vanguard cites a statement published in The Tribune for February 2, declaring: "War is the liar's paradise." This is from an article written by Mr. G. R. Strauss, M.P., applauding Lord Ponsonby's wonderful work, Falsehood in Wartime. In this book Lord Ponsonby deals with the German invasion of Belgium in 1914: the statement, falsely attributed to the Kaiser, that Britain's army was a "contemptible little army"; and the question of the Lusitania. Lord Ponsonby quotes Winston Churchill's The World Crisis, to prove that the Lusitania carried ammunition, the known quantities being stated. G. R. Strauss, M.P., indicts the Government's control of information in war-time in these trenchant terms :—

"War is the liar's paradise. For lying is then no longer mean and dishonourable, but noble and patriotic. Nor, under war conditions, is it difficult. The Government have complete control over all sources of information, and, through the censorship, the power to suppress any facts they do not want the people to know ... Many innocent people still think that deliberate mass deceit is the sort of dirty weapon which only the Fascist Governments use."

We do not know what view Sir John Anderson takes of Lord Ponsonby's assertions or Mr. G. R. Strauss's detailed development of the theme, which must be rather embarrassing to the Government.

This issue of The Vanguard reviews our pamphlet, The C.O., The Tribunal, and After. It describes this pamphlet thus :—

"A handy brochure of guidance and advice to those who have conscientious objections to military service. The Rights and Status of such under the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, are explained. A helpful 'Guide' which should be taken advantage of by all concerned: especially those who are in doubt as to procedure should consult this up-to-date pamphlet."

With May, The Vanguard became a monthly publication. Under the heading, "Lord Provost Disclosures," this issue quotes from the April Word our account of Dollan's P.S.M. meeting. Our contemporary refers also to Dollan's Wormwood Scrubbs article, describing the sad lot of C.O.'s during the Great War, and adds :—

"Our Glasgow Papist Lord Provost was a C.O. during those days of the last War, and so he ought to know!"

Referring to the Dollan note reprinted by us from the Forward, November 24, 1917, The Vanguard challenges :—

"This Irish Paddy states that the job of Lord Provost 'is but a stepping-stone to a title,' and that the 'canvassing, intrigue and chicanery that goes on to secure votes is disgusting.'

"Will the Lord Provost tell us what changes have taken place since the Moderates were put out of power by the Scottish Protestant League? Will Mr. Dollan decline the 'title' which he is sure to get when once his term is up? And can he honestly tell us that there was nothing disgusting evident in the canvassing and election of the first two Labour Lord Provosts for Glasgow?"

WAR DEFENCE POWERS

The Press, Minority Propaganda, & Home Security

On Thursday, May 9, Captain Ramsay addressed three questions to Sir John Anderson, the Home Secretary and Minister for Home Security, on :—

1. Money and Orders from Germany.
2. Subversive Activities.
3. Anti-Semitism and Pro-Nazism.

The reader is referred to questions 16, 17, and 18, columns 1380-1382 of Parliamentary Debates, House of Commons, Official Report.

We cannot reproduce the questions and answers in full because of the space required by the supplementary questions.

The purpose of question 16 was to protest that it was unfair for the Government to suggest that German firms and orders were coming to this country, when there was no foundation in fact for such a suggestion. Question 17 insisted on money being received in Britain from the Comintern. Question 18 asked the Home Secretary not to be stampeded by "our Jew-ridden press" into confusing Anti-Semitism with Pro-Nazism. Captain Ramsay's questions were definite party and class-biased, pro-Fascist propaganda.

Question 26 was from Mr. H. Strauss and enquired of the Home Secretary what additional powers he was seeking to deal with organised attempts to weaken the resolution of the people to prosecute the war to a successful conclusion. Sir John Anderson replied by making a statement at the end of questions.

The spoken statement summarised Orders-in-Council amending the Defence Regulations that had been made that morning.

The first section, dealing with enemy aliens, and technical British subjects, does not concern those of us who are interested in the vital question of the freedom of the press. The anti-alien powers are normal powers for a period of crisis. Whether they are used wisely or unwisely in every instance is a detail question of practical administration.

The second group of Regulations were summarised by Sir John Anderson as follows (Cols. 1383-1384, Official Report) :—

"The second group of Regulations is designed to check the spread of propaganda calculated to undermine the resolution of the people to prosecute the war to a successful issue. These Regulations have been very carefully drawn so as to avoid penalising the mere expressions of opinions while at the same time giving full power to deal with mischievous activities directed towards impeding the war effort of the nation. The main Regulation provides that, if the Secretary of State is satisfied that any person or organisation is concerned in the systematic publication of matter calculated to foment opposition to the prosecution of the war to a successful issue and that serious mischief may be caused thereby, he may cause a formal warning to be given that if such activities are persisted in the persons responsible will become liable to proceedings; and if any person or organisation so warned subsequently publishes matter calculated to foment such opposition those responsible are liable to a sentence of penal servitude for seven years or a fine of £500 or both.

"A second Regulation extends the scope of Defence Regulation 39A so as to make it an offence to endeavour to incite men who are liable to military service to evade their duties, or to endeavour to incite persons to abstain from enrolling voluntarily in any of the defence services. Finally a new Regulation has been made empowering the Secretary of State to direct that no further use shall be made, pending an application to the High Court, of any printing press which has been used for the production of documents published in contravention of the Regulations dealing with illegal propaganda."

We have italicised certain phrases. The question is: Can one give expression to opinions in war-time, that are not war-opinions, without running the risk of being accused of mischievous activities?

If the charge is made of mischievous activity, does it follow that, even if upheld by the judiciary, such a charge is true? War, whether right or wrong, is not the natural aim, goal, or destiny of man. War is a menace to life and liberty and a disorder. Beyond and above all war, even blurting out in the midst of war, is man's love of harmony, peace, and social service. The war-mind, unfortunately, sees menace to its purpose everywhere.

In saying this, we are not indicting the executive. During the last war, until our arrest under the Military Service Acts, we conducted our paper, The Spur. This paper was published monthly continuously from June 1914 to April 1921, inclusive. After our arrest, it was edited and issued by our comrade, Rose Witcop. We inspired its publication even from prison. Our essays appeared in it regularly. Its tone was uncompromising. Despite its anti-war tone, and its fervour on behalf of the conscientious objectors, during those war months, The Spur was not attacked by the authorities. It was never interfered with in any way, although other papers were. In the main, the authorities acted mildly. Once The Spur office was visited for the "Knock-out Blow" pamphlet, which we have never seen to this day, although we have read much about it. Dora gave full powers of suppression. Obviously, they were not acted upon in that sense. History may repeat itself. Only there is a disquieting vagueness in the definitions given by the Home Secretary. The terms should be precise.

Ignoring the questions addressed to Sir John Anderson by Messrs. H. Strauss, John McGovern, Alan Herbert, W. Gallacher, G. Buchanan, R. W. Sorensen, G. Mathers, and Sir Waldron Smithers, we pass to Sir John Anderson's full printed statement. (Official Report; Commons, Columns 1387-1392. The Second Group of Regulations commence on Column 1389.) The Home Secretary states the position clearly and defines his difficulty in framing accurately regulations which express his purpose. In fairness to the Government, and to the minority to whom reference is made, we reproduce this section of the statement in full :—

"The second group of Regulations is concerned with the activities of individuals and organisations who, by spreading defeatest or anti-war propaganda, are seeking to undermine public morale and to weaken the resolution of the people to prosecute the war to a successful issue. As I said in my reply to Questions on 25th April, there is a risk that our traditional reluctance to limit the free expression of minority opinions may be exploited by persons whose real purpose is to hamper, for ulterior motives, the war effort of the nation. The Defence Regulations introduced on the outbreak of war included stringent provisions dealing with propaganda, under which it would have been an offence for any person to endeavour to influence public opinion in a manner likely to be prejudicial to the defence of the realm or the efficient prosecution of the war; but after the Debate on the Regulations which took place in this House on 31st October last there was a drastic curtailment of those provisions of the Regulations which had attracted special opposition on the ground that they were capable of being used for the suppression of minority opinions. The Government are anxions to avoid any unnecessary interference with our traditional liberties, but they feel that a distinction can and must be drawn between the mere expression of honest opinion on the one hand and, on the other, the deliberate and systematic advocacy of defeatest or anti-war policies with intent to weaken the national resolution to prosecute the war to a successful conclusion. Legal provisions on this subject must necessarily be cast in somewhat general terms if they are to cover all forms of propagandist activity which are prejudicial to the national interests; and the difficulty has always been to find a form of words which will suffice to check the really mischievous activities, without at the same time penalising expressions of opinion, with which we should all desire to avoid interference, however much we may disagree with the opinion expressed. The consultations which I have held have led me to the conclusion that this point cannot be fully met except by giving, to a responsible Minister answerable to Parliament, an administrative discretion to determine in what cases individuals or organisations should be made liable to criminal proceedings for engaging in mischievous activities of this kind; and in the new Regulation which has now been made a novel procedure has been adopted in order to secure that the sanctions of the criminal law shall be applied only to persons acting with deliberate intent to prejudice the national interest. The Regulation provides for the issue of a warning to any person or organisation who appears to the Secretary of State to be concerned in the systematic publication of matter calculated to foment opposition to the prosecution of the war to a successful issue. The warning will draw attention to the matter objected to and will make it clear that if after the warning there is any future publication of matter calculated to foment such opposition the person or persons concerned will become liable to prosecution under the Regulations. Until a warning has been issued no person can be prosecuted for an offence under the Regulation; but if after receiving such a warning there is a continuance of mischievous activities those responsible then become liable to prosecution and, if convicted, to heavy penalties—namely seven years' penal servitude or a fine of £500, or both. The Regulation provides ample safeguards against any misuse of the new powers which it confers. In the first place the Secretary of State must be satisfied, not by an isolated remark but by a consistent course of conduct, that there is systematic publication of matter which is calculated to foment opposition to the prosecution of the war to a successful issue, and further that the continuance of these activities may cause serious mischief. Then there must be a formal warning by a notice in writing of the consequences of persistence in this course of conduct. Then, if such conduct is persisted in, proceedings based on a specific contravention of the Regulation can be instituted only with the consent of the Attorney-General and can be taken only at Assizes or courts of corresponding jurisdiction; and the defendant cannot be convicted if he can show to the satisfaction of the court that he had no intent to foment opposition to the prosecution of war to a successful issue and had no reasonable cause to believe that his activities were calculated to foment such opposition. I hope that what I have said will suffice to satisfy the House that this new Regulation is so drawn as to penalise only deliberate, organised and systematic efforts to undermine the national morale; and I need hardly add that it is the firm intention of the Government to apply the criminal sanctions provided by this Regulation only in cases of real gravity where the national interests may be seriously threatened.

"A second Regulation in this group is designed to extend and strengthen the provisions of Defence Regulation 39A, under which it is already an offence to endeavour to seduce from their duty persons in His Majesty's service or in the various services of Civil Defence. Experience has shown that it is not enough to restrict this provision to persons already embodied in the various services. The efforts of those who wish to undermine the efficiency of these services may be directed not to persons already serving but to those who are shortly to be called up for service; and the Regulation has therefore been amended so as to make it equally an offence to endeavour to incite persons liable to such service to evade their duties or to endeavour to incite persons to abstain from enrolling voluntarily in any of the defence services. Here again care has been taken to avoid penalising the mere expression of opinion. It will be no offence merely to state the statutory rights of men liable to military service to claim exemption on conscientious grounds, nor will the Regulation prevent the giving of guidance to a young man who is troubled in conscience and seeks advice from a priest or a friend. The regulation is aimed at those who try to incite young men liable to military service to stimulate conscientious objections for the purpose of evading their duties. I am satisfied that this limited provision is necessary and that it will command general support.

"Finally, power has been taken to apply really effective sanctions against the use of printing presses for the production of publications which contravene either the new Regulation dealing with the corruption of public morale, or the expanded provisions of Regulation 39A regarding attempts to cause disaffection or Regulation 39B dealing generally with the publication of false statements prejudicial to the national interests. Under this new Regulation the Secretary of State may, if he is satisfied that any printing press has been used for the production of any document in respect of which any person has been convicted of an offence under any of these three Regulations, direct that the press shall not be used for any purpose until the leave of the High Court has been obtained for its further use. The High Court may grant such leave if satisfied that the use of the printing press for the production of the offending document was due to a mistake, or even though not so satisfied may grant leave for its future use subject to conditions, or may if it thinks fit order that the printing press shall be destroyed. In many cases documents constituting an offence under these Regulations will have been printed by persons other than those convicted of distributing or publishing them; and in serious cases it is desirable that there should be power to bring it home to the printer that his plant cannot be used with impunity for the production of mischievous documents of this character which contravene the law. A power to seal up the printer's plant is likely to operate as a more effective deterrent than criminal proceedings leading to a fine; and this new power should materially reduce the extent to which printing presses will be made available for the production of documents of this type."

There is no doubt that this is a carefully weighed statement. In considering its tone, one must remember that a certain Socialist Republic (so-called) instituted measures of state security, showing far less regard for private liberty than this declaration of the Home Secretary. One must remember that this is war-time and one must consider the psychology of the Government and of the majority. On the other hand, if the Government intends to be as fair as the Minister declares, why seek these abnormal powers? The existing state powers were sufficient to protect the realm.

Despite Sir John Anderson's assurance, there is a menace to free speech and to freedom of thought and to vital democracy in these powers. It is possible that this potential threat to liberty—to that essential constructive liberty necessary to save every nation in the world from the terrible aftermath of this terrible war—will not be abused by the executive. There remains the suggestion of fear. This suggestion is a cloud that settles with oppression on the mind of man. Such fear is one of the inevitable wrongs of war. Like Dora from 1914-1918, this defence legislation will attempt to survive the war. Not the men even who evolved it, but the men who succeed them, will attempt the perpetuation of the legislation of crisis into the period of peace.

Philip Boyle.

GLASGOW COURT MARTIAL

Philip Boyle, 246 Todd Street, Dennistoun, Glasgow, is the first C.O. in Glasgow to be Court-Martialled. He is also the first Roman Catholic C.O. in Great Britain to be Court-Martialled.

Comrade Boyle is well-known and liked by all his pacifist comrades in Glasgow, everyone of whom was impressed by his quiet sincerity, his serious, studious disposition, his gentleness, and his sunny, smiling, optimism. Boyle's objection to war and killing arose from his Christian faith. Obviously, the Tribunals did not believe him because he insisted on his Catholicism. He maintained, whatever priests said, or even the Pope, a man could be a Catholic and also a pacifist. He felt that a Christian must object to bloodshed.

Boyle was arrested on Monday, May 6, at home, at 10 p.m. He was handed over to the military authorities at the Eastern Police Court, Glasgow, the following morning. Down to the time of his Court-Martial, on Friday, May 24, he experienced some rough treatment. At his Court-Martial, and following upon the D.C.M., he was treated with courtesy and consideration. Every opportunity was afforded him to bring out his conscientious scruples. A very full, descriptive account of his Court-Martial appeared in the Glasgow Evening Times—first Final Edition—for May 24. Good and full reports appeared the following morning in Glasgow Herald, The Bulletin, and Scots Daily Express.

Boyle's full story as told by his father, and related to us by himself, will be published in our next issue. We shall publish also an account of his Court-Martial.

The New Leader, in its issue for May 16, published the following description of Boyle's first treatment on being handed over:—

"When the father of an arrested C.O. visited his son in prison he found that the young man was clad only in an old mackintosh. The soldier's uniform, which had previously been forced on him, lay on the floor.

"The C.O., Philip Boyle, of Dennistoun, Glasgow, had been placed under arrest and taken to Maryhill Barracks. After he had been forced into uniform he was taken before the Commanding Officer, who told Boyle to go home for the day and then come back and be a good soldier.

"Instead, Boyle went back to his cell and stripped himself of the uniform.

"Boyle had been refused exemption by the local and Appellate Tribunals on the ground that as a Catholic he could not be a C.O."

THE "CONCHIE" PROBLEM

Mr. Herbert Morrison, who was a Conscientious Objector during the Great War of 1914-1918, is Minister of Supply in Mr. Winston Churchill's War Cabinet. Mr. Arthur Greenwood—who defended Morrison being a "Conchie" in 1916 and holds that he is consistent in being pro-war to-day—is Minister without Portfolio in the same Cabinet. Mr. C. R. Atlee, Leader of the Labour Party—who served as a Major in the last war and was opposed to conscientious objectors at that time—is Lord Privy Seal. These facts direct attention to the part played to-day by the "over-age" conchie M.P., when the conscientious objector of to-day who has failed to convince the Tribunals of his sincerity, is being maltreated because of his conscientious objection to war. Some of these young C.O.'s are sons of men who fought and were wounded or killed in the Great War. It is a scandal if the children of these men are to suffer persecution whlist the men who were denounced as C.O.'s in 1916 are to be elevated to public position, in order that they might help to direct war. Elevated to public position, the over-age "conchie" of 1916 forgets his past, and silently acquiesces in the persecution of the "conchie" of 1940. Conscientious objection is no more wrong in 1940 than it was in 1916. If it is right to repose authority in the over-age "conchie" of 1916, then justice should be secured to the "conchie' of to-day. The trouble with war is that whilst it sacrifices human life, it destroys also human worth, and understands neither rhyme nor reason. We understand the person who feels, wrongly, in our opinion, that matters are more grave to-day than in 1916. That fact does not justify hypocrisy. Nor should it blind our minds to the fact that, in 1916, the facts were grave. Mr. Neville Chamberlain was Minister for National Service in 1916, whilst Mr. Morrison was graduating through Tribunals to prison and Home Office Schemes. His feelings were the same then as to-day. He was askd then, in effect, as a member of the War Cabinet, to be fair to Mr. Morrison. We ask now for justice for the youth who play to-day the part then played by Mr. Morrison.

Our plea is good logic and even sound patriotism. Whilst folk around us grow excited, we adopt the motto: "Keep calm." We have perfect faith in Freedom and in progress. We do not believe that Fascism or Nazism is going to conquer the world. We do not believe that dictatorship will conquer democracy. We believe that, out of the present turmoil, except for the saddening disasters of sudden and unreserved death, liberty will emerge, stronger than ever before in the history of humanity. We object to the toll of human sacrifice but we have no doubt as to the final result. As the late Brigadier-General Crozier said the "Old Contemptible" may have contributed to this result, but so also did the absolutist conscientious objector. In these days of stress and storm, one should read less of Karl Marx and more of General Crozier. When a British Army officer takes to pen and paper, he usually sees to it that he writes powerfully and wisely. Crozier believed that the pen was mightier than the sword and that peace was more important than war. The "over-age" conscientious objector, who underestimates the importance of conscience to-day, stamps himself as being insincere in 1916 and worthless as a public figure. The conscientious objector may require more moral courage to-day than in 1916. He is contributing usefully to the redemption of the world from tyranny and blood lust.

Many of the men who risked their lives in the last war and by the miracle of chance or fate, survived—realise the truth of this contention. They appear before Tribunals to support the pleas of conscientious objector sons. They have experienced war. They have lived through its horrors. Not their own suffering, but the nauseous feeling of killing others, has stirred their conscience. They are embittered against war and sense unerringly its wrong. In 1916-1919, they stood guard over conchies. To-day, they avow, openly, and before all the world, their own belief in conscience. The moral scars of the battlefield never can be removed from their being.

These "old contemptibles," now defending the conscience of youth, are to be honoured for their moral courage. When they believed in war, they were in the early flush of manhood. Over-age, they elect to send no youth to his doom. They add experience to their age and so warn from considered wisdom. They know the folly, the crime, the sadness and the sordidness of the disaster, called war. These members of the "Old Contemptibles" merit the honourable regard of all who would will peace.

The fire-eating "over-age" patriot of 1914-1919 has his counterpart to-day. Despite the Military Service Act of 1916, despite the disfranchising clause of the Representation Act, the C.O. of that period has succeeded in finding a place for himself in the life of the nation. He sits in Town Council and Parliament. You will find him among the Mayors, the Aldermen, the Provosts, and the Bailies. The C.O. of yesterday is very much a figure in public life to-day. You will find him apologising for his past, recruiting for war, strutting around in war-paint, an over-age conchie: the man who would not fight when age permitted: the man who wants youth to fight now he is over-age. Whether war be right or wrong, and even if war be the only way, the over-age "conchie" is one of the most disgraceful and contemptible figures in public life.

The Nelson Leader for Thursday, March 21, 1940, published, beneath big headings, reports of speeches delivered at Nelson and Colne by P. Noel Baker, M.P., and S. Silverman, M.P.

The opening paragraphs of the report includes the following passage:—

"At the Nelson meeting, held in the Labour headquarters, Mr. Baker was continually interrupted, and at one period he had to sit down until order was restored. Derisive laughter greeted many of his remarks, and one lady member of the audience shrilly demanded, 'How dare you talk of war? Have you no sons of your own?'

"Mr. Silverman was given a much more attentive hearing, in the course of one of his best constituency speeches, but his remark that he had spent three years in jail during the last war, but could not take up the same position this time, was greeted with cries of 'You are an M.P. now,' 'You are over military age,' and 'You would lose your job—that's why.'

"Mr. Sydney Smith, chairman of the Nelson Labour Party, presided."

Baker, despite persistent interruption, proceeded to defend the Labour Party, to justify the war, and to describe his experiences in Germany prior to the Great War of 1914-1918. He described the concentration camps under Nazism but admitted that the Government of Britain was responsible in part for the rise of the Nazi dictators. He added that Britain wanted victory only for peace and would make peace as soon as a German Government arose prepared for acts that would bring peace. The British Government would offer such a German Government equality of international co-operation, disarmament, and security.

We turn to the Leader report:—

"He (Baker) believed when this war was over . . .

"A woman—You will have a million dead men then. How dare you talk about war? Have you no sons?'

"Mr. Baker—Yes.

"The woman—Is he going to fight?

"Mr. Baker—He is twenty. He has registered and will soon be called up."

The following sub-heading and context is from the Leader report:—

"GOOD RECRUITING MEETING.

"In answering a further question concerning the loss of lives that would probably occur if the war became severe, Mr. Baker said he did not want to see life lost any more than anybody else, a remark which was greeted with derisive cries and the statement, 'Course tha does.' Mr. Baker took strong exception to the remark, and addressed the interrupter in a manner which revoked applause . . .

"During the applause which followed Mr. Baker's exit from the platform, a voice was heard to say, 'A good recruiting meeting.'"

Silverman's speech was, at least, Socialist in tone, despite its pro-war conclusions. He pleaded for Free Speech and urged that "doubts, difficulties and criticisms should be argued out." He added: "Do not let us be bitter with one another."

It is very difficult to respond to this plea when we know that conscientious objectors are being treated unfairly. To-day, Mr. Silverman supports the Government that is treating C.O.'s exactly as the Government of 1916 treated Mr. Silverman Surely, he should get this injustice put right as a condition of non-bitter discussion and attempt at mutual understanding.

Mr. Silverman continued :—

"What was the attitude of the Labour Party to the war? It was exactly the attitude of the Communist Party to this war until a month after the war.

"In answer to cries of 'No,' Mr. Silverman stated that was an incontroversible fact.

"A woman—Why doesn't the Labour Party change its mind?

"Mr. Silverman—Surely that is a ligitimate ground for a difference of opinion without heat, bitterness, and carping criticism."

We approve entirely of this retort to the Communist Party critics. But the errors of the Communist Party, its opportunism and betrayals, do not justify the present war-attitude of Silverman. It is no reply to those who are opposed to war.

Silverman continued :—

"He (Silverman) knew of nobody in the Labour Party who believed the Chamberlain Government was fighting Fascism, who believed they were fighting to make the world safe for small nations.

"Did they think he would trust Chamberlain with the life of a single conscript?

"A voice—But you are doing."

The Churchill Government includes Mr. Chamberlain and the Labour Leaders. The Chamberlain Government included Mr. Churchill. Does Mr. Silverman mean that, on the home front, in the matter of civil liberty in war-time, in the matter of paying heed to the right of conscience, the Churchill Government is superior to the Chamberlain Government?

Unlike Mr. Attlee, Silverman defines the present war as an imperialist war. He declared, rightly, that German Imperialism was as black as British Imperialism. He asked himself : did it make a difference which imperialism won?

"'In 1914-18 I felt there was no difference, and spent three years in jail as a result,' Mr. Silverman said. 'For my part, I could not take the the same view to-day.'

"At this point there were a number of interjections, people shouting out 'You are an M.P., that's why,' 'You are over military age,' and 'You would lose your job if you did.'

"Referring to the latter remark, Mr. Silverman said, 'As far as I am concerned, anybody can have it.'

"A voice—Yes, and you can have mine on the dole, too.'"

Silverman's retort about his job was not true. It was natural but incorrect, because it was not meant. Silverman's job secures him dignity, and £600 per annum.

We put these points to all over-age "conchies" who support war: Ought conscience to prompt such a "conchie," migrated from prison to parliament, to retire from public life? Ought he to take a vow of silence? Does he owe such retirement to his past conduct and to his present and future reputation?

The working class movement should consider these points seriously. If it honours the over-age conchie it should not permit the imprisonment of the young "Conchie" of to-day.

PARLIAMENT & C.O.'s

House of Commons, Tuesday, May 7, 1940.

Officers.

REAR-ADMIRAL BEAMISH asked the Secretary of State for War what decision has now been reached with regard to officers who have conscientious objections to combatant service continuing to hold commissions.

Mr. STANLEY—It has been decided that such officers shall be called upon to resign their commissions.

Civilian Employment.

CAPTAIN PLUGGE asked the Minister of Labour whether, in the cases of conscientious objectors who are permitted to remain in their present positions, he will suggest to the Tribunals that they should at least give them some other occupation which has relation to the sacrifices which are made by men in the Fighting Forces?

Mr. G. BROWN—The duty of specifying the civilian work which certain conscientious objectors must undertake as the condition of their registration is placed by the Act not upon me but upon the Tribunals. In deciding what work to specify the Tribunals have regard to the national interest, and I have no doubt that at the same time they keep in mind the sacrifices made by men called up for service in the Armed Forces.

SIR R. CLARRY asked the Minister of Labour whether he has considered the proceedings of a certain conscientious objectors' Tribunal, of which he has been informed, during which 71 objectors, many describing themselves as students, were heard, of whom two were granted total exemption and four were listed for military duties, the majority being registered in Class B, enabling them to evade their national duties and obtain lucrative work; and whether he will consider bringing in amending legislation immediately to allocate, without execption, all physically fit men who plead conscientious objection to military units in order that they may obtain the benefits of military discipline and be given the non-combatant duties appertaining to their units, in view of the fact that the exploitation of the existing law is the cause of much discohent and ridicule?

Mr. ASSHETON—My right hon. friend has seen a Press report of the proceedings of this Tribunal on 18th and 19th April, and it is understood that the great majority of the men were registered as conscientious objectors on condition that they undertook work in agriculture or forestry. The National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939, makes provision for Tribunals to order that a man shall be conditionally registered as a conscientious objector, the condition being that he must undertake specified work of a civil character and under civilian control, and this provision is intended to meet the cases of men who have a genuine conscientious objection to performing non-combatant duties in the Armed Forces. My right hon. friend is keeping under close review the manner in which the provisions relating to conscientious objectors operate but does not think the results of one or two days' hearings of one Tribunal point to any urgent need for amending legislation which would require all conscientious objectors to be posted to military units for non-combatant duties as suggested by the hon. member.

Thursday, May 9, 1940—Hearing in Camera.

Mr. ROLAND ROBINSON asked the Minister of Labour under what circumstances applicants for registration as conscientious objectors have been granted the privilege of a hearing in camera before local Tribunals?

Mr. ASSHETON—By Regulation 19 of the National Service (Armed Forces) (Miscellaneous) Regulations, 1939, the hearing of cases before conscientious objector Tribunals is in public unless the chairman in any particular case for special reasons directs otherwise.

"LETTERS TO THE EDITOR."

Under this heading, the well-known London paper, Public Opinion, for April 26, says :—

"Letters covering the years 1904-1940 written by Mr. Guy A. Aldred to many well-known newspapers on such varied topics as Free Thought, the Dartmoor Mutiny, Sanctions, Capital Punishment, Fascism, Civil Rights and Spain, are published under the title of "Letters to the Editor."

"The fruits of some of these past disputes have already been reaped, but the author is fair enough to publish some of the replies in opposition to his letters.

"Also published in this same series called the Word Library and written by Mr. Aldred are "Historical and Traditional Christianity and Dogmas Discarded."

UNWANTED "CONCHIES"

On May 6 last, the South Western Area of the West Riding St. John Ambulance Brigade refused to allow conscientious objectors to become members. This unit has 2,000 members. The chief officers decided that they would not accept C.O.'s. It had rejected previously the application for membership of a conscientious objector advised to join by the North Eastern Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal in Leeds.

Dr. G. H. L. Hammerton, Dewsbury, County surgeon of the S.W. Area of the West Riding St. John Ambulance Brigade, declared :—

"I, personally, would not give a lecture to a conscientious objector under any circumstances. We are all in this war together and I want nothing to do with conscientious objectors."

Tribunals frequently make it a condition of being registered as a conscientious objector that the applicant takes up agricultural work.

Three months ago the West Riding branch of the Farmers' Union, the biggest county branch in the country, adopted a resolution of the Leeds branch

"protesting emphatically against conscientious objectors being ordered to obtain work in agriculture, thus replacing our own farm men and farmers' sons where called up for military service."

Dealing with the question of C.O.'s and the land, Country Life, London, for May 11, says :—

"Conscientious objectors are let off military service usually on condition that they take up agricultural or other productive work. This is all very well in principle, but farmers in a good many districts, short-handed as they are, are not at all inclined to pay the labourer's wage to men whose scruples they view with considerable suspicion, and who, they think, ought to be drawing a soldier's and not a labourer's wage. The Saernarvon Branch of the National Farmers' Union, for example, has passed a resolution not to employ conscientious objectors, partly on the grounds that they do not know their job and it costs time and money to teach them. It is easy to see their point of view, the more so when the farmers themselves know quite well that ministers and schoolmasters hold instruction classes for these objectors whom they are then expected to maintain."

The Farmers' Weekly, London, for May 10, publishes a report from the East Glamorgan branch of the National Farmers' Union, showing that objector-workers were unwanted :—

"The branch received a strong protest from the East Glamorgan branch against the employment of conscientious objectors on the land. When the resolution was read and the county secretary, Mr. E. Verley Merchant, inquired what action they should take, there was a chorus of shouts of 'Don't take them.'

"It was decided to enter a protest in the hope that the tribunals would cease to draft such men on to the land.

The Grays and Tilbury Gazette for May 4 reported that employees of R. A. Wiltcher, the West Thurrock and Chadwell St. Mary sand and ballast merchant, had threatened to go on strike unless one of their colleagues, a lorry driver who obtained exemption as a conscientious objector, was dismissed. He was Leslie Tickle, of 82 Southend Road, Grays. He appealed to the Tribunal on Monday, April 29, and was exempted from military service on condition that he continued to follow his present employment. Aged 24 years, he is within a few months of the age at which his occupation, that of a driver of heavy vehicles, is reserved.

About 45 men were concerned in the strike threat, and a representative of the Essex and Thurrock Gazette was told by an official of the firm that, because of the men's attitude, there was no alternative but to dismiss the employee. Much regret was felt at this step, because he was a very good workman.

The Shoe and Leather Record, London, for May 9, reports :—

"A lightning strike by women and girls employed by the Balfour Shoe Co., Ltd., Irthingborough, resulted last week in the dismissal of a young man who had registered as a conscientious objector to military service."

Chatham Council have unanimously adopted a recommendation that all conscientious objectors in their employ should resign their appointments.

The Isle of Ely Education Committee, at their meeting at March, on Tuesday, May 7, decided to dispense with the service of teachers in elementary schools who had been registerd as conscientious objectors.

The committee also passed a resolution recommending this step to the managers of non-provided schools and to the governors of grammar schools in the county.

The Rev. F. F. Herbert denounced conscientious objection as rank hypocrisy. He was opposed by the Rev. L. A. Lewis. He said they had been told that they were fighting the war because they were opposing the spirit of evil which had robbed a country of its freedom, of its liberty of thought and of action.

Mr. Lewis added :—

"I am not a conscientious objector, I am not even a pacifist, and if I were not sheltering behind a minister's collar probably I would be doing my part in the Forces to-day."

On Tuesday, May 7, Reading Council stuck to its ban on conscientious objectors. The Corporation decided a month ago that their employees registered as conscientious objectors should be given leave of absence without pay for the duration of the war.

Alderman W. H. Bale said the work of the Council was linked up with the war effort, and already one conscientious objector had refused to do such work. During the coming months they would need 100 per cent. loyalty from their staff.

The Council by 24 votes to 19 decided to adhere to their decision not to employ conscientious objectors during the war.

Three conscientious objectors on the staff of the Sutton and Cheam Council have been granted leave of absence for the duration of war without pay.

Councillor W. L. Whiteley said, on May 7, that it worked unfairly in the case of one of the men, H. V. Williams, who was exempted on condition he remained in his present job.

"The Council are taking it upon themselves," he added, "to say that they will not allow Williams to fulfil the conditions laid down by the Tribunal."

Dismissed by the East Anglian Electric Supply Company, Neville Edward Payne Sandiford, of Onehouse Road, Stowmarket, who had been registered as a conscientious objector on condition that he continued in the employment of the Company, told the Tribunal at Cambridge, on May 6, that he was discharged because he was a conscientious objector. Two more conscientious objectors were discharged at the same time as himself.

He was registered as a conscientious objector on December 7, and he left the employment after two weeks' notice on April 27. He had been looking for similar employment.

Judge Lawson Campbell said Sandiford's best course was to go on looking for the kind of work he had been doing, and if he could not get it, he would have to come back to the Tribunal. In the meantime, the case would be adjourned.

John James Marshall, a Nairn conscientious objector, who lost his job as a painter because other tradesmen refused to work alongside him, has now got a situation with another Nairn painter.

Marshall was the only applicant to be granted unconditional exemption at a recent sitting of the North Tribunal. He explained that he became an objector at the age of twelve, after his father had died in tragic circumstances as the result of the last war.

He lost his former job following a protest by tradesmen along with whom he was engaged on a job in the town.

Plumbers, plasterers and carpenters held a meeting on the spot and intimated that they would not work so long as he was employed on the job.

"Because of the opposition of the workmen and public opinion generally, I had no option but to ask Marshall to leave," Mr. Donald Ross, his former employer, said. "Marshall is an excellent journeyman, and an honest, straightforward lad."

Major J. S. Miller, Kingsway House, Kingsand, writing in the Western Morning News, Plymouth, for May 6, justifies the victimisation of C.O.'s in Cornwall. Eulogising Cornishmen as heroic fighting men, the major says :—

"It is only natural, therefore, that they should resent the attitude of the objector to military service.

"Cornwall has had its conscientious objectors in the past, men who objected to the payment of duties on certain goods imported into the country. They were called smugglers, but they were brave men, and many died for their conscience.

"The position of the objector to military service seems analogous to that of the smuggler. The former gains protection from the hardships and dangers of war, while the latter gained illicit wealth, both gains being at the expense of others. There is, however, the difference that while one conscience is protected by the State, the other was ruthlessly crushed."

The Lytham St. Annes Council has decided that "conscientious objectors should be compelled to carry out work of national importance at rates of pay no higher than, and under conditions no better than, those of H.M. Forces."

This is an extraordinary resolution. In the first place, if the law holds that a conviction can be genuinely held by an individual then the conscientious objector should not be subjected to extra-legal conditions by any body acting under the law, and created by the law. If he is to be "compelled" to do specified work at ridiculous and impossible rates of pay then this compulsion and these conditions should apply to all those in reserved occupations, all above the present conscription ages, teachers, members of Parliament, councillors—in short, all who are not actually in the fighting line.

The form of society which would result from such conditions would be the totalitarian state in an even more rigorous form than exists in Nazi Germany. The soldier's pay is not sustenance like the labourer's, but pocket-money. Those who desire equality should seek to raise the hero's pittance to that which is worthy of a human being, rather than reduce a community to such despicable standards of industral conscription.

On Friday, May 3, the Wallsall and District Co-operative Society, which covers Wallsall, Wednesbury, Darlaston, Cannock, Sutton Coldfield, etc., decided by 338 votes to 125, to add a new rule, deciding not to employ "conchies" and to dismiss those at present in its employ, "while Great Britain is at war with a Foreign Power." This rule is being submitted to the Registrar General for approval.

In face of the facts collected by this article, the opening sentences of a leader published by the Nottingham Guardian, on May 6, makes queer reading :—

"QUEER CONCHIES.

"We are told the percentage of conscientious objectors in each category of conscripts. These percentages are low. But even a small percentage, repeated in many categories each numbering two or three hundred young men, aggregates a considerable total. In some quarters it is now put as high as between forty and fifty thousand, that is to say, in military parlance, three or four full divisions, or about an army corps. Perhaps, however, the fighting forces gain, rather than lose, by the absence of these people. What is rather different is the fact that many of these men are evading even the national service they undertook to perform."

How can the C.O., who agrees to accept work of national importance, wrongly, from my viewpoint, carry out the orders of the Tribunal if everyone conspires to make it impossible for him to do?

DANGERS OF COALITION

Important Speeches in the House of Commons

By JAMES MAXTON and S. O. DAVIES

In the House of Commons on Monday, May 13, the Prime Minister (Mr. Churchill) moved:—

"That this House welcomes the formation of a Government representing the united and inflexible resolve of the nation to prosecute the war with Germany to a victorious conclusion."

Mr. Maxton and Mr. Stephen divided the House and acted as Tellers for the Noes. The resolution was carried: Ayes, 381; Noes, 0. There were some abstentions or else some Labour Members were absent from the House.

Jams Maxton made an excellent speech, the social importance of his argument being obscured by the idea of war crisis that prevails. Although Mr. S. O. Davies, the Labour Member for Merthyr, did not vote against the resolution, he made an excellent speech from the working-class viewpoint, and insisted on truths war-time psychology does not recognise.

The noticeable thing about this coalition is that it is a coalition only for destruction. Hitler also stands for destruction. What is needed is something more than cries for destruction. If we must have a Ministry for War why not a Ministry for Peace? Why not lay down principles and a policy of definite peace and give the world something permanent and imperishable behind and beyond the slaughter? If this is not done, the world is to drift into a mere armistice and a chaos of war's aftermath. Either there must be a Ministry for Peace, for World Peace; or else chaos and more war must follow: or else, the war will end in world social revolution, marked not so much by thought, as by violence and despair. Humanity demands constructive principles and constructive policy.

JAMES MAXTON'S SPEECH.

Mr. Maxton rose to speak at 3.19 p.m. The Member for Glasgow (Bridgeton) said:—

I rise to oppose the Motion, because it conflicts with every political belief that I have ever held, and because it conflicts with the principles upon which I was elected to this House of Commons. I do not approve of the reconstructed Government. I view with great regret the fact that right hon. and hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway have agreed to cross the Floor of the House and to become part of His Majesty's Government. Their spokesman from the Front Bench paid tribute to Parliament as a great institution, and said that reconstruction of this sort, in face of the circumstances, could not have occurred in any other country. We know that it has been common form in France during all the time that there have been parliaments there. France has a great belief that by changing a few men round about, something new and strange may happen. I have never believed that the strength of the House of Commons lay in the fact that there was one body of men with certain principles upon which they were united on one side, opposed by another body with a different set of principles on the other, and that the clash of these two principles in debate and discussion—[Interruption.]. I would like to go back over it and show how the position in which we are to-day is due entirely to the fact that this mistake was made in the last war policy. The years from 1918 to 1939, when war broke out again, the wasted years, were, in my view largely due to the fact that the then existent parties coalasced and merged their principles, and then, at the conclusion of hostilities, there were left all sorts of individual rancours sapping all party principles, and there was no Government in this country that could face the creation of a new Europe that should have been created after the heavy cost that was paid for victory on the last occasion.

I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon having achieved the highest political governmental position in this country. His personality no one can deny, his courage no one can deny, and—I am getting more and more fatalist—it was written in the book of fate, say, perhaps on the Battlefield of Blenheim or some place, that he would one day be Prime Minister of this country, and perhaps it will be a comfort that he has got it now. But frankly, I cannot see the wonderful motive power that has been produced by the transference of the relative positions of the two right hon. Gentlemen opposite. It is the most amazing thing to me. I watched the fights of last week in this House from some considerable distance. I was 400 miles away. I do not think it was a pretty spectacle. I do not think that what has happened since makes it any prettier. It is very easy for the right hon. Gentleman above the Gangway to say that last week was fine and that this week was fine, and to whitewash the whole business. Last week was not fine. I was taking part in a by-election in the West of Scotland facing audiences of all different kinds and complexions, and the one thing that struck me last Tuesday and Wednesday was the calm, serious, sober way in which the electorate listened even to points of view that were obnoxious to the majority. They were calm and serious because——

Earl Winterton (Horsham)—Wait until the bombs fall and then they will take a very different attitude.

Mr. Maxton—I am quite satisfied that my fellow citizens in the West of Scotland will not get the wind up either. We were calm and serious while the right hon. Gentleman was making hysterical speeches on the Floor of the House of Commons. It does not require any great courage to attack the late Prime Minister. He was in an awkward spot and the jackals gathered around. It was their night to howl, and they howled, and now we have a new Government—a Government of all the talents—[An Hon. Member: "And you are howling"?] I put it to the House whether my utterances here can be described as howling. [An Hon. Member: "We might say 'whining'."] No. I do not think even that is a decent description. My hon. and right hon. Friends above the Gangway are a little bit nervy to-day. The excitement started over the fact that the Norwegian business had not been such a success as was expected. The Government came under serious criticism. [Hon. Members: "No."] I understood so. But, I can still read. I heard that the Navy came under serious criticism. [Hon. Members: "No."] I heard it from behind me. And so we make the First Lord of the Admiralty into the Prime Minister, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hillsborough (Mr. Alexander) First Lord of the Admiralty, so that in future there shall be no dubiety about the pugnacious, belligerent nature of the First Lord.

I cannot see what has happened to justify any change of attitude on my part. We are in this position to-day because of 22 years of wasted opportunity, 22 years of time, when this country was practically, for 20 years out of those 22, under the control of Governments not essentially differing in position or personnel from this one, and now you say this is going to create an entirely new orientation. The only difference is that the Prime Minister cuts out of his speech any reference to the possibilities of peace short of wholesale slaughter. I and my hon. Friends believe that the overwhelming mass of the people of this world, Germany included, are against the slaughter method of life, and I believe that that great force, mainly a working-class force, throughout the world——

Mr. Logan (Liverpool, Scotland)—Surely you do not see that in Germany?

Mr. Maxton—I can see people in Germany to-day, people that were my comrades and the comrades of hon. and right hon. Members above the Gangway, and I do not believe that they have deserted their principles.

Miss Wilkinson (Jarrow)—They have gone to the concentration camps.

Mr. Maxton—The function of a political working-class movement is to mobilise that anti-war opinion throughout the world and make it effective in the affairs of humanity. [Interruption.] I could make, if I were sitting there, all these cheap, irrelevant interruptions as well as anybody else, and I regret to say that I have frequently done it, but the fact remains that shouting about Hitler will not kill a single German, nor will it save a single Britisher. I admit to-day all the difficulties that face the people who hold anti-war beliefs; I admit all the difficulties that face those people who hold democratic beliefs, and the difficulties that face the efforts of the people who believe that the world must be reconstructed on a different social basis, but I stand by those principles of freedom and social equality. Principles are not any better for being thrown overboard, and although I admit all the difficulties, can we not have freedom without the young men of Europe being slaughtered——

Viscountess Astor—How?

Mr. Maxton—I say to the Noble Lady that now you have got us to this particular point I cannot show you how, but I can tell you what the principles are and tell you that just as the right hon. Gentleman got his chance last week so the chance of those who stand by these principles now will also come and that something better will come out of this slaughter and general folly.

In the course of the speeches which followed, Mr. Austin Hopkinson (Mosley) addressed an appeal to James Maxton, which reads sincerely but displays an inability to realise the gravity of having a Coalition Government, commanding an overwhelming majority, devoted to the issue of war, but with no policy for peace. No other cry but destruction. To make a shambles of the earth, of human minds as well as of human bodies, is a colossal and dangerous folly. The majority have the right, and at least they have the power, to decide that the war must go on. But surely, it is obvious, that war that does not define its goal in terms of harmony and social affection, in final terms of definite internataional wellbeing, is an error. All the members opposed to Maxton urged coalition for war. Not one suggested that, side by side with such coalition, there should be a Ministry for Peace, as carefully supported as that for war. To establish such a ministry would argue calm, fearlessness, and total lack of hysteria: would pronounce dynamic will towards justice, freedom, and human wellbeing. This is not defeatism but the contrary.

S. O. DAVIES' SPEECH.

At 4.14 p.m. Mr. S. O. Davies rose to speak. His was the last speech made before the voting.

Mr. S. O. Davies (Merthyr)—Everybody appreciates how difficult it is for one to reorientate his mind and assimilate the implications of what has just taken place. Hon. Members on the Government Benches may perhaps appreciate the anxieties that are felt on this side, and our misgivings. We cannot dismiss entirely from our memories how disastrous Coalition Governments have been in the past, and it is absurd that we should be expected to overlook all that they have meant in the days gone by. We ended the last Great War with a Coalition Government in power. I happened then to be very closely associated with the mining industry, and I remember distinctly the catastrophic consequences that were brought to bear on the miners at that time. We on this side have always been conscious of the great gulf that divides us in political, economic and social matters from the other side of the House. It is a gulf that some of us believe will never be bridged until radical changes take place in the social structure of this country. We have contended, and needless to say we shall continue to contend, that hon. Members opposite represent a society that we consider to be harsh and cruel, a society that dominates the class which has placed every Member on this side of the House here to represent it and to challenge that form of society. We know its incredible meanness, and we know the appalling dangers and insecurities of the form of society which exists at this moment, while this war is going on, for the poorer classes of this country.

Frankly, I do not envy the step that my right hon. Friends have taken, and I have a strong suspicion that that step will not add to their happiness. We shall await to see whether the injustices of this form of society will continue. No change of personnel will affect them unless a radical change in viewpoint is adopted by the Coalition Government. I shall probably be told that this is only a temporary expedient, determined by the exigencies of the war, but we must question, and we shall continue to question, how our resources in this country, human and material, are to be mobilised with a view to winning the war. We regard with considerable anxiety the fact that if the war is to be continued on the basis of a form of society in this country that is decrepit, and that is divided from top to bottom, once you step outside this House, with its class domination, with its inhibitions and its contradictions, if these are to be perpetuated during this war, we at any rate must dread the appalling consequences. If this is a war for democracy, it can be waged and won only when democracy is experienced by our own people, for a mere change of personnel will not end the devastating economic crisis that we know so much about. It will not in itself end unemployment and insecurity or bring greater comfort to the old age pensioners and veterans of industry.

I should like to ask whether this change will remove from the Statute Book of this country the Trade Disputes Act. [Hon. Members: "Oh!"] I am entitled to ask that before I support the Motion on the Paper. I want to try to get a line on the implications of the step that has been taken, and so far I have very little guidance as far as what we call the home front is concerned. I must repeat, Is it to be understood that that instrument, placed on the Statute Book with the deliberate intention of crippling and destroying the political power of the great trade unions of this country, is to be removed Is that part of the bargain that has been struck? I am entitled to an answer to that question, if anything like co-operation across the Floor of this House is expected. I am also entitled to ask whether the present contemptible Workmen's Compensation Bill which is before the House is to be withdrawn, or whether it is to be imposed upon the crippled workers of industry, who are represented by most of us on this side. A mere Coalition will not necessarily end the present unconscionable profiteering that is going on in the manufacture of arms, in the food supplies, and in the essentials of the very life of the people of the country. Have the Government started on a reorientation as far as those demands are concerned? Can there in fact be anything approaching co-operation in the political arena while all the present economic and social injustices prevail? My answer to that question is "No."

I shall be told that the only thing that matters is that the war should be won. We are of the opinion that this war will not be won by stultifying and hamstringing opinion in this House of Commons, and we shall most strenuously fight against any attempt to stifle fair and constructive criticism from these benches. We shall not willingly accept anything approaching voluntary totalitarianism, if that is the price of the Coalition that has been established. I draw some consolation from the fact that the working-class movement of this country has not been built up by a few individuals, however distinguished their service might have been. This movement of ours, which we will protect and fight for with all the strength and the jealous regard of which we are capable, was ushered into being by barbaric and intolerable conditions, and it will remain in being, wars or no wars, until those conditions will have been removed. We have never believed that those conditions can be destroyed by any magic, such as——

Mr. Marcus Samuel (Putney)—Might I ask the hon. Member whether he read the Question put last Wednesday by the hon. Member for West Leyton (Mr. Sorensen) to the Minister of Information "whether he will arrange for the fuller world appreciation of the best British characteristics by the dissemination of facts concerning the development of our social services, the progress and benefits of democratic trade unionism, political associations and local government, and the preservation of religious, political and literary freedom, especially in comparison with totalitarian and other States where this does not prevail or has been substantially destroyed?"—[Official Report, 8th May, 1940; col. 1218, Vol. 360.]

Mr. Davies—I shall express no opinion upon the profound contribution which the hon. and gallant Member has just made to the Debate. As I was saying before I was interrupted, we have never believed that the conditions to which I have referred can be destroyed or removed by any magic, such as by walking 12 feet across the Floor of this House. We shall watch this Government critically and anxiously. Their task presumably is to mobilise the men and resources at our disposal; but will they be able to do it? I am confident that they will not be able to do it unless the dead hand of the past is removed, and until the crippling weight of organised profiteering is lifted and the patriotism of high finance, of the money changers and gamblers on our stock exchanges is completely eliminated. These are the powers—and we have no illusions about this—which brought Nazism into being and the powers which will bring Nazism into being in this or any other country if their dominion is to last much longer. We on these benches are as prepared to fight Nazism as is any representative in any part of this House, whether that Nazism is partially concealed in this country or blatantly open elsewhere. We shall do so, but not at the price of sacrificing the principles which have ever been dear to us, namely the interests of our own people who have placed us in this House.

GEORGE LANSBURY

A memorial service to George Lansbury—whose remains were cremated in accordance with his wishes and whose cremation was attended with no signs of mourning—was held on Sunday, May 19, at St. Matthew's Church, City Road, London. The Mayor of Islington, and the Mayor and Mayoress of Finsbury, Aldermen and Councillors of both boroughs, and representatives of Peel Settlement, St. John St., attended. The Rev. G. C. Langdon, M.A. (the Vicar), declared that he had a tremendous love for George Lansbury and regarded him as the greatest man of his day, measured by the Christian standard of social service and personal integrity. Mr. Langdon declared that G. L. burned with holy indignation against wrongs done to the weak and the downtrodden.

An excellent report of the service and tribute was published in the "Islington Gazette."

In the "Daily Herald" for November 5, 1921, George Lansbury wrote, concerning the then Glasgow imprisonment of the editor:—

"Among these is Guy Aldred, editor of the 'Spur,' whose case is well-known to all readers of the 'Daily Herald.' He was born on November 5, 35 years ago. His life has been a strenuous one all through, and during the past ten years he has spent more time inside prison than outside. His one crime in the eyes of Scotland Yard and the Government is that he has desired to serve his fellow men and women. To-day he is serving a monstrous sentence of 12 months imprisonment, with four months added, because of a refusal to grant bail, and the charge which has landed him in prison is the old one of sedition."

The New Emergency Powers

We feel it to be our duty to publish the full text of the Order in Council, made at Buckingham Palace, the 9th day of May, 1940. Order No. 680, 1940, Adding Regulation 2c and 94A to, and amending Regulataion 39A of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939. S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927. Made under Section 1., Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, 2 and 3, Geo. 6, C.62.

Corruption of Public Morale

1. After Regulation two B of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (hereinafter referred to as "the principal Regulations") there shall be inserted the following Regulation:—

2c.—(1) If it appears to the Secretary of State that any person is concerned in the systematic publication of matter which is, in the opinion of the Secretary of State, calculated to foment opposition to the prosecution to a successful issue of any war in which His Majesty is engaged, and that serious mischief may be caused by subsequent publications of a similar character, the Secretary of State may cause to be served upon that person a notice in writing drawing his attention to the matter objected to and warning him that if he is concerned in any future publication of matter calculated to foment such opposition as aforesaid he will become liable to prosecution under this Regulation.

(2) If, after such a warning as aforesaid has been served upon any person, that person publishes, whether orally or otherwise, any matter calculated to foment opposition to the prosecution to a successful issue of any war in which His Majesty is engaged, or aids abets counsels or procures the publication of such matter, then, whether or not the matter is of a similar character to the matter in respect of which the warning was given, that person shall be guilty of an offence against this Regulation and shall on conviction on indictment be liable to penal servitude for a term not exceeding seven years or to a fine not exceeding five hundred pounds or to both such penal servitude and such fine.

Provided that it shall be a defence to any prosecution in respect of a contravention of this paragraph to prove that the person by whom the offence is alleged to have been committed had no intent to foment opposition to the prosecution to a successful issue of any war in which His Majesty is engaged, and had no reasonable cause to believe that the matter published was calculated to foment such opposition.

(3) If, after such a warning as aforesaid has been served upon any person that person, with intent to commit an offence against the foregoing provisioons of this Regulation, has in his possession or under his control any document of such a nature that the publication of copies thereof, or the aiding abetting counselling or procuring of such publication, would, if committed by any person who had been duly warned under this Regulation, constitute such an offence he shall be guilty of an offence against this Regulation and shall, on conviction on indictment, be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or to a fine not exceeding five hundred pounds or to both such imprisonment and such fine.

(4) Where it appears to the Secretary of State that a person upon whom a notice is to be served under paragraph (1) of this Regulation as being a person concerned in such publication as is mentioned in that paragraph, is so concerned in the capacity of a manager of any organisation engaged in the systematic publication of matter, the Secretary of State may direct that the notice shall state that the notice is a warning not only to the person upon whom it is served but also to the organisation named or described therein; and if on the prosecution of any person for an offence against this Regulation it is proved—

(a) that a notice so purporting to warn an organisation has been served; and

(b) That the person upon whom the notice was served was at the time of the service thereof a manager of that organisation; and

(c) that the person charged was at the time of the commission of the act in respect of which the prosecution was instituted a manager of that organisation or of an organisation engaged, in succession thereto, in substantially the same systematic publication as was formerly carried on by that organisation;

then, for the purposes of paragraph (2) and paragraph (3) of this Regulation, the person charged shall be deemed to be a person upon whom such a warning as is referred to in those paragraphs has been served.

For the purposes of this paragraph any person taking part in the management or control of an organisation, or holding or purporting to hold a position of management or control therein, shall be deemed to be a manager of that organisation.

(5) A prosecution in respect of a contravention of this Regulation shall not be instituted in England or Northern Ireland except with the consent of the Attorney General.

(6) A person shall not be summarily convicted of an offence against this Regulation, and a court of quarter sessions shall not have jurisdiction to try any person upon an indictment charging him with an offence against this Regulation.

(7) A notice served upon a person under paragraph (1) of this Regulation may be withdrawn if at any time the Secretary of State is satisfied that it is no longer necessary that the notice should continue in operation, and after the withdrawal of any such notice no person shall be deemed to be by virtue of that notice a person upon whom such a warning as aforesaid has been duly served, but without prejudice to the service of any subsequent notice.

2. The following amendments shall be made in Regulation thirty-nine A of the principal Regulations:—

(a) after sub-paragraph (a) of paragraph (1) there shall be inserted the following new sub-paragraphs:—

"(b) endeavour to incite persons who have become or may become liable under the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939, to be called up for service to evade any duties or liabilities which they are or may become liable to perform or discharge under or by virtue of that Act, or to perform or discharge any such duties or liabilities otherwise than to the best of their ability; or

(c) endeavour to incite persons to abstain from enrolling voluntarily in His Majesty's forces or in any civil defence organisation, or endeavour to prejudice the training discipline or administration of those forces or of any such organisation, or.";

(b) sub-paragraph (b) shall be re-numbered as sub-paragraph (d), and in that sub-paragraph for the words "sub-paragraph (a) of this paragraph" there shall be substituted the words "sub-paragraph (a), (b) or (c) of this paragraph";

(c) after paragraph (1) there shall be inserted the following paragraph:—

"(1A) In this Regulation the expression 'civil defence organisation' means any organisation in which persons serve, or are engaged, under any public authority in the performance of functions in connection with the defence of the realm or the securing of the public safety; and the expression 'enrolment' includes any procedure by which a person may become a member of His Majesty's forces or of a civil defence organisation."

Seizure of Printing Presses used in connection with the Commission of Certain Offences.

3. After Regulation ninety-four of the principal Regulations there shall be inserted the following Regulation:—

94A.—(1) If the Secretary of State is satisfied that any printing press, or a printing press under the control of any person, has been used for the production of any document in respect of which a person has been convicted of an offence against Regulation two C, thirty-nine A or thirty-nine B of these Regulataions, he may by order direct that the printing press, or that all or any of the printing presses under the control of that person, as the case may be, shall not be used until the leave of the High Court has been obtained for the use thereof, and any such order may authorise any persons specified therein to take such steps (including the taking possession of any printing press with respect to which the order is made or of any premises in which is contained or of any part of such printing press or premises) as appear to the persons authorised to be necessary for securing compliance with the order.

(2) Upon any application to the High Court for leave to use any printing press with respect to which an order has been made by the Secretary of State under the foregoing provisions of this Regulation, the Court, after affording to all persons appearing to the Court to be interested an opportunity of being heard, may, if satisfied that the use of the printing press for the production of the document in respect of which the offence was committed was due to a mistake, make an order granting such leave unconditionally or may, although not so satisfied as aforsesaid, make an order granting such leave subject to such conditions as may be specified in the order, or, if the Court is satisfied, either upon such an application as aforesaid or upon an application made by or on behalf of the Attorney General, that such leave ought not to be given, the Court may by order direct that the printing press be forfeited to His Majesty or be destroyed or otherwise disposed of, or may make such other order as to the Court seems just.

(3) In this Regulation the expression 'printing press' includes any machinery, apparatus or plant capable of being used for printing, lithography, photography, or other mode of representing or reproducing words in a visible form, or any type or other article belonging to such machinery, apparatus or plant.

(4) In the application of this Regulation to Scotland, for any reference to the High Court there shall be substituted a reference to the High Court of Justiciary, and for any reference to the Attorney General there shall be substituted a reference to the Lord Advocate."

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Comrade,—I wish to thank you for publishing such an interesting and enlightening paper as THE WORD as the best help to C.O.'s yet discovered by me. I have been reading same now for past five months and have recommended it to all my Objector friends.

Your son, A. G. Aldred, and I have had several interesting chats over the telephone and his advice to me is both helpful and appreciated.

I am a member of the N.C.L. and P.P.U.

With best wishes,

FRANK L. LASSMAN.

Leytonstone, London, E.11, May 6, 1940.

Dear Comrade,—Thank you so much for "The Rebel's Disciples." I've at last digested it, and shall pass on to others strong enough to assimilate without danger to their organisation! It was perhaps an interesing coincidence that, looking among theological books, I came on one entitled "The Vulgate: A Source of Errors," a most enlightening and thrillingly new exposition as far as I was concerned, and one which showed me along with yours, the awful pitfalls into which we've fallen, all because of wrong translations, a whole system of religion built up on about half a dozen errors in translation. It is almost too much to take in.

With all good wishes, yours fraternally,

AGNES N. MACKAY.

Liverpool, 1., April 28.

Dear Sir,—Please do not forget to send THE WORD each month, because it is a real friend to me. It is a splendid paper, and I am trying to get other C.O.'s in Kendal to take a copy each month.

Wishing you every success, and all the best.

I am, yours sincerely,

HARRY SIMPSON.

Kendal, April 30.

Dear Friend,—I find THE WORD very interesting and illuminating, especially the reports of Tribunals. I hope your work and efforts will receive continued success. I pass on my copy to other people in the hope of interesting them.

Yours fraternally,

S. STAY.

Salisbury, April 21.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—Is there any chance of "Socialism and Parliament" being put out soon? You sent me Part I. recently and I should like the other part. The reason is that I wish to put the anti-parliamentary attitude before the I.L.P. here. I am becoming convinced that the anti-parliamentary case is very sound, when one considers the Labour Party now, one can draw no other conclusion. If the U.S.M. has put out anything on its organisation I should like to have it.

Two other pamphlets I should be glad to see reprinted are "At Grips with War" and the one with press cuttings on your various adventures with the minions of the capitalist state.

I have to register on the 27th. We have to go to Reading now. The Judge, Maurice N. Drucquer, served from 1915 to 1919 in the Great War, and is on the Royal Reserve of Officers. Another member is a Major. Actually, their psychology is nationalistic and their emotional bias, rather than their philosophy, is summed up in the maxim: "L'Etat, c'est moi." Trained to authority, their minds are not given to wisdom or deeper understanding. Militarism obeys but never or rarely reflects. Thought is subversive.

I agree with W. A. Rathkey, that only intensive education will stop the workers being duped time and time again.

With best wishes, yours sincerely,

ALBERT McCARTHY.

Shirley, Southampton, April 16.

Dear Guy,—It is strange to reflect how those who declared that fundamental change in society was impossible, have pursued a course of reformism ending in social stalemate at home, and violence both at home and abroad. This war will, of necessity, end capitalism, as we know it. Society can never return to its old forms, traditions, and institutions. The violence is such that even most extreme direct actionist and defender of social violence as a progressive factor, would be appalled to outline it as a possibility, much less employ it as an agent. The Communist International has much to answer for in this matter, as well as the Fascist agencies. One day there will have to be a reckoning. Spain should be a lesson to us. When the time comes, the case against C.1, against the Fascist dictatorships, and against the democratic statesmen and democratic capitalism that betrayed Spanish vital democracy and its heroic working class, must be made crystal clear. If Socialism is not the next stage in social evolution, then the generations of men are doomed to experience a series of wars and violent struggles. Not permanent revolution, but permanent war in lieu of social revolution, is the lot of humanity.

That a form of Fascism is most probable here, is apparant everywhere. Nothing has been more conducive to this sorry result than the deification of the State and the glorification of violence, to which the C.P. has given so much time and money. The C.P. and the B.U.F. have both faded out for the time being, and eventually may be declared illegal. The poison which they spread will remain, and it will be hard work for the Libertian Socialists and Anarchists to eliminate it from the minds of the workers.

Perhaps the only good thing this war will do will be to separate the sheep from the goats, and show the workers who were the men who told them the truth, not as a means of getting into Parliament, but because they aimed at the emancipation of their class.

You have blazed that trail for some years, and I hope you will live to see some results for your work. All good wishes.

Yours in the Cause,

M. KAVANAGH.

Southend-on-Sea, May 3.

Dear Guy,—THE WORD improves with each issue. As a forum for C.O.'s, as a means of spreading the message of social emancipation, the paper is, to-day, without equal. Certainly, it will rank as high as "The Spur" and "The Commune" did in the past. Its message is simple. There is no parrot use of a mass of economic phrases or hackneyed quotation of statistical data. It is more important for the workers to understand the principles of the brotherhood of man than to grasp the intricacies of Marxian dialectics. Of what use is ability to quote Marx and Engels, if we justify Stalin and brutal dictatorship?

Further reflections have confirmed my first impressions of Lord Tavistock's meeting. It is time to call a halt to eulogising Fascists masquerading as guardians of liberty, peace, and workers' rights. The German worker is dazzled with the errors of National Socialism. We must not find excuses for Hitlerism. Tavistock does this and he is wrong. It is as logical to associate with Mosley as with Tavistock and it is undesirable to associate with either. If Lord Tavistock wants peace and Socialism, let him come boldly into our movement, but let him do so as the unqualified opponent of all persecution. It is right to indict Churchill only if we indict also, and in the most uncompromising terms, Hitler, Stalin, and Mussolini. Otherwise, it is special pleading and treachery. We must not compromise at this time of crisis with pseudo-Socialists and peace-lover-cum-fascist advocates. Genuine Socialists can make no such Popular Front for peace, for the result would not be peace but surrender to despotism. We must be opposed to the newly arrived peace-lover who finds Nazism so beneficial and Hitler so sincere.

Outstanding is the last message of the late Sir Walter Strickland. To you has fallen the task of continuing his fight for Freedom, so that "the march of homicide" can end for ever.

With kind thoughts,

ALEC KAYE.

Stepney, E., May 6.

Dear Friends,—Please accept my small contribution to your very excellent and well informed paper THE WORD.

Yours sincerely,

A. R. WARNET.

Brighton, 18/4/40.

Dear Aldred,—Just my mite to help you in the splendid work you are doing to help the poor young lads who are being forced against their will to take part in killing their fellows, with whom they have no quarrel.

Excuse haste,

GEORGE ROBERTSON.

Edinburgh, April 29.

COMRADE SHORT DEAD.

Our comrade, Tom Short of Rutherglen, after many months of agony, passed away on May 24. He was laid to rest in Riddrie Cemetery. A Socialist Service was conducted by his friend, Tom Anderson, of the Proletarian School. Comrade Short lived genuinely for the worker's cause and the world is poorer by his death.

Comrade Short was a devoted associate and disciple of the late John Maclean.

EMMA GOLDMAN

Emma Goldman outside Transport Workers' Headquarters, Euston Road, London, 1937, on her arrival from Spain.

"Associated Press" copyright.

Emma Goldman died in Toronto on Tuesday, May 14. She had a stroke in February and had been ill since. She was 69.

"Red Emma" was Russian born, but went to the United States as a girl of 15. She was imprisoned in 1893. Voltairine De Cleyre's famous speech on her imprisonment was reprinted in our Herald of Revolt.

During the Great War, Emma Goldman took a firm stand against conscription. Her indictment in 1917 led to Counsellor Harry Weinberger presenting a striking plea-in-error on law, conscience, and the Militia to the Supreme Court of the United States, at the October term, 1917. This case was summarised in THE WORD for August, 1939. Its law is as important in Britain as in the States.

Emma Goldman's "Anarchism" was published in our paper, The Spur, in October, 1917. Her striking and human essay, "On Release From Prison," appeared in the same paper in March, 1920. Also her explicit declaration, "What I Believe."

In 1919, Emma Goldman was deported to Soviet Russia. She was deported from Soviet Russia and so became a woman without a country.

We objected to some of her associations in Britain and a quarrel ensued that was never healed.

Commenting on her death, the New Leader for May 16, says:—

"In recent years she worked closely with the I.L.P. in connection with events in Spain and, despite political differences, rendered great help to our Party in defence of the P.O.U.M."

It is our intention to publish a full account of her career at an early date.

WHY THIS FASCIST MENACE?

MUSSOLINI & MOSLEY EXPOSED AND EXPLAINED

The advent to power of Hitler in February, 1933, was due to the Versailles treaty, and to the failure, even, of the Allied Statesmen to carry out fully even their contracts under this treaty dictated by them.

E. D. Morel wrote tersely, and prophetically on this subject in August, 1922, when he complained :—

> "The terms imposed upon the vanquished enemy are the direct outcome of these secret Pacts, of which our people—let it be emphasised once again—knew nothing at the time. . . . The peace, instead of being constructive, is destructive. Instead of healing, it makes new and gaping wounds in the political body of Europe. Instead of liberating it enslaves. Instead of suppressing militarism it gives to militarism renewed vigour. . . . Instead of destroying war as an institution it confers upon that institution a renewed lease of life. It is not peace but a sword which our rulers and their Allies have given to the world. . . . Upon the Cenotaph should be added this sentence: 'They died to make a better world. But those who sent them to their death have made a worse one.'"

Everyone knows to-day that Morel was right. That knowledge does not help the world to-day. We are faced with the fact that defines that knowledge in concrete terms. Hitler's attainment of supreme distatorship was the transient, but most realistic, triumph of counter-révolution in Europe. Since then, the whole world has trembled in fear of war and total retrogression, as Hitler and Mussolini pursued the policy of zig-zagging Germany back into a place in the sun. Hitler outbid the Kaiser for he wanted to become the Sun itself : to have the place and to be that place, the world's sole inspiration. Hitler is a commentary on stupid and humiliating peace treaties.

Italy and Germany have tended to become allies since the end of the last war. Mussolini and Hitler emerged from the underworld to greet and to sustain each other. Their common emergence might have meant little only they discovered politicians and statesmen and publicists in the Allied countries to applaud them. Their crimes against humanity were forgotten if not forgiven, as though days of reckoning did not exist. They found admirers in the Anti-Socialist ranks of Imperialist Toryism, of capitalism dreading the workers' struggle towards emancipation. The parliamentary opportunists and the pseudo-intellectuals of political Socialism professed to discover something allied to genius in the dictator-bullies of Europe.

In November, 1922, the Daily Herald, then the absolute and uncontrolled Labour Party organ, with unexampled treachery to the cause of the workers, and to all that represents democracy, attempted to whitewash the White Terror of the Fascisti, which held Italy in its grip.

Hamilton Fyfe was then editor of the Daily Herald and he dared to write :—

> "Whether the Italian Fascisti are enemies to the point of view of the workers in this country is not very clear."

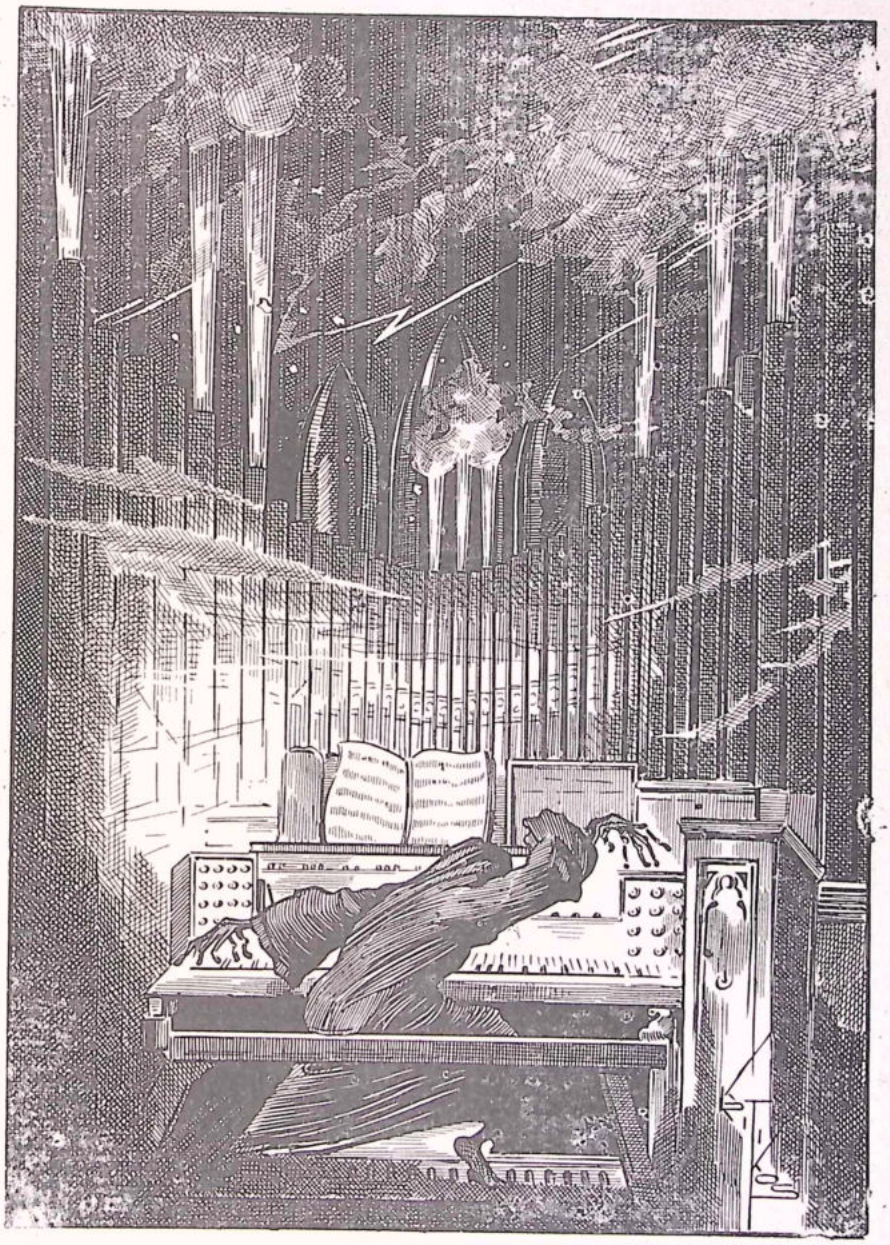
It was perfectly clear, but Fyfe did not wish to face the fact.



FURIOSO

[Reproduced from "The Spur," February, 1917.]

Fyfe wrote of Mussolini, with profound ignorance, as follows :—

> "It is impossible not to feel a certain amount of admiration for this man who has organised what he calls a bloodless revolution."

Mussolini organised, not a bloodless revolution, but a calculated, cowardly, and bloody reaction. He did this with the able support of the very weak-kneed parliamentary Socialists, then struggling to their extinction in Italy.

Five years later, Bernard Shaw published his apology for Mussolini and declared that Mussolini took charge of Italy because Malatesta refused to become dictator. Thus wrote Britain's famous teacup revolutionary, intellectual bagman, and doting sage.

Fyfe and Shaw helped the murderer of Matteoti, and the callous persecutor of his wife and children, to secure a good world press. They knew not what they did in their charlatan criminal folly but they knew that they did wrong. But they helped Mussolini to strut. The world's press featured the megalomaniac making thunderous orations about how he, the renegade, had saved Italy from Socialism, and how the whole world would be Fascist by 1942'

On June 10, 1940, Mussolini declared war on Britain, as previously he had invaded Spain with his Fascist legions, in order to make his nightmare come true. Dictatorship, mild but real, has been established, for the duration of the war, in Britain, and the British Commonwealth of Nations. The United States of America will be dragged into the conflict. Then Fascism or Dictatorship will be established, for the duration, in the United States. This is a serious menace, even if temporary, to all those principles of constitutional liberty and rights of the citizens that the English speaking race fought for so splendidly, largely through martyrdom, during the sixteenth seventeenth, eighteenth, and early nineteenth centuries. Who can say how long it will take to persuade dictatorial government, once it is established in the great English-speaking democracies, to resign its power?

In an interesting address at Brookwood Labour School, delivered in July, 1936, Rose M. Stein outlined the plans of the United States War Department for "Mobilization Day," the day the United States again enters into world war. She explained how the Industrial Mobilization Plan had been developed, and was being kept efficient, by the War Planning Division of the War Department, as a result of continued study since the conclusion of the great war, the structure being based on the experiences of the world war.

Very soon this mobilization for war must come into operation in the United States, as it has done in the British Empire, because men like Fyfe and Shaw had to inflate the power-conceit of Mussolini. The praise was based on falsehood. Mussolini no more saved Italy than Hitler saved Germany. Both have cursed the world, like devils conjured up from hell by the legions of the damned.

In 1932, Hessell Tiltman published a work, called Slump, in which he devoted a chapter to conditions in Italy. He described the increase in bankruptcies and the decline in rail traffic; the growth of unemployment; the forsaking of white bread for maize diet; and the reappearance in rural Italy of a disease prevalent only when the standard of living is low, called "pellagra."

The average hourly wage in the principal industries was, in 1928, about 5d. By 1932, wages had dropped to about 15s. 0d. for the full working week. The "dole" was 9¼d. per day and even this low unemployment benefit ceased after 13 weeks.

During the period that the workers' wages were £1 per week, the expenditure of the working-class family that lived, or starved, on this sum, was as follows:—Rent, 5s. 0d.; Food, 12s.–14s.; balance, clothes and pleasures.

Tiltman described the earnings and status of the agricultural labourers under Fascism.

In 1932, whilst Mussolini was rejoicing in the glamour of Bernard Shaw's uninvited and most ignorant praise, the Italian land-workers in Northern Italy were working eight hours a day for 2s. 2d., which being translated means 3¼d. an hour. In Cremona, Fascist law fixed the agricultural workers' wage at £17 10s. per year. In the South, the wage ranged from 1s. 3d. to 1s. 8d. per day. Also payments in kind were substituted for wages.

This misery steadily developed. In the two years, from 1935 to 1937, the consumption of meat in Italy dropped 11.4 per cent. A special bread, of low nourishment value, made its appearance. Italian workers, despite police fears, sarcastically termed the product "the bread of Empire!"

The fact that all was not well in Italy in 1932, did not prevent Sir Oswald Mosley from dressing cynically romantic youths up in black-shirts, and having himself photographed, haranguing them in Trafalgar Square, as became the future dictator of Britain. Mosley must have the power-complex badly developed to be fascinated by Mussolini and Hitler. It is charitable to believe that he never paused to consider how Hitler and Mussolini arrived at power.

Mosley admired the adventurous arrogance of the dictators and did not appreciate their criminal worthlessness. They contributed nothing to the thought of the practical well-being of the world. They were destroyers. And Mosley thought their worth above that of the martyred pioneers of democracy. Presumably, his training and environment has made him this way.

Sir Oswald Mosley was born on November 16, 1896. He was educated at Winchester and Sandhurst. He served in France during the great war, in the 16th Lancers and the Royal Flying Corps. He was the last man to escape from Ypres. His military career was interrupted by a serious injury to his leg. An operation saved his leg but for three years he was forced to wear irons.

For the remainder of the war, Mosley occupied official posts. At its conclusion, he was returned to Parliament for Harrow, as a Coalition Sonservative. This was in 1918. He termed his policy "Socialist Imperialism," and claimed later that it anticipated Fascism.

Mosley objected to the "Black and Tans" in Ireland and so left the Tory Party. He sat on the cross benches as an Independent Member. At 1922, he won his seat against an official Conservative, with a majority of over 7,000. He held the seat in 1923. As the Labour Party had repudiated the Communist Party, Mosley approached it for membership. At the 1924 election, he opposed Neville Chamberlain, and was defeated by the narrow majority of 77. At a by-election at Smethwick, he was returned as Labour Candidate by a majority of 6,582. He was now a member of the Labour Party Executive, and helped to draw up the Election Program: "Labour and the Nation."

In an interview on April 12, 1926, Mosley promised to renounce his title. He said:—

> "When I first joined the Labour Party I said I should renounced the title I should acquire on the death of my father. It will be quite easy not to be addressed by it."

The Sunday Express, August 23, 1928, reproduced from the Evening Standard of the previous week, a statement made by Mosley to the International News Agency representative. Sir Oswald Mosley said:—

> "I shall take the title; it is not worth giving up, although titles count for nothing.
>
> "The fact that I shall take the title will make no difference to my political activities. I shall continue my work as a Socialist member of Parliament.
> "I have always maintained that titles of any sort are absolutely worthless, especially in this day and age.
> "But then again, the title is not worth giving up."

In 1929, Sir Oswald Mosley challenged the unemployment policy of the Labour Government and then resigned both from the Government and the Party. He founded the New Party, which continued for two years. Its influence dwindled and in 1932, he avowed his Fascism and founded the British Union of Fascists. What he never explained was how he came to admire Mussolini, who had no solution for unemployment, and whose career has been one of unprincipled violence, from left to right.

In the year 1912, two American-Italian I.W.W. leaders, Joseph Ettor and Arturo Giovannitti were arrested and charged with having incited to the murder of a girl striker, and also with having engaged in "unlawful conspiracy" during a textile strike in Massachusetts. Their innocence was established but it required a tremendous agitation to bring home its truth to the authorities. In America, Emma Goldman played a great part in the struggle. In Italy, a young Italian Socialist, the editor of Lotta di Classe (the Class Struggle), denounced Capitalism in the bitterest terms. That editor was Benito Mussolini. He preached international working-class solidarity. Here is an excerpt from his article:—

> "The international agitation of the proletariat, aimed at saving the lives of Giovannitti and Ettor, who are threatened with death in the electric chair, is every day being more intensified. . . . There is still time to make our cry of protest sound aloud, and solemnly to unite ourselves to the millions of proletarians who, from one continent to another, renew and consolidate the inviolable pact of class solidarity in the names of Ettor and Giovannitti."

Giovannitti and Ettor were saved.

Fifteen years later two other Italian workingmen faced death in the electric chair—men as innocent as Giovannitti and Ettor. Mussolini, the Socialist editor, who had demanded that the Italian Government should protect its Socialist nationals in the United States, was now the Government of Italy, the all-powerful dictator overawing even the Italian Monarchy. He made no word of protest as the heroic Anarchists, Sacco and Vanzetti, were led to the electric chair.

In 1938, Gaudens Megaro published his Mussolini in the Making, at the usual impossible price for the proletariat, of 10s. 6d. Megaro depicts Mussolini as the revolutionary Socialist, anti-militarist, defamer of the Monarchy, enemy of God and religion. In these days of proletarian outlawry, he spoke and wrote with the same violence as has marked him in his days of conceit of power, oppression, and Fascism.

In his Socialist days, Mussolini had no time for the Monarchy, whether of Italy or any other country. Mussolini described the monarchs of Europe in these terms:—

(1) The Kaiser: "Lousy William, the Emperor of the Germans, the verbose and already ridiculous Attila of the twentieth Century."

(2) Edward VII.: "Libertine."

(3) Czar: "The hangman of the Neva."

When Antonio D'Alla, an Italian stone-mason, attempted to assassinate King Victor Emmanuel, Mussolini expressed disgust at the congratulations sent to the king on his escape and demanded the expulsion from the Italian Socialist Party of the Socialist deputies who had joined in these congratulations.

Mussolini wrote:—

> "The King is a citizen who is 'useless' by definition. Many peoples, ancient and modern, have dismissed their kings, when they do not wish to safeguard themselves better by sending them to the guillotine, and these people find themselves in the vanguard of progress."

People have been known to dismiss dictators too.

Mussolini was distinguished in the Socialist Movement not so much for his Atheism as for the vulgarity with which he expressed his Atheism. The German Socialist Congress at Gotha in 1875, and at Erfurt in 1891, declared that, in the Socialist Movement, religion is a private matter. Mussolini loudly challenged this declamation and maintained that religious belief of any kind was incompatable with Socialism. He lampooned Christianity without mercy. In 1904 Mussolini's anti-religious views were published in a pamphlet entitled Man and Divinity, published at Lugano, under the auspices of the International Library of Rationalist Propaganda. The author rejoices that, owing to the steady advance of science, the people everywhere are deserting the churches "where for generations and generations they dragged themselves to pray to a God—a monstrosity borne of the ignorance of mankind."

Mussolini compares Christ with Gautama the Buddha, and asserts that Christ originated nothing. He dismisses the Christian moral concepts as counsels of subjection, resignation, and cowardice. He wanted to raize the walls of convents to the ground, and so liberate the minds of the people from "the religious absurdity."

As regards war, this man to whom the Italian Monarch now entrusts the supreme command of his army, was declared by the then Italian authorities, while he was in Switzerland, sponging on Socialist comrades, "absent without justification when his class was called for army service."

Of militarism, Mussolini wrote:—

> "Militarism is in us, in our habits. It is we, . . . the sons of the proletariat who populate the barracks; it is our powerlessness that fortifies jingoistic patriotism . . . There is indeed an infallible means of destroying from its foundation the infamous militarist constraint: desertion!"

He denounced the national flag of Italy as "a rag to be planted on a dunghill." He asserted that the Italian army had never won and could never win a war. He anticipated the rise to power of a man of his type and preached his inevitable destruction. At this point he wrote:—

> "If there should appear a crazy megalomaniac, the proletariat would no longer lend itself, as a docile herd, to the holocaust."

Mussolini defined his megalomaniac when he wrote in 1910:—

> "Within me I recognise no one superior to myself."

In 1938, Angelica Balabanoff published, in English translation, her autobiography, My Life as a Rebel. She depicts forty years spent in active work for the Socialist Movement in Europe during its most historic period and describes, intimately, its leading figures. We use the word "Socialist" in a wide sense, and certainly not a severely accurate one.

Angelica Balabanoff saw the European Socialist Movement at the height of its triumph and in the depths of its failure and collapse. She held various positions in its ranks and was, at one time, co-editor with Mussolini, then a Socialist, of Avanti, the Italian Socialist organ.

The youngest of sixteen children born into a wealthy Russian household, she persuaded her parents to send her to a boarding school at Kharkov. Later, by renouncing her share of her father's wealth and accepting only enough to keep her on the level of the working girl, she went to the Université Narvelle at Brussels. She plunged into Radical and Socialist activity. An excellent linguist, she became an international figure on the Socialist platform. It was thus she met Mussolini. Her description of how they met at Losanna at a celebration of the thirty-third anniversary of the Paris Commune is told in another column by herself. She tells of his betrayal of the Movement and explains in her picture of the man why he became the criminal enemy of the workers and of human freedom everywhere :—

"His hatred of oppression was not that impersonal hatred of a system shared by all revolutionaries. It sprang from his own sense of indignity and frustration, his passion to assert his own ego, and from a determination for a personal revenge."

Does a sense of indignity and frustration explain Mosley? Does it explain all Fascism.

Full of Facts.

A Study in Church Economics and Biblical Forgeries.

A complete resumé of early Christian history. The first clear attempt to explain Christian Origins in the terms of Socialist Materialism as opposed to Secularist Secretarianism. Describes the beliefs of the heresiarchs and pagan basis of orthodox Church ideas.

Explains how the Christian Church became Pagan and Imperialistic. The author was commended for his research by the late Rev. Charles Voysey, B.A., Minister and Founder of the Theistic Church. To banish gods from the haunts of men and to inaugurate the Age of Reason is the purpose of this pamphlet. It is a call to Christian Socialists to discard their theological dogmas and superstition for a healthy social materialism.

The story of the "life" of Jesus and a study in the evolution of dogma. Shows that every true Christian must be opposed to war. Special appendix discusses the attitude towards war of the Bishop of Birmingham and other Christian scholars. Complete list great Christian martyrs for conscience.

The Civil Service Socialist, London, said of the first edition (1912) :—

"An interesting study of Christian origins from a Socialist standpoint . . . Historical Christianity was, according to Aldred, invented by the Church or borrowed by it from Paganism, and justified by wholesale forgeries in the gospels . . . contains much that is interesting and informing, together with some suggestive criticisms."

The Inquirer, London, the Unitarian weekly, reviewed the second edition (1920), and said :—

"A 'popular' account of the life of Jesus . . . The priesthood and 'Christian Socialists' are anathema to Mr. Aldred, and it is easy to see what the former must think of him, since he denies the orthodox dogmas which they maintain ('the complete Christ legend is contradictory and absurd' he roundly states) and holds that they 'are as miserable devotees of the cause of Mammon as any other of the interested Pharisees of despotism have ever been.'"

The Vanguard, Glasgow, edited by Alexander Ratcliffe, for June, 1940, says of the third edition :—

"A pamphlet of some 50 pages in which the author gives his views about Jesus and His followers of early times. Repudiating Biblical testimony regarding the birth, etc., of Jesus Christ, Mr. Aldred goes on to state that neither Jesus nor His parents were Jews, and also that Jesus was not descended from David. It is also asserted that Jesus was not born at Bethlehem, and, strangest assertion of all, it is affirmed that Jesus was not a Christian! He was just a Rebel! As is expected, the Deity of Jesus is denied, and it is held that the Apostle Paul 'did his best to paganise Christianity.' Whilst we most certainly disagree with Mr. Aldred in his unjustifiable and unproved assertions about Jesus, his pamphlet is enlightening and worth reading. It also contains a List of the Marian Martyrs, and a Statement on 'The Church and War.' Christian people who read 'The Rebel' must expect to be shocked."

OTTO BAUER

A GREAT EUROPEAN SOCIALIST

By P. J. Dollan.

[P. J. Dollan, now Lord Provost of Glasgow, wrote this article on Otto Bauer for the Forward, Glasgow, July 16, 1938. It should be remembered that Dollan attained his civic dignity by writing articles like this. It is reproduced because the sentiments expressed by Dollan in this article are opposed to the sentiments he now pronounces so loudly. The italics are not in the original.—Ed.]

Otto Bauer, the greatest of all Austrian Socialists is dead, the victim of Allied Governments' treachery in the Peace Treaty, and of Dolfuss and Hitler treachery in recent years.

Bauer, the leader of Austrian Socialists from 1919 until the Dolfuss armed rebellion of 1934, was one of the noblest men in our ranks, and if he had been supported by Great Britain in the critical post-war years, he and his comrades would have saved Europe for democracy.

I met him at the International Socialist conferences in Marseilles, Brussels and Vienna, and again had the pleasure of meeting him on other two visits to the Austrian capital, where he was revered by all democrats as the greatest thinker and statesman of his time.

He would have saved Austrian Socialism and democracy if he had been allowed to carry out his plan for a democratic union between Germany and Austria. But the Lloyd Georges and the Baldwins were too stupid to see the wisdom of his policy, and in opposing it they prepared the way for Fascism and reaction.

The opposition of the Allied Governments prevented Bauer getting his proper place in international politics, and those who kept him out of international affairs committed a crime against peace and progress. The timidity of some of the German Social Democrats was also a hinderance to his leadership.

Otto Bauer led all the International congresses in my time, and was regarded by every delegate a sone of the biggest intellects in the European Socialist Movement.

It is not easy for us, who lived so far from Austria, to say whether he or the militants were right. But we do know that if Otto Bauer had been supported by the British Government, as Franco had been supported by the Tories, there would have been no Nazi terror in Germany and no Franco insurrection in Spain. He had to grapple with difficult problems.

SOCIALISM BY FORCE.

The failure of the Bela Kun Communist rising in Budapest convinced him that any attempt to establish Socialism by force in Austria would fail.

He was afraid of the combination of Italy, France and Britain, and the independence of Austria would be sacrificed if the Socialists adopted premature and badly organised shock methods. He hoped the British and the French would realise the wisdom of strengthening Austria for democratic purposes, and that they would encourage the alliance of Austrian and German Socialism.

History has taught us his hopes were not realised. The French and the British encouraged reaction in Austria and made it possible for Dolfuss to assassinate the social democracy of Vienna and Austria.

Vienna was then the Mecca of European Socialism and the inspiration of all in the world who were working for social reform and gradual progress. It was too energising for social reform, to be allowed to live as a Socialist city.

It was crucified by Italian and British capitalism, and Otto Bauer and his comrades had to fly into exile after three days of heroic fighting against the armed hordes of Dolfuss and reaction.

Thousands of Socialists were imprisoned and many lost their lives in that civil war of 1934, which was aided and abetted by all the worst elements of European capitalism.

THE CIVIL WAR.

Otto Bauer, in the few months before the Dolfuss insurrection, had a suspicion it might take place. He helped to arm his Socialist comrades, but always warned them against precipitous action. He knew that their resources were too weak to buy armed strength and that they could not hold out against the armed might of Austrian and European reaction.

Some small supplies of arms reached the the Austrian Socialists from Great Britain and other countries, but they were woefully inadequate to cope with the hordes of guns and materials sent in by Mussolini.

Austria lived for some months on the brink of civil war, but Bauer always advised his comrades that they were not to start the bloodshed.

I believe I am right in saying he and his wife and some friends were at a cinema when the civil war broke out, and it was then too late to avert the catastrophe. He took his place alongside his comrades in the tenements in defence of democracy, and was severely wounded during the fighting.

He escaped to Czecho-Slovakia in the hope of reviving social democracy in Austria, and was making fair progress when the Hitler hordes swamped Austria and imposed an even worse form of terrorism on the country than that inaugurated by Dolfuss.

Otto Bauer died in Paris at the age of 59, a martyr for International Socialism.

He will live, however, in the history of our Party and share in the pioneer glory of Jaures, Keir Hardie, Karl Liebknecht, and others who led democracy on the way to freedom.

The cause for which Otto Bauer gave his life will yet triumph in Austria as elsewhere.

JOHN MACLEAN.

Labour's Northern Voice, Manchester organ of the Independent Socialist Party, in its issue for April, 1940, says :—

"John Maclean by Guy A. Aldred . . . This is the life story of a man who put up a great fight for Socialism in Scotland and was sentenced to three years' penal servitude in 1918 for his 'seditious' speeches. His great speech from the dock is given in full. James Maxton reviewing the first issue of this booklet in 1932 wrote: 'I am glad that Aldred has issued this short life, as I believe it to contain the inspiration which, communicated to hundreds of young Socialists to-day, will give them the fighting vigour necessary to carry out Movement eo early success.'"

PHILIP BOYLE.

The following account of the Court Martial of Philip Boyle appeared in the first final of the Evening Times, Glasgow, Friday, May 24. It was omitted from the later final but reappeared, in essence, the next day, in the Glasgow Herald and the Bulletin. The Scots Daily Express also published a report.

GLASGOW C.O. COURT-MARTIALLED

Refused to Wear Uniform

The first conscientious objector in Glasgow to be court-martialled on a charge of refusing to obey a military order appeared to-day before the court-martial, which was held in a city barracks.

Accused was Private Philip Boyle (21), whose application for registration as a conscientious objector was rejected both by the Glasgow Tribunal and the Appellate Tribunal in Edinburgh. The charge which Boyle faced was one of having, when on active service, disobeyed the lawful command given by his superior officer and refused to wear his military uniform when ordered to do so by a company sergeant-major.

The court-martial was held in the library of the barracks. The Court consisted of three commissioned officers—Major L. V. Evans (the President), Captain R. A. Ogg, and Lieutenant P. M. Sinclair. The prosecution was conducted by Second Lieutenant G. Menzies Anderson, a councillor in Glasgow Corporation.

Boyle, who was wearing battle dress, was brought into the library under escort. Also present at the court-martial were his father and Mr. Guy Aldred, a friend of accused.

After Boyle had said that he did not object to being tried by the President or the other officers, the three members of the Court took an oath that they woulld "well and truly try the accused."

"I PLEAD NOT GUILTY."

The charge having been read, Boyle was asked if he was guilty or not guilty, and replied that he did not admit that he was under military law.

The prosecuting officer pointed out that acccused had been called up in terms of the Military Training Act, 1939, and as such he was subject to military law.

So far as a conscientious objector was concerned, said the prosecuting officer, he could go before a Tribunal which considered his case. If this Tribunal did not grant an objector exemption he was then called up.

After consulting with Mr. Guy Aldred, accused said, "I plead not guilty."

The first witness was Company Sergeant-Major H. Allan, who said that on Friday, May 10, he went to the guard room of the barracks, where Private Boyle was in confinement in one of the cells. Boyle was a recruit who had been posted to the witness's company.

He told Boyle that he was going to give him an order to wear a uniform and pointed out to him the seriousness of refusing to obey that order, telling him that he would be liable to a trial by court-martial.

QUITE UNDERSTOOD.

Boyle told him that he quite understood all this.

"I then said, 'Private Boyle, I am giving you an order to put on your military uniform,'" said the witness. "Boyle replied, 'I refuse to wear any form of military uniform.' Boyle was then kept in confinement."

In cross-examination Boyle asked the witness —"Did my reply indicate any personal disrespect to you as a superior officer?"—"No."

"Was it clear to you that I made this reply because I was a conscientious objector?"—"It was clear to me."

Sergeant Edward Davie, the next witness, said that he was present when the C.S.M. ordered Boyle to wear his military uniform, and the private refused to do so.

That concluded the evidence for the prosecution.

The only witness called for the defence was accused's father, Richard Boyle, who spoke to his son's good character. He said that his son was a perfectly serious conscientious objector, having been brought up in a Roman Catholic home. He had never been in any trouble, and had held his views for four or five years.

WRITTEN STATEMENT.

Summing up the case for the prosecution, Second Lieutenant Anderson said that if there was any defence at all to the charge it could only be on conscientious grounds, and in a military court that was quite irrelevant. He submitted the command given to Boyle was lawful and that the accused had refused to obey it.

Boyle then handed a written statement to the Court, in which he said that he objected to war not because he was afraid of what might happen to him—but because he objected to killing. He had to register his protest, and he hoped to serve whatever sentence might be imposed on him without bitterness or dismay. When released from serving that sentence he could only renew his protests. He did all this without any disrespect to the military authorities and thanked the Court for its courtesy.

That ended the hearing of the court-martial.

Sentence was promulgated on Thursday, June 6. Boyle was sentenced to 112 days, reduced to 28 days. He was removed to Barlinnie Military Detention Prison.

UNSOLICITED TRIBUTE.

The Evening News, Glasgow, in its issue for Thursday, March 28, published a note on "Peace Offensive" in its "Talk of the Town." Here it is:—

"Opposite Glasgow Cathedral is Bakunin Hall, run by Guy Aldred. You'll know Aldred better than his master Bakunin.

"Just now he is boosting the forthcoming meeting in the St. Andrew's Hall, at which the Marquis of Tavistock will try to find support for his peace plan, with John McGovern, M.P., also on the platform.

"Guy Aldred also runs the Strickland Press in George Street. When his life-long friend, Sir Walter Strickland, died not so long ago and named Aldred in his will, the energetic Glasgow Pacifist stated that he would devote his allowance to anti-Militarist propaganda. He is doing it."

Whether this is quite true or not in every detail, it is very nicely said. Only it requires much more than the diminished allowance from Sir Walter Strickland's overburdened estate to conduct a campaign for sanity and social health in these days of war, oppression, misery, and despair. For war means a wearied world and an oppressed humanity.

In a later paragraph, there is a reference to John McGovern. This concludes as follows:—

"McGovern is not an out-and-out Pacifist like Guy Aldred. I can remembered that he encouraged the recruitment of the International Brigade for Spain."

CAPTAIN RAMSAY.

The Times, London, in its issue for March 24, 1940, says:—

"Capt. A. H. M. Ramsay, M.P., was detained under Defence Regulation 18B as it stood before its amendment by the above Order in Council."

The Times then reproduces the regulation under which Captain Ramsay was interned, and explains its operation fully. It proceeds to describe Captain Ramsay's career:—

"Captain Ramsay has been Unionist Member for the Peebles and Southern Division of Midlothian and Peebles since 1931. He was educated at Eton and the Royal Military College, Sandhurst. In 1913 he joined the Coldstream Guards, and during his service in the last war he was severely wounded. He served on the British Military Mission in Paris in 1918."

The Times then recalls how, after the resignation of Hore Belisha as Secretary of State for War, Captain Ramsay tabled the following motion:—

"Control of the Press—That this House realises that the reaction of the national Press to the announcement of the change in the Secretary of State for War proved unmistakable evidence as to the character and extent of the powerful organisation that influences or controls the policy and output of our national publicity services, and further confirms the specific charges repeatedly made during the last few years by leading Italians, Slovaks, Sudetens, Spaniards and Arabs to the effect that by systematic dissemination of untruths, suppression of vital truths, and selection of persons whose opinions are featured, the British publicity services are clearly shown to be under a control as effectively concealed as it is operated, which systematically biases them against any national cause, Christian or Mohammedan and favours internationalists and Jews."

This motion reveals Captain Ramsay as a most dangerous person in that he possesses neither a sense of humour nor yet one of proportion. He definitely favoured the Italian and German invasion of Spain and described that blackguardly excursion and crime as Spanish National Patriotism. Early in July, 1938, in pursuit of the same reaction, he attacked the proposal to hold an International Freethinkers' Congress in London, by introducing the following resolution in the House of Commons:—

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prevent the participation by aliens in assemblies for the purpose of propagating blasphemous or atheistic doctrines or in other activities calculated to interfere with the established religious institutions of Great Britain, to amend the Aliens Restriction (Amendment) Act, 1919, and for other purposes connected therewith."

Will Thorne, M.P., protested that Captain Ramsay resumed his seat without saying "a single word about the Bill he wished to introduce." The Speaker commented: "I noticed the same thing myself." And Edmund Harvey, M.P., the Liberal Quaker, opposed the resolution in a speech in which he declared:—

"St. Augustine of Canterbury was an alien, St. Paulinus of York, when he went to King Edward, was an alien coming to upset the religious institutions of the country.

"'Go back,' he cried, '300 years and think of the time when a Puritan House of Commons condemned for blasphemy a Quaker whose tongue was bored with red hot irons and whose forehead was branded. I think that the House then dishonoured itself more than its victim. Go back some 50 years, and think of how the House shut out from its membership one whom they regarded an an Atheist, some perhaps as a blasphemer, and when he lay dying the House expunged from its Minutes the record of what it had done. We do not want to go back to that sort of thing. We want to remember rather that we are the guardians of the spirit which John Milton expressed in his noblest prose work. We want to remember his words to-day:

"Give me the liberty to know, to utter and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties.'"

Captain Ramsay obtained leave by a majority of 31. No Cabinet Minister voted with him. Sir John Simon voted against him. Every Catholic Labour Member except one voted against him. Three members of the Opposition voted with him. Generally it was felt and known that Captain Ramsay was standing for a Mussolini-Hitler persecution and reaction.

SIR WALTER STRICKLAND'S WAY TO PEACE

His Views on Religion—Buddhism and Christianity

[The following article from our pen was published in the Malton Messenger for July 22, 1939. It is reproduced exactly as printed in our contemporary, and we have preserved the original headings. We have summarised faithfully Sir Walter Strickland's views, but it must not be concluded that we endorse them in their entirety. We agreed with Strickland on many points and we opposed him on many points. Our present business—and it is a promise made to him during the last year of his life—is to state correctly his approaches to the social problem, especially in its aspects of war and religion.—Ed.]

Sir Walter Strickland links us with the far away past. It is difficult to realise how completely has disappeared the world into which Strickland was born. Since he grew into a thinker and visioned an order in which the problems which afflict mankind would have been overcome the length of his years and the memories they recall play a part in the study of his biography.

Strickland was one year old when Miss Berry, famed as a pioneer woman of letters of the eighteenth century who carried her memories into the nineteenth, died. Miss Berry was born in March, 1763. In her closing years she recalled Charles Fox wondering how people could make such a fuss about the dullest of dull books—Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations." Fox was an Eton boy, just promised a trip to Paris by his father when Miss Berry was born; Pitt was a child in the nursery, Burns was toddling in and out of his father's cottage, and Fanny Burney's series of now forgotten novels were to the generation of young people what Scott's were to the next but one. The youths and maidens of that time had to content themselves with bad fiction, but found compensation in good history, for Gibbon was introducing the world to his learning and publishing volume after volume that caused them to be proud of their age. Dr. Erasmus Darwin was writing verses and anticipating evolution as he went round in his chaise to his patients. Erasmus Darwin was born in 1731 and was the grandfather of Charles Darwin, born seven years after his death. Erasmus Darwin could never have anticipated how evolution and science would be linked with the name of Darwin.

Strickland's boyhood and youth—the period during which he progressed from the cradle at Westminster via Harrow to taking his degree at Cambridge in 1876—belonged to a most interesting era. It might be described as a period of magnificent and historic obituaries. Russia comes into the picture, but how far removed from the Russia of to-day. True, despotism may still exist in that country but it is a despotism of another age and of a different order. Not less terroristic, but with the splendour of its dynasty vanished: a Russia set in a new Europe and a new Asia, in a world of apprehension and horror but a world of experiment, unparalysed by the dead past.

When Strickland was four years old the Emperor Nicholas I, known as "Nicholas with the Bloody Stick," died, worn and broken, and not yet fifty-five years of age. He was the grandson of the great Catherine and son of the miserable Paul. The sinister Metterinch died when Strickland was eight years of age. This man was born in 1773 and for a time was the master of Europe. In those days no one thought of a Stalin or of a Hitler. Metterinch negotiated the marriage of Napoleon and Marie Louise. He built up a powerful Austria and made Vienna a famous city of power and diplomacy. During the first years of Strickland's wandering on the Continent, Vienna was probably the most famous of all European cities, not excluding Paris, and Austria was a great and powerful empire. At the time of Strickland's death, Austria was passing into oblivion and Vienna is now a provincial town.

A STUDENT OF PHILOSOPHY AND HISTORY

Reference to some of the other personalities who passed away during Strickland's early years will enable us to understand his background, always remembering that he was a student of philosophy, history and literature. The death of the persons mentioned, and of others not noticed in this essay, represented real memories and real links with the past to Strickland. In his later years, when all about him was changing, they would constitute more important historical associations than at the time of their occurrence when all seemed so firm and established.

In 1855 Joseph Hume and Samuel Rogers passed away. Hume, who was born in 1777, will be remembered as a great Radical politician, who time after time championed the cause of Thomas Paine and of Richard Carlile in the House of Commons. Rogers is remembered as the author of "Pleasures of Memory." He represented the bridge that literature passed over from the old condition of patronage to the new one of independence. He heard the talk of the town on Johnson's letter to Lord Chesterfield and lived to see the removal of most of the taxes on knowledge. Commencing his literary adventures when publishers were patrons he lived to witness Charles Dickens' plan of independence for the publishers themselves. Other names are those of Robert Owen, Lady Noel Byron, Charlotte Bronte, Thomas de Quincey and Macauley-Macauley, who elevated letters to a place high above law and statesmanship.

The names of de Quincey and of Macauley bring us directly back to a consideration of Strickland's Cambridge days. At Cambridge, during Strickland's undergraduate period, Bishop Lightfoot enjoyed the outstanding position as the scholar of the University. Bishop Joseph Barber Lightfoot, flourished 1829-1889, had what the pendants term a brilliant career at Trinity College and was elected a fellow of the college a short time after Strickland's birth. During the time Strickland was at Harrow and Cambridge, Lightfoot's reputation was very high in orthodox scholastic circles.

FASCINATED BY BUDDHISM.

Strickland found himself coming into constant collision with Lightfoot's authority and driven more and more to a study of Buddhism which later fascinated him. He also came under the influence of de Quincey who, although writing from an orthodox standpoint, had opposed Lightfoot's conclusions. The bishop laboured to disprove any connection between Buddhism and the Essene doctrine. Strickland concluded that not scholarship but bias had caused Lightfoot to maintain this position. In contradistinction, he held that through Persia, Buddhism had penetrated into Judea, and so influenced the teachings of the Essenees and of Jesus of Nazareth.

Strickland carefully studied de Quincey's remarkable reply to Lightfoot, and wrote a monograph on it complaining that de Quincey's conclusions were clouded only because he did not wish to depart too seriously from orthodoxy. Strickland pointed out that de Quincey had permitted his genius to halt in face of the mere talents of Bishop Lightfoot, and developed quite an interesting study on the relationship of genius to talent. He regarded genius as something original and worthy and talent as something almost spurious and counterfeit. He maintained this view to the end of his life.

A FACTION OF JEWS.

On the question of Buddhism and Christianity, Strickland concluded that the Essenees were an ascetic faction of Jewish gnostics or eclectics situated to the east of Jordan, versed in mysticism and given to astrology. Despite their superstitions they upheld clear social ideas of Communism and Pacifism. Following de Quincey Strickland claimed that the Essenees employed twelve as a symbolic number and that twelve stones played a part in their very simple worship. Jesus and his disciples, he averred, were actually a sub-section of reforming Essenees who taught a return to righteousness and actually expounded early Christian doctrine. The differences that subsequently developed between Christianity and Buddhism were never intended to exist by the first apostles of Christianity.

INTELLECTUAL ADVENTURES IN SOHO.

After leaving Cambridge, Strickland discovered a modern Arcadia in "the not too odiferous purlieus of upper Rathbone Place." He has described very fully his adventures in this portion of London, Oxford Street, Tottenham Court Road, Charlotte Street, Fitzroy Square, Soho, the very heart of conspiratorial and refugee London. Here, at the age of 28, Strickland found Hinduism, Communism, conspiracies against the French Government, atheistic meeting places and discussions on the heresies of Charles Voysey, whose trial for heresy by Privy Council had led to the establishment of anti-Christian Theism. In these days the names of Bradlaugh, Annie Besant and Charles Voysey were the most significant in the intellectual circles in London. In Soho Bakunin's friends were organising Nihilist meetings.

Just as Strickland developed a wanderlust in Yorkshire so he learned, whilst indulging the intellectual life, how to live in lodging houses and to travel third class in London. The period after his graduation in 1876 and before his close association with the Continent in 1890 was a most formative one.

Exeter Hall had just become the great centre of orthodox missionary activity. It was idolised by the saintly and denounced by the radicals and the wits. Built in 1831, Exeter Hall was purchased by the Y.M.C.A. in 1880 for £25,000. At the time that Strickland was wandering through Soho, the Hall was enjoying its heyday.

The ideas that Strickland developed during this period, both as regards the place of the Church in society—the relation of the pulpit to the state—and also the peace of the world returned to him towards the end of his life. He was very jealous of the traditions of English literature and English thought and expressed an anti-English bias largely from anger at the abuse of a great heritage. He thought that the English-speaking people ought to give up their imperialism and not permit themselves to drift to war; that their influence in the world was historic and could not be under-mined. As I have pointed out in a previous article, he was descended from the Dutch on his mother's side and looked to the Dutch playing a part in averting war and assisting the cultural development of mankind. He clung to this idea despite his clear views on the subject of colonisation, to which he was opposed. He believed that a major war could be avoided even under Capitalism.

HIS WAY TO PEACE.

His solution of the war problems, short of Socialism and en route to Socialism, might be summarised as follows:—

THE ENGLISH PEOPLES CAN ESTABLISH PEACE.

(1) Re-establish the power of the pulpit. He believed that the Church should become the centre of spirituality and grace without creed. The 39 articles of the Established Anglican Church should be abolished: the thought of the Church should be free: its teaching, first century in spirit and in ethics. The Church should be open to all men of genius who felt the power to serve and to preach.

(2) Heresy should be promoted and be allowed to correct itself. This would remove death from the Church.

(3) Whether ministers of the State Church or ministers of the independent Churches, the aim of the minister should be to re-establish himself as a Clerk in Holy Orders. He should serve the community until social changes improve the conditions of the people, and slums and poverty are destroyed. The minister can play a real part in the poor districts as advisor, letter writer, public defender, etc. An active ministry is required more to-day than ever and the minister without being sanctimonious or hypocritical, could establish a real power of goodness.

(4) Completely internationalise the pulpit. Especially organise complete federation of British, Empire and American Churches.

(5) Cast out all fear (a) from religion, (b) from politics and economics, (c) from races:

(a) From religion. Develop mutual approaches and intercommunication and interpenetration, voluntarily but not compulsorily, between all religions: Buddhism, Mohammedanism, Judaism, Christianity, etc.

(b) From politics. The purpose of democracy is to recognise the co-existence of Fascist and alleged Communist dictatorships. Accept such as facts, but influence them by recognising their co-existence. Do not hate people born under Fascism or Communism because of murders committed by their regimes. Make democracy function as living reality and do not cling to it as a static political system.

END RACIAL ANTAGONISM.

(c) From races. Recognise brotherhood as a fact and end race hatred and antagonism. Accept man as equal to man everywhere. Make Empire the starting place for a world federation and turn the political cosmic process into an ethical process.

En route to the new social system, Sir Walter Strickland wanted to see established

(1) Living geographical education; children to visit all countries; education to be internationalised.

(2) Mutual patriotisms to be respected.

(3) Radio and cinema to be employed in education. Definitely organised international as well as national schooling over the radio.

(4) Older children and University students; International Scholarships.

As regards the relations between countries, Sir Walter's idea was the total abolition of the passport system. En route to this a wider system of passports or less countries. Believing that the Anglo-Saxon countries had a great part to play, the establishment, in addition to British and U.S.A. passports, a common citizen passport whereby full rights of citizenship in either country or the possessions of either country, equal to that enjoyed in the American or British Motherland, should belong to the holder, irrespective of whether he or she was born under the British or the American flag. All British subjects to be styled citizens. By simple compact, and such definite organisation as may be involved, war to be ruled out under all circumstances as an arbiter in any dispute between Britain and America.

Until total disarmament is established and a court of peace rules the world, all armament to be nationalised.

Secret diplomacy to be abolished and all questions to be discussed openly by the peoples of the democracies, in the Press, on the platform, in Parliament, and congress.

Ministers of peace and world federation to be appointed.

Britain to establish in the Motherland, and in consultation with the Colonies, complete right of asylum for all who are oppressed, whether as Gentiles or Jews, whether on racial or political grounds, whether right and "reactionary" in politics, or left and "revolutionary." The right of asylum is a tradition of democracy, a tradition of the English race, a source of strength.

The entire motto to be "Without fear."

Sir Walter held that Socialism must come, but could come in this way without bloodshed.

WAR ANOMALIES!
The Remedy: Equal Wages

The Rector of Birmingham, the Rev. T. Guy Rogers, deals very effectively with the question of victimisation of conscientious objectors, in a letter, published in Birmingham Post, June 6. Mr. Rogers writes:—

"Sir,—The debate, in the City Council, on the position of Council employees who are conscientious objectors seems to have proceeded on very restricted lines, and to have done scant justice to a difficult situation. Presumably the 140 men concerned have satisfied the Tribunal that they are genuine conscientious objectors. If so, no one has a right to call them craven cowards; and in normal times those who did so might be liable to serve penalties. The men were not present to defend themselves, which makes the accusation itself seem cowardly as well as unjust.

"Without knowledge of all the circumstances it is impossible for anyone to say whether these conscientious objectors have acted with full consideration for the rights of the community as a whole; but, presumably again, they have never asked for a war bonus and there is no evidence that they wish to claim rights of seniority if the community thinks well to deprive them of such rights. They are probably passive in the matter, unorganised and without anyone to guide them in making suggestions which might ease the situation for all concerned. Has it occurred to anyone to call them in friendly consultation to discuss the matter? Someone may have done so, but again we are in ignorance.

"It is most regrettable that the conscientious objector, who is bound to be increasingly regarded as a nuisance by people engaged in a life and death struggle, should not be legislated for on a national basis, assigned non-combatant duties by legislative authority and protected in the carrying of them out. Failing to perform such duties presumably he would be interned and allowed to live on such land as he could cultivate. Far better such a fate than to be bullied or ostracised or maligned by his fellows.

"We are supposed to be fighting for the rights of human conscience, and we must not allow the difficulties with which the conscientious objector presents us to disturb the cool judgment which the situation demands. These difficulties are admittedly very real. What, for example, would happen if the Council House were attacked?

"But there are a great many other anomalies and inconsistencies which will need to be dealt with discreetly and firmly. If it comes to that—why should anyone have war bonuses when the pay of the man on active service is so meagre? Why should there not be conscription of wealth as well as of human life? Why should the economic burden of the war fall so unjustly on different people? It is easy to direct the attention of the community to the admitted inconsistencies of the position of the conscientious objector, but there are scores of other inconsistencies which must be considered by the community as a whole. We need above all a balanced judgment. All our civic problems are soluble with general goodwill.

T. GUY ROGERS,
Rector of Birmingham.

June 5.

Mr. Rogers gets to the point in his concluding paragraph. His plea for cool judgment is worthy of his intellectual status and approach. A splendid example in a time of crisis.

How many people and interests are hiding behind the abuse of the conscientious objector? Why not equal income for every adult citizen, irrespective of age or sex, and work, in wartime? Why not standardise and equalise all wages? Why not end abuse of a minority and agree on sound, practical policy? Are the Anti-Conchies willing? If not, why not?

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS AND A.R.P. WORK

Correspondence has just passed between the Secretary of the North Wales Conscientious Objectors Tribunal and Mr. William Jones, clerk of the Denbighshire County Council and County A.R.P. Controller, regarding the enrolment of conscientious objectors in the A.R.P. services in Denbighshire.

On April 4th Mr. William Jones wrote to the Clerk of the Tribunal requesting that a resolution passed at a meeting of head wardens and deputies for the Wrexham rural district be brought to the notice of the Tribunal. The resolution stated that owing to the age-limit laid down by the Ministry for Home Security, the meeting considered that conscientious objectors were not eligible for service under the A.R.P. scheme and was not prepared to accept their services under any circumstances. Mr. Jones added that there was a general feeling among volunteer A.R.P. workers that they will not work with conscientious objectors, and he fully endorsed that view.

"If at any time we are authorised to employ paid workers on A.R.P. services in this county, I shall not be prepared to sanction the engagement of anyone within the ages liable for military service, and in that case conscientious objectors would be excluded. In view of the difficulties that are likely to arise with the volunteers, may I respectfully suggest that the condition with regard to A.R.P. work be not imposed upon any conscientious objector in this county."

The Clerk of the Tribunal wrote pointing out that certain considerations seemed to have been overlooked.

"The Tribunal is only concerned with granting or refusing exemption from military service according to the evidence. The members of the Court fully realise that the views expressed in your letter are sincerely held by many people besides the Wrexham rural district and the clerk of the A.R.P. services, and that few people can approach this difficult question entirely free from antecedent prejudice. The requests contained in your letter are outside the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, and the members must exercise their own judgment as to the conditions of exemption. They must act according to the rule laid down, namely, deal with each case according to its particular circumstances.

"With regard to the suggestion that service in A.R.P. be not imposed as a condition of exemption the Tribunal has no power to make any discrimination in favour of Denbighshire or any other county."

Mr. William Jones replied that his first communication was not intended in any way as criticism of the work of the Court, but that its sole purpose was to point out that so far as Denbighshire was concerned a condition that an objector should engage in A.R.P. work would be ineffective. He agreed with the suggestion of the Clerk of the Tribunal that a copy of the correspondence be forwarded to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour, and the Secretary for Home Defence.

MUNICIPALITIES SACK "CONCHIES"

On Monday, May 27, the conscientious objector became municipal news throughout the country.

At Blackpool, the Education Committee referred to the General Purposes Committee of the Council the question, whether the services be retained of conscientious objectors, Fascists, Peace Pledge Unionists, Communists, and others employed by the Education Committee

"who are not prepared to support the national effort 100 per cent."

Councillor Dunn alleged that the existence of C.O. teachers imposed a stigma on the whole profession. Councillor Miss M. E. Garner wanted the Education Committee to name the teachers accused of subversive activity. Councillor J. C. Terry opposed the clamour. He declared :—

"The question of what should be taught in schools is a national matter and not one for a local authority to decide. I venture to say that if local authorities had decided in the past what should be taught in schools there would have been some startling varieties of patriotism."

The Camborne-Redrith Urban Council resolved unanimously to support the Lytham St. Anne's Borough Council resolution quoted in the June WORD. Councillor B. Treloar expressed the opinion that every conscientious objector should be dismissed from his employment and compelled to do something to defend his country.

At Liverpool, Councillor S. C. Saltmarsh raised the question :—

"How many of the Liverpool Education Committee teaching staff are Communists, Fascists, or members of the Peace Pledge Union, 'or other well-known organisations having interests inimical to the State?'"

The Chairman of the Education Committee, Councillor C. G. S. Gordon, said the Committee had no knowledge of any Communists or Fascists. One member belonged to the Peace Pledge Union.

Councillor Saltmarsh asked for the number of conscientious objectors among the teaching staff, and how many had been granted exemption.

Councillor Gordon said that three or four teachers had registered as conscientious objectors, but their cases had not been heard yet.

Councillor Saltmarsh—I think they should be dismissed; for they cannot be allowed to teach our young people this propaganda.

Councillor Gordon—Well, of course, they will not be allowed to do that.

A protest against this attitude was published in the columns of the Birmingham Evening Dispatch that same day. Councillor W. S. Lewis, of the Birmingham Town Council, in a published interview, said :—

"The view I have taken is that we are fighting this war to maintain freedom of thought and expression, and if this is true we must respect the opinion of the real conscientious objector.

"As an ex-Service man, I can understand the views of those who object to the conscientious objector, but this is no time to be vindictive.

"Let those of us who are prepared to strain every effort to win the war stand by the lads of our fighting Services and at the same time appreciate the feelings of the real conscientious objector."

The following day the matter was discussed fiercely by the Blackpool Town Council, the Leicester City Council, the Old Fletton Urban District Council, the Bridgend Urban Council, and the Oldham Industrial Co-operative Society.

Blackpool decided that conscientious objectors and employees holding subversive views are not to be employed by the Corporation.

At Leicester, the Lord Mayor ruled the discussion out of order.

Councillor T. R. Hill demanded to know what was the attitude of the Council towards conscientious objectors.

Alderman Amos Sheriff asked the Lord Mayor to rule the question out of order because the Tribunal was responsible for it.

The Lord Mayor—The Town Clerk tells me that the question is out of order.

At Old Fletton, Councillors G. Wright and H. J. Goodwin left the Council Chamber as a protest against the ruling of the Chairman, supported by the Clerk, that the Urban District Council had disposed of the matter by accepting the resignation of the only conscientious objector employed by the Council, Mr. R. F. Stocks, 83 High Street, Fletton.

Councillor Wright's resolution was : "That no conscientious objector shall be employed forthwith by the Council."

Councillor Wright's last words were, as he and Councillor Goodwin left the Chamber : "I should never accept that ruling. If this is the case I leave the meeting in protest. There is no need for me or anyone else to be here!"

Bridgend Urban Council decided that no conscientious objectors were to be employed by the Authority. Councillor E. Field moved this resolution because, as he said, he had no time to waste over conscientious objectors. Councillor S. Schofield, Chairman, seconded! Councillor G Powell was the only Councillor to protest and to vote against the motion. He was neither a pacifist nor yet a conscientious objector. But he wanted to know what was behind the motion. Britain was a democratic country. By taking such action, the Council would be breaking down the fundamental supports for which the country was said to be fighting.

At the half-quarterly meeting of the Oldham Industrial Co-operative Society, Mr. Herbert Bentley asked if there were any conscientious objectors in the employ of the society, and if so if the committee thought it was right that these men should be employed while the sons of members were fighting.

The Chairman, Mr. J. J. Friend, ruled the question out of order.

The following day, Wednesday, May 29, extraordinary sentiments were expressed at a "Conchie" debate at the Maidstone Town Council; the Newhaven Urban Council, by 8 votes to 5, decided to terminate the employment in the Surveyor's Office of a clerk, on the ground that he was a conscientious objector; and the Buxton Borough Council decided to reduce a "conchie" employee to a soldier's status.

At Maidstone, the Deputy Mayor (Councillor Percy Brown) moved that no conscientious objector of military age should be allowed to retain his position in the employ of the Council.

After declaring that he had a great deal of sympathy with the genuine conscientious objector, Councillor Brown launched such a bitter attack against conscientious objectors that it is impossible to know what he defines as a genuine objector.

Councillor Brown said :—

"The Council have a right to say: 'We will not employ a man so craven and devoid of all sense of his obligations to the ratepayers of Maidstone, who pay him his salary, and who would stand aside and not attempt to protect them in any way.

"I say that man is not a fit and proper person to be employed by the Borough of Maidstone."

Alderman Egerton Martin seconded.

Councillor F. R. Connor moved, as an amendment, the following motion, which was carried by 16 votes to 3 :—

"That no conscientious objector exempted from joining His Majesty's Forces, being of military age, be allowed to retain his position in the employ of the Council except under terms as to rates of pay and conditions comparable with those applicable to military service."

Alderman T. Armstrong opposed the motion and the amendment. He described the resolution as "cheap jack patriotism." It was for the Tribunals to decide who were genuine conscientious objectors, and not for the Council. Alderman William Day backed up all that Alderman Armstrong said. Councillor C. H. Hobday said he fought in the last war and would fight again. It sometimes required more moral courage to stand for one's principles than to face bombs. It was easy to follow the crowd and go with the stream. He opposed both resolution and amendment on the same grounds as Alderman Armstrong had—that we had a law which gave men the right to be conscientious objectors. To vote for the resolution would be to apply economic blackmail.

At Newhaven, Councillor J. C. Pargeter opposed the dismissal of the "conchie" clerk, on the grounds of fair-play. He was opposed to conscientious objectors. He added :—

"I am fair-minded enough to realise that men have a right to use their own minds and brains."

Councillor E. J. Coker seconded Councillor Pargeter's opposition.

Councillor Coker declared his abhorrence of conscientious objectors but opposed the dismissal on the ground that it "would be opening the path to serious consequences to the liberty of everyone." The Council was stepping beyond its bounds and dealing with the man in a tyrannous way for his conscience's sake. Councillor Coker also said pertinently :—

"The man in question, I presume, has been before a Tribunal, who have allowed his case."

Councillors Pargeter and Coker are to be congratulated on their brave, legal, and constitutional stand. Councillor Coker strikes the nail on the head when he describes the victimisation as tyranny. It is a very brave thing, in war-time, despite one's own prejudices, to weigh justly all the facts, and to record a healthy, sane, conclusion. But it is the truer patriotism.

Councillor H. Airs, Vice-Chairman, raised the question of the legality of the resolution, and the Clerk, Mr. C. G. Mainwood, said that there was grave doubt whether the Council had a right to discharge a man on the grounds of conscientious objection.

Buxton Borough Council decided the fate of Kenneth Frank Berrisford, one of its clerks, living at 10 Byron Street, Buxton.

Berrisford appeared before the Tribunal on April 23, and was ordered by the Tribunal to find work in agricutlure or the like. He made every effort, both through the Labour Exchange and otherwise, to obtain work of the kind specified by the Tribunal. No one would engage him.

The Buxton Council resolved that : (1) the work specified by the Tribunal does not come within the provisions of the Local Government Staffs (War Service) Act, 1939; (2) the engagement of this employee be terminated on June 30th. If he has not then obtained work of national importance, he be retained at a wage equivalent to the service pay of a private soldier, plus a billeting allowance.

On Thursday, May 30, the municipal discussion extended to six more Corporations in England and Wales.

By 17 votes to 6, the Cardiff Corporation Education Committee carried a recommendation that "teachers who appear before conscientious objectors' Tribunals and are exempt from full military service shall be removed from the employ of the education authority."

The Devon Education Committee carried, with only one dissentient, a resolution averring that it was "undesirable that any conscientious objector should teach in schools under the Committee's control."

By 12 votes to 3, Bilston Town Council carried a motion "that this corporation will not employ, nor continue to employ, conscientious objectors in any of its departments or services."

The Crediton Urban Council discussed the question of conscientious objectors being allowed to volunteer for work on farms during the war emergency.

The Ebbw Vale Council decided, after a stormy discussion, to appoint a sub-committee to interview its one "conchie" employee, and ask him to change his attitude towards war.

The Southgate Borough Council discussed, without conclusion, but in a spirit of bitter antagonism, the position of conscientious objectors and others holding Fascist or Communist views, who may be, at present, in their employ.

The debates of these worthy corporations were illuminating.

At Cardiff, Councillor Principal Rees urged that constitutional machinery existed for dealing with the conscientious objector problem and he objected to the local authority arrogating to itself the task of passing judgment. His protest was mild and was urged more mildly than this summary suggests. It was swept aside with grand contempt. Alderman Sir W. R. Williams said that the conscientious objector ought not to view his dismissal as hardship. Every man should have his own opinion, but let him pay the price of his opinion. The Alderman concluded :—

"We should say to the conscientious objector: 'While this war is on, we cannot be a party to keeping you!'"

An interesting comment on the Alderman's speech, and the Cardiff Council's resolution, was to be found in a statement of fact published in The Teachers' World, London, for May 29 :—

"CARDIFF AND C.O.s.

"In two cases Cardiff teachers were given time off to appear before a Military Training Act Tribunal to give evidence on behalf of a conscientious objector. The facts being reported to Cardiff Education Committee, it was decided that such permission shall not be given in future."

This number was the current issue in circulation on the day the Cardiff debate occurred.

The Devon Education Committee employ 1,600 teachers. Less than 10 are known to be conscientious objectors. The agitation was over these nine heretics.

Councillor Lt.-Col. C. Marwood Tucker, who moved the resolution, said that he did not think it right that conscientious objectors should be in a position to influence children. The gallant colonel, obviously, from his professional approach, believes in arms, and children being taught the glories of militarism. This is the common passion of the militarists of all lands. It is passion which divides the peoples of all lands and manures the earth with human bodies.

Councillor G. C. Hayter Hames seconded the resolution. He stated that the teacher who was a conscientious objector was despised by parents, looked down upon by other teachers, and regarded as the outcast of his village or district. He questioned the power of a teacher being efficient under such circumstances.

Councillor Hames forgot that the first Christians were outcast. His picture of circumstances outcasts not merely the C.O. teacher but education itself. It depicts a condition impregnable to thought. We can understand this description applied to a totalitarian State, to Germany, Italy, or Russia. We cannot understand such a caricature of liberty and understanding being exhibited as a true and decent picture of democracy.

Councillor B. G. Lampard-Vachell backed up the reasoning (sic) of Councillors Tucker and Hames by speaking of "the extraordinary strong feeling" in the county against conscientious objectors.

Councillor W. Lake rebuked, very mildly, but still with some firmness, this emotional outpouring, by stating that he considered it very unfortunate that public opinion should be roused in that way. He concluded :—

"We are a free people and pride ourselves on the fact."

Councillor Sir John Shelley came in with a charming fair-play speech. He stood up for the genuine C.O., and thought that he deserved every admiration. But, of course, the genuine C.O. was not the fellow who refused to do anything. The genuine C.O. was the man who would join the R.A.M.C.

We have no doubt that Sir John Shelley wanted to be fair. But he has never faced the question. At many Tribunals, the C.O. is told he is not genuine unless he refuses to do anything. He has been told he is not wanted in the R.A.M.C. or on a mine-sweeper. He was accused, at the very same time as Sir John Shelley was speaking at the Devon Council gathering, at another Council meeting, by other loyal patriotic Municipal Councillors, of not being genuine unless he came before the Tribunals and said he would do nothing.

Protest against the ignorance which war develops is impossible.

In The Teachers' World, London, for May 29, Mr. C. R. W. Slatter, Chagford Senior School, Chagford, Devon, endeavours to protest against "the decisions of certain education committees to refuse to employ and to dismiss schoolmasters who are 'C.O.'s.'"

Mr. Slatter says :—

"Now this is absolutely contrary to normal practice as well as not being in keeping with the best British traditions.

"Political and religious views cannot influence or affect a teacher's tenure. A man cannot be dismissed legally for being a pacifist any more than he can for being a Liberal or a Roman Catholic, or Baptist, etc.

"In view of this may I ask how it is that no comment—let alone denunciation—of this illegal and unjust persecution has appeared in your journal? I should like to know that reticence does not imply approval."

The editor of The Teachers' World apologises in the following footnote :—

"Our correspondent is right. A genuine C.O. should neither be dismissed nor refused employment. While this is so, Mr. Slatter must make allowances for a pardonable human weakness which leads mothers and fathers of soldiers to resent the evasion of military service by others who still enjoy the freedom and privileges for which their sons are fighting. The majority of the electors would undoubtedly support the Authorities concerned. 'After all,' they would say, 'shouldn't C.O.s be prepared to sacrifice something for their convictions?'—Editor, T.W."

Which, being interpreted, means that the persecution is O.K.

The Bilston resolution was moved by Councillor A. Darbey and seconded, hastily, by Councillor R. Buxton. At least, he said: "I hasten to second the motion."

Councillor the Rev. L. H. Jenkins opposed the principle of the proposal, and moved an amendment, our old friend, that payment of objectors should not exceed that of men with the forces and that they should be reinstated on the same conditions as those who had served.

Councillor G. A. Jones seconded this amendment, and spoke bravely. He declared soundly :—

"Facing the scorn of the world requires greater courage than facing bullets, often from an unseen enemy."

Councillor Dr. R. Abbott spoke as boldly against the C.O. as Councillor Sir John Shelley did, at the same time, in another Council Chamber, at Devon. But his test of the genuine C.O. was different. Turn back to Shelley and then read the statement made by Abbott, to learn how the conchie-baiters agree.

Councillor Dr. R. Abbott said he rarely read of a man who had the courage to say at a Tribunal that he would do nothing. Any man who took part in A.R.P. or anything like that and said he was a conscientious objector was a self-condemned liar.

Councillor G. H. Plant declared: "A conscientious objector is a coward." Which is almost final, except that Councillor Plant hardly possesses the right type of mind to assess true human values and integrities.

Alderman W. Leighton, the Mayor, denounced C.O.'s for existing on food the fighting forces brought into the country. Do not financiers, stay-at-home capitalists, exempted journalists, live on such food? Is a verbal protest of patriotism sufficient payment for such services? Please answer that question, Mr. Mayor.

Councillors Jenkins, G. A. Jones and J. W. Jones voted for the amendment, and the Mayor, Aldermen H. Beach, J. T. Baker and Hughes, and Councillors Darbey, Plant, J. Roberts, J. T. Perks, Buxton, Abbott, R. Smith and J. Kirkland against. Councillor J. W. Pearson did not vote.

The Crediton Urban Council, in its antagonism to conscientious objectors, thought they ought not to be permitted to do work even of national importance; not even if they did such work voluntarily!

The sanity of the Council was saved by Councillor Rev. C. E. Jewell and Councillor A. G. Bicknell.

Councillor Roach, speaking the mind of the Council, as well as his own mind, said :—

"If a conscientious objector came down to my farm my men would walk out, I think we should bar conscientious objectors, I would not have them on the farm. I don't want my men walking out."

Councillor Rev. C. E. Jewell said he could not take objection to a conscientious objector, if he wanted his name placed on farm volunteer emergency list.

Councillor A. G. Bicknell shrewdly remarked that all farmers were not like Mr. Roach and himself. He added :—

"There are some farmers who would be conscientious objectors if they were called up."

At the Ebbw Vale Council meeting, Councillor W. Darbey distinguished himself by his bitter opposition to conscientious objectors, just as Councillor A. Darbey distinguished himself in the same cause and similar fashion at the same time at Bilston. The Darbeys are what the "conchies" need if Councils' staffs are to be saved!

Councillor W. Darbey asked the Clerk (Mr. R. E. Herbert) how many conscientious objectors were on the Council staff.

The Clerk—One.

Councillor T. L. Jones—And does this individual accept his war bonus?

The Accountant—Yes.

Councillor Emlyn Williams proposed that the particular individual be dismissed instantly. Councillor Williams added :—

"If we have any courage we will make a decision now and state that no conscientious objector will be employed by Ebbw Vale Council."

Councillor T. L. Jones seconded.

Councillor Aneurin Davies boldly attacked the C.O. baiters, although not a "conchie" or a pacifist himself. He said he was not going to take the rights of anyone else's conscience upon his own conscience. Anyone who believed that he was opposed to war, and did not think that he had the right to kill, was not to be judged by him.

Councillor Davies added, with telling emphasis :—

"But there are people in this district who had not worked for years until the King made his proclamation that new classes would be called up. They are now working, but they would not have returned to work had they not been in danger of being called up. I think these people are far worse than any conscientious objector."

At the Southgate Borough Council, Councillor Victor Dover asserted that the Council must not employ conscientious objectors, Fascists or Communists. He made a gracious concession to the persons he attacked, as an evidence of his democratic approach. Said Councillor Dover :—

"I am not denying the right of these people to hold such views as they possess, but it should not be at the expense of the country or the ratepayers."

Which was real nice. As though any Council or any employer of labour has any right to enquire into the private, political or religious or philosophical opinions of his employees!

Councillor C. W. F. Ridley seconded the motion. He wanted to look into the question seriously. It is the witch-hunting mentality of the Councillors Dover and Ridley that need to be looked into. A man named Ridley, the name of a martyred bishop, should learn from history and hesitate to martyr folk.

Councillor A. E. Lauder did not seem to be impressed by the orations or the facts of his fellow Councillors. But he also was in favour of getting rid of conchies, Fascists, and Communists!

Of course, the Fascist and Communist touch is a little Fifth Column decoration. We doubt the accuracy of this abuse even as applied to Fascists, for we have had no evidence advanced, and no public trial attempted. It is contrary to all principles of jurisprudence for the charges made by the Executive to be accepted without evidence. Applied universally, and not even specifically to certain persons, the charge passes even from mere abuse to public scandal. The Communists are Stalinists but even Stalinism is not just the same as Nazism and the British Government are not at war with Stalinism. The further fact emerges: that just as Stalinism is not Nazism, so conscientious objectors are not Nazis nor yet are they Stalinists. If conscientious objectors object to war in Britain, they object also in Germany, where many have been executed, and where thousands are in concentration camps.

The Mayor brought the meeting back to common sense. He had no sympathy with C.O.'s and he thought that they were mistaken. But they had their legal rights, and he doubted whether they could dismiss a man because he held pacifist views.

GEORGE LANSBURY— AND CONSCIENCE.

At the memorial service to George Lansbury, held in Westminster Abbey, there was a large congregation. The Dean of Westminster officiated, assisted by other Abbey clergy. Archdeacon F. L. Donaldson read the lessons. These included the famous I. Corinthians, 13, treating of the grandeur of charity, and placing charity of mind and understanding above the appearance of charity of works, and equally above faith and hope. A chapter that should be read and re-read by the so-called great and admittedly vulgar these days, most of all by politicians, by patriotic clerics, and by jingo newspaper writers in all lands. The second lesson was from Revelation, 21, beginning: "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth." A very fitting tribute to George Lansbury.

Several M.P's. were present, representing the Government, or in their own persons. The Speaker of the House of Commons was present. Mr. Brendon Bracken, M.P.; Sir Edward Campbell, M.P.; Commander R. Fletcher, M.P; Sir Edmund Brocklebank, M.P.. were present in representative capacities. Also present were Lord Tryon; Lord Strabolgi; Lord Noel-Buxton; Sir Samuel Hoare, M.P.; Mr. Robert Gibson, M.P.; Sir Patrick Hannon, M.P.; Sir Smedley Crooke, M.P.; Dowager the Hon. Lady Barlow; Prebendary the Hon. J. G. Adderley, the Archdeacon of London; Brigadier-General Peter Winser; Sir Charles Edwards, M.P.; Mr. George Mathers, M.P.; Mr. J. R. Leslie, M.P.; Mr. William Whiteley, M.P.; Mr. R. W. Sorensen, M.P.

The Church was well represented, Labour Party organisations, and Mayors, Mayoresses, and Aldermen of several towns and boroughs throughout the country.

We mention this tremendous tribute to George Lansbury because Lansbury was a pacifist and a conscientious objector. Whilst this tribute was being paid to George Lansbury, Philip Boyle—who had imbibed Lansbury's teachings from his father, who was influenced directly by G.L.—was rotting in Maryhill Barracks, awaiting Court Martial for being a "conchie," for being loyal to Lansbury's influence.

Is this right? Would Lansbury have desired the tributes could he have seen Boyle's sufferings? In our next issue we reproduce the tribute published from our pen in the Islington Gazette, recalling George Lansbury's attitude during the Great War. Consider the facts stated therein, and ask yourself: Can we honour Lansbury's memory unless we respect conscience and stand by the conscientious objector?

Despite the declarations of Tribunal Judges, "conchies" have a place in the rebuilding of Europe and of the world. It is possible not to believe this. But it is not possible to disbelieve the value of conscience, and at the same time, to pretend to honour the memory and work of George Lansbury.

"CONCHIES" DOWN UNDER.

The Press, Christchurch, New Zealand, in its issue for March 18 last, published a long article on the proposed National Peace and Anti-Conscription Conference, that was to be held at Wellington on Easter Sunday. The General Labourers' Union decided to send four delegates. The Press stated:—

"The conference, which has been officially banned by the Labour Party, is being convened by the Wellington Peace and Anti-Conscription Council. The president is named in a circular as W. McAra. One of the candidates for the office of national secretary of the Labour Party, opposing W. Moohan, the acting-secretary, is W. McAra. Messrs. K. Baxter and H. E. Herring (the former member for Mid-Canterbury) are named among the vice-presidents, although both appear among the nominees for the national executive of the Labour Party."

The Press quotes the aims of the National Peace and Anti-Conscription Conference:—

"To bring together for common action all men and women and all organised bodies who are opposed to participation by New Zealand in the war; and to this end

"To undertake immediately a mass campaign against the introduction of conscription.

"To oppose further any developments which tend to sacrifice the welfare and liberties of the people of New Zealand to the demands of the war machine."

The first item on the agenda of the conference was the presentation of a report on the war and its relation to New Zealand, conscription, civil liberties, and the standard of living.

At Melbourne, Australia, on March 8, the Rev. T. C. Rentoul, President of the Methodist Conference, ruled out of order a motion dealing with conscientious objectors to war, on the ground that it was a Federal and not a State matter. The motion requested the Australian Government to bring the law of Australia into line with the law in Britain, and make proper provision for exempting conscientious objectors. It requested the Government to interpret the present law, meantime, with the greatest moderation.

The Conference accepted the motion of the Rev. Palmer Phillips, directing the attention of the Australian Government to the following expression of Australian Methodist belief:—

"That when the occasion arises the State is justly entitled to require of all its citizens that they render assistance in the defence of its integrity and life; that from those to whom much has been given much should be required and, therefore, the poor man should not be required to give, if necessary, his life while the rich man withholds his wealth, or, at best, lends it to the State at interest. . . . Every form of service should be drawn upon, and 'property' should not be more sacrosanct than living men.

"That as an increasing number of citizens conscientiously believe that evil should not be opposed or attacked by force of arms, holding to the final ideal of the Mind of Christ, and that they therefore ought not, under any circumstances whatever, handle lethal weapons, even against an aggressor, they should not be called upon for military service, but, compatable with their conscience, they should be required, in time of war, to assist in defence in ways that would save life and minimise suffering."

The following day, Mr. Menzies, the Prime Minister, received a deputation on the subject from the following bodies:—Australian Student Christian Movement; National Union of Australian University Students; Council for Civil Liberties; Women's National League for Peace and Freedom; and Women's Christian Temperance Union. The deputation was introduced by Mr. Blackburn, M.H.R.

The Prime Minister was asked to incorporate in the Defence Act the British provision for conscientious objectors whose principles would not allow them to serve in the army even in non-combatant capacities.

Mr. Menzies said that if a man refused to serve in a non-combatant capacity because he would be releasing a man for active service, neither could he serve in a civil occupation under civil authority, because he would still be releasing a man for active service. Then if he would in no way assist in the carrying on of the war, was that the end or would he refuse to pay taxes toward the cost of the war?

Mr. Menzies agreed that the greatest test of liberty in a community was its treatment of minorities, but this problem was extraordinarily complex—almost metaphysical. A man had to ask himself how far his conscience would allow him to act in a certain way, but how far the State could recognise and allow his decisions was another matter.

Mr. Menzies promised to take the matter up with Cabinet.

DOGMAS DISCARDED.

The Islington Gazette, in its issue for May 21, 1940, published the following review of our pamphlets, Dogmas Discarded, part I. and II., pamphlets Nos. 8 and 9, "Word" Library:—

"MR. GUY ALDRED.

"Autobiography of Former Boy Preacher of Holloway.

"Many interesting references to Islington and Clerkenwell appear in 'Dogmas Discarded,' an autobiography of thought, by Mr. Guy Aldred published in two parts by the Strickland Press, Glasgow.

"In this narrative of thought evolution, the author proclaims as his creed of life the maxim, "I think, therefore I am." In Part I the author outlines his theological evolution, and in the second part he deals with Atheism, Socialism and Anarchism and d'scusscs the proletarian movement.

"A native of Clerkenwell, Mr. Aldred was born at Corporation Buildings, Farringdon Road, in 1886, and at the age of five went to the Iron Infants' School, which has long since disappeared to make way for factory buildings. His schooling was continued at the Hugh Myddelton Higher Grade School, and at the opening of the new building by the Prince of Wales (later Edward VII), he, as the youngest scholar was presented to the royal visitor—'an ironic beginning for one who was destined to become a rabid Republican in later life,' comments the author.

"The Boy Preacher.

"At the age of eight Aldred joined the Anglican Communion, but eight years later, disappointed at the inactivity of the Anglican Church, he joined an evangelist at Holloway in opening a Christian Social Mission at the Assembly Rooms, Russell Road, where he was announced as 'The Boy Preacher.' In his first sermon he defined service as social service, 'actual service,' and from such radical Christian teaching he turned to theistic missioner and then passed to Atheism.

"Political Views.

"Mr. Aldred has a good deal to say about the Peel Institute 40 years ago, and relates that for a time he was very active in connection with the Institute's social activities, worked with leading local Christians in the cause of total abstinence, and 'assisted the Nonconformist shining lights in Central Finsbury and Islington in the struggle to realise their political ambitions.' Incidentally the author declares that it was through his membership of Peel that he was converted from Toryism to Radicalism.

"His political evolution then took him to Socialism, his conversion being attributed to Huxley's influence.

"Revolt.

"In the next chapter the author tells of his anti-Parliamentarian and Socialist revolt against Labourism. In 1906 he published in the Islington Daily Gazette an election address to the electors of Central Finsbury, in which he spoke of 'the damnable spirit of compromise that is abroad,' and declared that he would go to Westminster 'pledged to represent the hard-thinking section of the proletariat, who know that class-consciousness spells revolution.' This address was signed by Guy A. Aldred, 'Minister of the Gospel of Social Revolt.'

"The author was unable to proceed with this intended candidature when he reached the age of 21, and in the next chapter he tells how shortly after issuing the Islington Manifesto he felt it was absurd for a revolutionary to wish to go to Parliament. In 1907 he was defining himself as an Anarchist Communist. 'Milton's principle that democracy can exist only between equals is one that must be applied always,' he observes. 'It is rarely applied. That is why sham democracy broke down and gave birth to Fascism and Nazism.'"

These two pamphlets are published at 4d. (Part I.) and 6d. (Part II.). They deal with the author's schooldays and the evolution of his thought down to 1908, when he became an Anarchist and an Anti-Parliamentarian. The two will be sent, post free, for 1/-.

WHEN MUSSOLINI WAS A SOCIALIST

By Angelica Balabanoff.

I made my first acquaintance with Mussolini in 1906 on the occasion of my speech to the Italian Socialists immigrated to Losanna (Switzerland).

At that time he was a young man of 22 or 23 years of age and drew my attention for his aspect of extreme poverty and penury.

Even then he had an uneasy agitated appearance, like a man who suffers from some hereditary disease.

I thought to myself: "This one is some poor persecuted proletarian who may be in need of a soothing word," and I asked him who he was and whence he came.

Mussolini told me that he had fled from Italy because he did not want to serve in the army. He was in a grave pecuniary need and lived mainly by aid offered him by the masons and diggers of Losanna.

One of these masons then told me that his wife had given him some old underwear. It was in this manner that these Italian immigrants, many of whom were poor occasional workers, aided a refugee who had studied for school teacher, but had not had the capacity to continue at this profession.

Mussolini is the son of a poor worker, a blacksmith who lived in Piedappio, near Foili, in Romajna. His father was a socialist and a member of the First International. Mussolini therefore was brought up in a socialist environment.

The peasants of his village belonged to the party and Mussolini being a man of the sort that adapts himself easily to the ideas of those who surround him, he also became a member of the party.

In my first conversation with him he told me that he had a strong desire to translate "On the Morrow of the Social Revolution," by Kautsky, because he would have been able to earn thereby about 50 francs. I offered to help him and when I returned to Losanna I made a great part of the translation for him because at that time he knew very little German. He had no regular trade so he read a lot and particularly French authors like Blanguin and he thus filled his brains with the thoughts of French writers. He had always been a man of strong adaptability of thought and he possessed—besides that faculty of assimilation common to so many Italians—a nervous system of an abnormal impressionability.

Until 1900 we published in Losanna, a socialist paper which still exists, called L'avenuire del Lavoratorie," (The Workers' Future) to which I collaborated from time to time. Mussolini began to contribute articles to this paper many of which were on anti-clerical and anti-militaristic subjects.

His anti-clericalism was of a very primitive type. He never gave a scientific interpretation of religious problems, but he attacked the church as an institution. At this time he also published a pamphlet in which he attempted to prove the non-existence of god. It is one of the many ironies of history that the pamphlet is now forbidden in Italy by order of the Prime Minister Signor Mussolini.

A few years later, I think in 1909 or 1910, Mussolini was arrested and returned to Italy where he became the director of one of the two hundred or more socialist weekly reviews and especially the one called The Class Struggle.

At that time he often invited me to speak where he was and I remember having once spoken in Forli on the Paris Commune.

It was a lively meeting. The bourgeoisie of that locality were all republicans and the peasants all socialists, so the camp was divided into two opposing parties. The republicans attempted to disturb my speech with a bowling match in a wine shop close to the place where I was to speak. Mussolini was terribly agitated. I was not disturbed and spoke nevertheless. But when I had finished Mussolini informed me, trembling with emotion that a quarrel had taken place and that a socialist had stabbed a republican.

I remember well that Mussolini's agitation was due not so much to the sentiment of responsibility for this unfortunate accident as to the fear of unpleasant probable consequences for himself. When the meeting was over we went in a cab towards the station. Mussolini insisted desperately on having carabineers escort and protect us. So a part of the latter preceded us in a cab and others marched beside us. We scarcely had moved when a detonation was heard. They had shot at us but they struck the first vehicle full of carabineers. Mussolini was seized by a deadly terror and pitifully implored me not to leave the town. He did not have the heart to remain alone. No one knew what could have happened. I told him that I couldn't remain because on the morrow, being the first of May, I was engaged to speak elsewhere. But Mussolini continued to disavow me until we reached the station platform and I finally left him after which our comrades promised to protect him personally. At the socialist congress of Reggio Emilia, the radical socialists, to which Mussolini belonged, had a majority over the reformists, whose leaders were expelled from the party on Mussolini's proposal. All the other refomists then went out of the party and were replaced by official radicals including myself and Mussolini, who was elected representative for the province of Romajna.

It was on this occasion that Mussolini provoked the expulsion of Bissolati from the party because the latter went to congratulate the king for the failure of the Hemft to murder him at Alba. Some months afterwards Bacci, editor of the Avanti! our organ at Milan, was obliged to resign from the party. The executive of the party assembled in Rome and Mussolini was proposed for the editorship. Some objections were raised that he was too individualistic and did not observe enough the party discipline.

Before the affair was decided we had a separate encounter and at dinner Mussolini told me that he felt little disposed to accept this position so full of responsibility. But at the afternoon session he unexpectedly declared to accept, but only on one condition, that I go to Milan with him to assist him. This happened only a few minutes after we had been to dinner, together, and even during all that time, he never spoke to me about it. Evidently he meant to take me by surprise. I consented, having considered Mussolini as a weakling who was in need of help and advice, and thought it my duty as a socialist to aid him. But even though I considered him a weakling, I thought he was loyal to the party and a convinced revolutionary, and even to-day I believe that such were his sentiments at that period. In the editorial room I worked beside Mussolini several hours of the day and learned to know him intimately.

His bad humour derived from the fact that he was not in Milan willingly, alone; and was obliged to have some one with him to share the responsibility and this thing impressed me so much the stronger the more we were together.

He spoke to me of everything, and wished that I read every important article before sending it to the press. He never spoke much to the other members of the directors and was reserved with them and held them at a distance. But he let himself be influenced easily.

Once this happened on the eve of a May Day. He called me, agitated, to show me an article which he had written against a syndicalist who attacked him personally. This article had been written in such a violent form that I told him that it did not seem suitable for the Avanti! especially for May Day.

Mussolini, all agitated, said that it was for him a question of life or death to redeem himself with this comrade. He wanted to have his revenge now that he was in a position to do it because this man exposed himself by attacking gratuitously. Then he quickly bid me good-bye, adding that he was going to leave for Switzerland on the 1st May.

Half an hour later he phoned me from the station: "You are right. That article for the Avanti! does not go. Do me a favour not to let it pass."

Mussolini is physically timid.

Every night he begged me to wait until the paper came out, not to go home alone. He was afraid to go out unaccompanied. When once I asked him of what he was afraid he answered nervously: "I do not know; of myself, of my shadow, of the trees, of the dogs."

So I used to stay with him until 4 a.m., and go with him to the doorstep of his home. At first I asked myself why he always wanted me as a companion, but soon discovered that he was much ashamed of his fear and above all he did not like to confess it to any other man. One day Mussolini returned from a tour of propaganda very ill and told me that he could not bear it any longer, that for him it was ended, because he was affected of an incurable disease. And he spoke to me of himself with remarkable frankness, though in a decent manner. I advised him to go to some medical authority to be thoroughly examined. On the morrow he came very pale to the office, accompanied by a doctor. He told me that he felt nauseated to have to always smell of chloroform, that the doctor had pinked him to analyse his blood and that he fainted during the operation. I spoke to the doctor who told me he was at the head of a clinic in Milan and that he had cured several thousands of clients, but that he never came across a man who demonstrated so much physical timidity as Mussolini.

Another weakness in Mussolini, which indicates the same nervousness and lack of decisiveness, is his inability to say no.

Once, with the same kind of excitement, he told me that one of our comrades would arrive that evening and that he was the strongest man in the Socialist Party. This comrade wished that Mussolini, as directing member of the party, approve a proposition to be submitted to the executive committee. Mussolini did not approve it but did not wish for the time being to say no to this man and begged me to say it to him. This comrade came at 10.30 and discussed the thing with me till four o'clock in the morning. When he left, without my consent, Mussolini told me that he could not conceive how I had managed to resist his insistence. The day after, at Genoa, I met this comrade who cheerfully told me that he had obtained what he desired. He never had gone to see Mussolini at his address and had persuaded him to give his approval in writing.

In August of that year Mussolini who, as usual, reflected the sentiment of those by whom he was surrounded, was an ardent internationalist and anti-militarist. He had read in a socialist review that if the war had been prevented it would have been a disaster, because it would have weakened the socialist movement. So for many months after the beginning of the war, he defended this opinion, not because he conceived it himself but beccause it had been suggested to him. In that period the sentiment against intervention in the war were confined only to the proletariat. Nothwithstanding, the spirit of war began to be diffused rapidly among the middle classes and to also infect Mussolini. But he published his first declaration in favour of the union with the allies in a bourgeois paper through a friend's intervention.

This article which wanted to demonstrate that the Socialist Party was not unanimous about the war and which showed how a member of the executive was in favour of Italy fighting on the side of France, caused tremendous indignation.

The Party executive immediately organised a conference at Bologne where Mussolini was called to defend his action. On the eve of this

CONCHIES! WHAT WAS SAID IN 1917?

Because this war is supported by certain persons who were conscientious objectors during the last war; because some of these persons are to be found in the Cabinet, and others are war-recruiting provosts or mayors: it is pretended that public feeling against C.O.s is different in 1940 from what it was in 1916 or 1917. This is untrue, and falsehood helps no cause.

That it is untrue—whether the present war be different or not from the Great War in its intensity or final social consequences—references to the columns of Hansard will prove beyond question. Had the people who attacked the C.O.s in both Houses of Parliament during the Great War had their way, it would have been impossible for the C.O.s of those days to be included in the Cabinet to-day. Whether C.O.s are right or wrong, this fact should be recalled and remembered.

It should be remembered also that over-age "conchies" ought not to be eulogised if they agree to the victimisation of the "conchies" of to-day. The Press that conducts a campaign against the "conchies" of 1940 has no right to eulogise these "conchies" of 1916. To our mind, there is a lamentable absence of dignity and principle in such activity.

We reproduce from the official parliamentary reports the proposals put before both Houses of Parliament in 1917, for the victimisation, or penalising, of conscientious objectors. We take the reader to the House of Commons for Tuesday, November 20, 1917, and Wednesday, November 21; and to the House of Lords for Wednesday, November 28.

In the House of Commons the total political and municipal disfranchisement of the conscientious objectors was proposed. In the House of Lords, it was proposed to banish or deport conscientious objectors. We do not object to these motions. We object to the subjects of these motions enjoying places of honour in the State to-day, and acquiescing, either silently or noisily, in persecuting of the conscientious objector to-day. We say this conduct is unfair not only to the conscientious objector, but to the dead and to the living soldier also. Either conscientious objectors are citizens or not. If they are not citizens, sack the lot; sack the over-age conchie as well as the youth. Be fair—and not false and hypocritical. If you despise the 1940 conchies, sack the 1916 ones also. Be absolute and also resolute.

Here are the reports.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

DISFRANCHISEMENT OF C.O's.

Tuesday, November 20, 1917.

Moved by Sir George Younger. Opposed by Lord Hugh Cecil and Mr. W. Adamson.

Sir George Younger moved to include in the Representation of the People Bill the following clause:—

"Any person who has been exempted from military service on the ground of conscientious objection or who, having joined the forces, has been sentenced by court-martial for refusal to obey orders, and who alleged conscientious objection to military service as a reason for such refusal, shall be disqualified from being registered or voting as a Parliamentary or local government elector."

Sir George Younger—It is really a very small point which is involved in this Amendment. It is whether or not a man who has absolutely refused to fight for his country in its dire distress shall be entitled to a vote. I unhesitatingly say he should not be, and although the House on the last occasion was in favour of giving him his qualification, I trust that on this occasion a different view will prevail. There can be no doubt about it that public opinion outside is distinctly in favour of this proposal. Notwithstanding the very great leniency with which these men have been treated, they have not shown very much gratitude. We deal in this Amendment with two classes of conscientious objectors: those who have been granted exemption, and those who, having applied for exemption, or not having applied, have been taken into the Army and have refused to obey military law, have been court-martialled and have been sentenced to imprisonment. The number of these is very large. But it is not the number so much as the question of principle which is involved, and it is because of the principle that I have again brought forward my Amendment. We are now to a great extent dealing with a manufactured article. The original conscientious objector was largely honest. Now he is largely dishonest.

I can speak with considerable knowledge on the subject. I have been a member of the Central Tribunal since the inception of the Act, and it has been my painful duty in consequence to deal with many of these prisoners. I have had to interview hundreds of them, and I have had very good chances, therefore, of seeing for myself their real character. Originally, we were asked to hold a special inquiry with a view to offering any man whom we had reason to be satisfied that he honestly held his objection an alternative to punishment in the shape of sending him to a Home Office Committee, which would ask him to do only civil work in the interests of the State. At first there was general acceptance of the conditions offered by the Prime Minister. Very few—I think the number could have been counted on the fingers of one hand—among the first 800 or 900 who came before us declined to accept that condition, and those few consequently remained in their cells. But, later on, as time progressed, and as a rather pernicious organisation—the No-Conscription Fellowship—became more active, and I have always been rather surprised that the Government have allowed it to pursue its operations—we had a rapid manufacture of the conscientious objector, and the rapidity of the manufacture was due largely to a concession which the late Prime Minister agreed to in this House. The men were to allow themselves to be called up, they were to refuse to do their drill, they were court-martialled and sentenced to imprisonment, and then they were to go before the Chairman of the Central Tribunal, and, if they answered questions put to them accurately—I do not say straightforwardly—we had no excuse to do otherwise than to send them straight to the Home Office Committee, which would put them to work of national importance.

Latterly I have not myself been attending at Wormwood Scrubs. I have been excused from that duty, but those who have undertaken it have found themselves up against a very different class of objector. Men have refused absolutely, under any circumstances whatever, to accept the conditions of the inquiry or to accept an alternative form of service, and they say, quite frankly, they will accept no form of service, they will no nothing of any sort or kind for the State, and will only do what they wish to do and nothing else. There are a large number of these military prisoners—considerably over 4,000. Three thousand five hundred and forty, in Class A, have been passed out to this Committee and are doing work of one kind or another. There are 126 who are not certified as conscientious objectors and are still in prison. There are 37 who have said they will not fight in this War but would fight in any war of their own choosing. There are 142 who were not conscientious objectors, but were political and socialistic in their views; 611 absolutely and entirely refused the conditions. They would have nothing to do with the State in any shape or form except to take all the benefits it provided. Leniency to this kind of man is entirely misplaced, and if they are to get any further concessions, and if there is any likelihood whatever that they may be released because they have suffered one or more terms of imprisonment, then I say we had better strengthen our law because they will become very successful propagandists.

Many of them have been living together under extremely comfortable conditions, and after their release they have, in some cases, been able to do a great deal of harm. We have now, therefore, an organised system for the manufacture of the conscientious objector, and I do not see how we can stop it unless some different policy is adopted. I could never understand why this agitation should have been encouraged at all. But if it is to be encouraged I venture to think much mischief will result. In some respects, I frankly admit, my proposal may seem a little harsh. There are a certain number of conscientious objectors who are absolutely honest in their opinions. They are misguided people—wrong-headed but perfectly honest. There is the notorious case of Mr. Stephen Hobhouse. I think it is a great misfortune he was not entirely exempted. His character is perfectly well known. But he would not plead before the Tribunal, and in the case of a man who declines to plead the Tribunal has no power. In that case a very worthy case, the Tribunal is in no way to blame for not granting him the exemption which they are entitled to grant under the Act. Exemptions have not been lightly given, nor should they be lightly given. In the case of the Central Tribunal, not a single absolute exemption has been granted in the case of any appeals that have come to them from the local Appeal Courts. In every case a man has had to undertake work of national importance, either through the Pelham Committee or through the Home Office, and it is right that it should be so. I am sure of this: that if hon. Members had seen as many of these absolutists as I have, and had had to cross-question these men as I have, they would form the opinion that while it may be a little harsh to disfranchise certain people who are quite honest and conscientious, it is our bounden duty to disfranchise the others, and to see that if they will not perform their prime duty to the State they shall not be entitled to have any say in the Government of the State.

Lord Hugh Cecil—The preliminary objection

encounter he published an article in the "Avanti!" in which he revealed openly his change of front. He held that Italy should intervene in the war with the western powers and he was evidently anxious to engage the party on this road before the conference took place.

We went to Bologne together in November, 1914. I read the article on the train and said to Mussolini: "If you have written this you must either go and engage yourself in the army or in an insane asylum. You certainly must not expect to remain in the party."

Mussolini answered twistingly: "The whole Executive Committee will be with me."

Evidently he deceived himself, because the party was a whole unit agaist him.

I never shall forget this conference at Bologne. It was one of the worst tragic scenes that I've ever seen.

One after the other the members of the Executive Committee came on the platform and condemend Mussolini's attitude.

He remained silent, gloomy, irresolute, with a wandering look, like a man accused of a crime. Finally I spoke and said that he should reconsider his position, not because he was indispensable to the "Avanti!" but because he was on the wrong track.

Mussolini did not reply until the Executive Committee had voted unanimously to fire him from his post. I then made a motion asking to give him some money.

Then he rose and said in a rude and villainous manner: "I do not want anything. I'll throw away my pen. I don't want to write anymore. I want to return to my trade as a mason for 5 lires a day."

But the truth was that he had already received funds for a paper in which Mussolini would be free to preach war.

At this congress he gave me the impression of a man terrified by his own bad conscience.

that I make to the Amendment—and it applies to all the objectors within its compass—is that it is a very retrospective enactment, inflicting disability of which they had not notice when they incurred it. It is a very well-known maxim of legislation that the Legislature should in no circumstances inflict punishments or disabilities upon persons retrospectively without giving them notice before they commit the offence for which they are to be punished or disabled, so that they may, if they please, avoid the punishment or disability. I submit that this Amendment transgresses that.

Had it been the intention of Parliament, at the time the Military Service Act was passed, to disable any person who desired to avail himself of the Conscientious Objector Clause, Parliament should, in all honest and straightforward dealing, have said so then. They should have said that if a man availed himself of this objection he was subject to a certain disability, and then those who took it would have known where they were. But solemnly to offer by legislation a certain exemption, and then, after a small number of people have availed themselves of the exemption—have taken advantage of the position allowed them by the law—suddenly to turn round and say, "You did not know we regard with profound disapproval the very exemption we offered you. You did not know we intend to punish you for availing yourselves of the exemption we extended to you. You have done what we invited you to do." [Hon. Members: "No!"] Yes, in the case contemplated by Parliament, when a person felt a conscientious objection he was to be exempted—"For availing yourselves of the machinery we set up, we take away from you the vote without warning—and, as I say, without justice—because now public opinion is in a state of irritation, and it would be unwise to resist that public opinion any longer." Let me ask, Who are the objectors? That preliminary criticism applies to all of them, but the mass of my arguments, which I design to submit to the House, applies mainly to some.

I had not the good fortune to hear the speech of my hon. Friend and Member for Ayr Burghs (Sir G. Younger), but I read it in the Report, and, among other interesting features, it contained a very interesting analysis of conscientious objectors, describing the various groups into which they fell. That must convince the House, as everyone who has looked into this knows, that there are very different people classed together as conscientious objectors. The distinction I should perhaps make of them—of course, it is a rough distinction—is that in the case of certain conscientious objectors—I do not know whether they are the majority or not, but that does not matter—there is a seditious element woven in with their conscientious objection, and, as the Tribunals have found, it is not that they are not sincere, but it is that there is another element besides conscientious objection, namely, a seditious objection, with which I have not the very smallest sympathy; and if in any way it were possible to say in respect to those who offered to military service, not a conscientious objection, but a seditious resistance, I should be the last to deny that the State had a perfect right to punish them for that sedition. But there is professedly another category of persons who have a moral or religious objection to military service, and who confine themselves essentially to saying, "I am bound to respect, in regard to my own life, my own conscience. My own conscience tells me that to do as you would have me do would be wrong. Therefore, without any desire of sedition or rebellion, but merely because of the inherent right of every man to obey his own conscience and the higher moral law, which, according to Christianity, we are told comes before the law of the State, I must disobey, not seditiously but because I am answerable here and hereafter for how far I obey my own conscience."

Those are two very different cases, and let me say—because my right hon. Friend referred to sincere rebels with some sympathy—the case of the true conscientious objector is quite different from even the best rebel. At any rate, there are two great distinctions. A rebel is not satisfied with managing his own action; he wishes to control directly or indirectly the Government of the State. The Irish rebellion sought to overthrow the British Government in Ireland. Some rebellions we think right, and some we think wrong. The rebellion of 1688 we think right; the rebellions of 1715 and 1745 we think wrong. In my view, and in my hon. Friend's view, the rebellion that was menaced in Ulster would have been righteous, but we are all of opinion that the Sinn Fein rebellion was wrong. [Laughter.]

My hon. Friends think I am speaking facetiously, but they are profoundly mistaken. I am speaking what I believe to be the platitudes of the subject, because I am anxious to clear part of the ground. In all these cases the rebels, whether they were right, or whether they were wrong, were seeking to influence a great many people besides themselves. They were seeking to control in one way or another the government of the country. I do not think anyone who does that can complain of other people, differently minded, who oppose them, or punish them for their action. Both are acting conscientiously; both pursue the object which they believe is in the interest of the country, and if, in the extreme case, they avail themselves of force they have no right to complain of force being used against them. But that is wholly different from the conscientious objector, who claims to do nothing except to manage his own action, which he is bound to do.

There is a second distinction.

The conscientious objector does what the rebel does not. He appeals to a higher law altogether than the law of the State. The Jacobites of 1745 and the supporters of King George II. were essentially aiming at objects on the same plane, as one may say, and justified their objects by arguments of the same sort, with a different termination. Neither appealed to a different standard of morals or a different standard of expediency from the other, but it is the very essence of the conscientious objector's position that he says the State has, up to a certain point, undoubtedly authority over him, but that in this respect he is bound to obey a higher law than the law of the State—a religious law or moral law which prohibits him from obeying the law of the State.

"I only ask," he says, "leave to obey it in my own person, and because I feel the burden of it upon me. I am bound, as I conceive, to obey this higher law. I am bound, therefore, to disobey the lower law of the State, not because I am seditious or rebellious, or because I want to impose my opinions upon anyone else in the world, but because every individual is responsible here and hereafter for what he does by his own act and by his own will, whether the State commands him or whether it does not."

Mr. Stanton—Why does he not get out of the State? Let him go where he likes.

Lord H. Cecil—That is what I listened to with surprise, if I may say so with respect. . . . My right hon. Friend says the State is supreme. There is nothing beyond it. That is not a novel opinion. I might even say it is a notorious opinion. It is precisely the argument that the German Chancellor, Bethmann-Hollweg, used in the famous speech in which he spoke of the Treaty safeguarding Belgium as a scrap of paper. My memory may be inaccurate, and I may be mistaken, but I almost think he quoted the very same saying, that the safety of the State is the supreme law. If there be no other law, if the safety of the State is for the government of the State, and the citizens of the State, the last word of moral obligation, then how can we blame the German Government for many things for which we do blame them?

Take, for example, one cry which sank, and deservedly sank, into our hearts, and which roused us to passionate indignation—I mean the execution of Miss Cavell. It is not disputed that Miss Cavell was, according to the strict law of the War, guilty of a war crime. What we do say it was inhuman and iniquitous to put her to death? Because, according to a higher law, she had a strong claim to the respect and gratitude of the German Government and people who put ser to death. Precisely because there was a higher law she ought not to have suffered as she did, and precisely because we believe in that higher law we uttered the cry of indignation at her death. Are we to be told now, in the language of her murderers, that the safety of the State is the supreme law? No, Sir. We cannot make any such answer. We are Christians first and Englishmen afterwards. Christianity can never compromise with any national claim. It must have its disciples all in all, soul and body, leaving no sphere out, and to reserve to the State any supremacy is to part company with the Christian system altogether.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Bonar Law)—I should like to know exactly what the right hon. Gentleman means by his argument. Does he mean that because we say the German State does things that nobody else and no State ought to do on the grounds of necessity, that is the same thing as when the other States, notably France, America, and everybody else say, "We have a right to demand that every citizen shall give his life in the service of the State if we ask him?"

Lord Hugh Cecil—I made no such general statement. What I said was that you cannot meet the claim of the conscientious objector by simply saying that the safety of the State is the supreme law. You must accept his appeal to a higher law and argue on the basis of that higher law.

Mr. Bonar Law—Does my Noble Friend's argument mean that a man who has been before a Tribunal can demand that his conscience shall be above the decision of the Tribunal?

Lord Hugh Cecil— The point I am pressing is this, that you cannot set aside a conscientious objector merely by saying that the safety of the State is supreme, and that we will not listen to him, if he claims to serve and obey a higher law than the law of the State. You must say, "We agree with you that there is a higher law than the law of the State, but, judging you according to that higher law, you are in this way in fault." Therefore, I think it is clear that we must follow the conscientious objector on to the ground of an appeal to conscience, that is to say, an appeal to the moral law which is admitted to be superior to the law of the State.

Let me say, in passing, how very surprising the Amendment seems to me, even on what I consider to be the very unsound basis of the supremacy of the State. Let me point out that if we take the supremacy of the State as the supreme rule, and if we take military service as being such a special obligation that it ought to be made in quite a distinct way a qualification for a vote, we are at once in a perfect wood of trouble, out of which I think my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr Burghs (Sir G. Younger) will hardly be able to guide us. There is the difficulty of Ireland. The Military Service Acts have not been extended to Ireland, and yet we are to give votes to all the young men of military age in Ireland, although they have not got this disqualification of military service. If the need of the State be so supreme, if the law of its safety be so cogent, will not some people at any rate ask "How comes it then that you are exempting twenty or thirty times as many people in Ireland, because they are Irishmen, while you are not exempting merely a few in England because they are religious?"

TORY M.P.'s WHO MUST RESIGN

CRIMINAL ANTI-SOCIALISM EXPOSED

FACTS ABOUT THE REAL FIFTH COLUMN

This article is a statement of fact.

It is written without excitement, without fear, panic, or hatred. Some of the people indicted attack conchies to-day, and cry out more and more for conscription. We expose their Nazi and Fascist alliances, and demand their compulsory retirement from public life.

Their pro-Nazi and pro-Fascist record make them incapable of rendering service to democracy at this time of crisis.

The Daily Herald for April 9, 1935, stated that the Anglo-German Association had been dissolved because it was not favoured by the Nazis, and because many of its members disliked Hitler's methods. The Association existed to foster friendship between Britain and Germany. The Manchester Guardian for October 6, 1932, stated that its Vice-Presidents included Lord Snowden, Sir Ian Hamilton, Mr. H. M. L. Fisher and Lord Jellicoe, among others. Some of the members of the Association became members of its successor, the Anglo-German Fellowship. An example is Sir Josiah Stamp, now Lord Stamp.

Lord Stamp was made a peer in 1938. He represents the Bank of England and is Chairman of the L.M.S. He met Hitler. This is an "honour" no Socialist or conscientious objector would have entertained, much less sought. On the contrary, the Socialist would refuse to meet Hitler.

The Evening Standard, London, for November 28, 1935, says:—

> "The Anglo-German Fellowship is a post-Nazi creation and more or less replaces the old Anglo-German Society of which Lord Reading was President. This has been in a state of suspended activity ever since the Nazi Revolution. Among the English members are Mr. Ernest Tennant, who is Honorary Secretary, the Marquess of Clydesdale, and several city bankers, including Mr. Samuel Guinness."

Until he succeeded to the peerage, the Marquess of Clydesdale represented East Renfrew as a Conservative.

The Annual Report, 1936-37, of the Fellowship described its aims:—

> "It is rightly stated that the work of the Anglo-German Fellowship is divorced from party politics; its principal purpose is to promote fellowship between the two peoples, but however much such a purpose is non-political its fulfilment must inevitably have important consequences on policy."

To the knowledge of every member of the Fellowship, this statement was false. There can be a fellowship between two democracies. There can be a fellowship between Britain and the United States, since the citizens can associate and communicate freely. Under Nazi rule, there is the State, but no social order, no citizenship, no culture, and therefore no people. This Fellowship was merely an excuse for the Nazi penetration of Britain, and every member was an enemy of democracy and guilty, consciously or not, of Anti-Patriotism. Despite its banker and Tory membership, which was so esteemed and so respectable, the Fellowship was merely the initial Fifth column.

From "Labour Appeal," New York.

BLACK OUT?

Can Capitalist Democracy survive the war against Fascism? Will it be extinguished in the struggle for victory over the Fascism that has suppressed civil liberty throughout Europe? If so, how will we enlighten the darkness? For mankind must live in light and liberty and cannot dwell forever in darkness and oppression.

The Annual Report, already quoted, claimed that the sister society in Germany entertains English members, and helps them "to understand the movement which is refashioning life in Germany and to see the reforming forces at work in whatever sphere of public life . . ."

Does the British worker believe—does any British soldier, any mother or wife, believe—that the Tory M.P.'s, and the financiers, who subscribed to this obvious lying, who belonged to such an organisation, have any place in British public life to-day? Yet they sit in Lords and Commons; denounce conchies; excuse the treatment at Euston and King's Cross of the B.E.F. heroes from France; and direct the policy of the country. Why?

The News Review, Vol. I., No. 2, January 23, 1936, published an interview with Elwin Wright, secretary of the Fellowship. He said:—

> "It isn't numbers that matter. We want 'Names,' otherwise how can we have any influence with the Government or the Foreign Office."

Is this not the Fifth Column at work?

In the same article, the membership of the Fellowship was described by the News Review as being:—

> ". . . distinguished representatives of British Big Business, who claim Hitler has an 'unanswerable case,' who plan to set up a lavishly equipped Club in London at which Nazi-ism can be preached, Ministers of National-Socialism entertained, feted."

An "unanswerable case"—to suppress the freedom of Germany and avail himself of the democracy of Britain!

The Annual Report quoted states that the following Nazis have been guests of the fellowship:—

(1) Herr von Ribbentrop, on several occasions. He was the guest of Lord Londonderry, at his Irish seat, Mount Stewart, County Down.
(2) Field-Marshal von Blomberg.
(3) Herr von Tschammer and Osten, President of the German Sports Association.
(4) Dr. Ernst Woermann, Counsellor of the German Embassy.
(5) H.R.H. the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha.

The Monthly Journal of the Fellowship, August, 1938, stated that another guest of the Fellowship had been Freiherr von Hadeln, S.S. Adjutant to Herr Himmler, head of the Nazi Secret Police and of the S.S. (Black Guard, properly so-called.)

The Fellowship provided a platform in Britain for various Nazi leaders to plead their cause and to gain sympathy for the Nazi methods of total tyranny.

The Annual Report, 1936-7, reported a speech made on March 17, 1937, by Baron von der Ropp on "German Church Dispute."

The Sunday Times, February 28, 1937, reported an earlier speech by the same Nazi representative. He said: "Herr Hitler has given the Church a free hand. He is a very religious man."

The Monthly Journal, Nov.-Dec., 1938, reported the meeting addressed by General Tholens, deputy-chief of the German Labour Service, who came "specially from Berlin" for the purpose. General Tholens spoke, with a film, on Labour Service.

The Monthly Journal, August, 1938, reported the visit and address given by the Director of the Nazi Strength through Joy movement. The same issue reported the visit and entertainment of Hitler Youth Leaders. All these Nazi agents attended the London meetings of the Fellowship, were welcomed, and entertained privately. They represented, not the German people, but the Dictatorship Government.

Members of the Fellowship who visited Berlin were entertained not freely, by German citizens, but officially, and officially only, by Hitler, Goering, and other leaders of Nazidom. The head of the German Association, the sister organisation to the English Association, is the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, who is an ardent Nazi.

The names of the members of the Anglo-German Fellowship were used in Germany to win support for the Hitler regime.

The Daily Telegraph, for January 31, 1938, reported that, on the anniversary of the Nazi "revolution," the Berliner Tageblatt published "Messages of congratulation from Admiral Sir Barry Domville, former Director of British Naval Intelligence, and the Marquess of Londonderry."

The Times, December 3, 1937, reports the statement of Von Ribbentrop, acknowledging the diplomatic help rendered to Nazi Germans by the Anglo-German Fellowship, Ribbentrop stated that "when Hitler's Reich was formed at the beginning of 1933, there was but little contact between Britain and the New Germany." But owing to "the pioneer work" of the Fellowship, Lord Halifax's then recent (1937) visit to Germany had been made possible.

What was the purpose of that visit but to entrench Hitlerism?

The Monthly Journal, Nov.-Dec., 1938, announced the meeting of the Fellowship at which Herr Ziegfeld spoke on "Christianity in Germany."

Here are some excerpts from the ordinary press.

The Evening Dispatch, Birmingham, February 1, 1939, said :—

"Lord Redesdale, father of Sir Oswald Mosley's wife and of Miss Unity Mitford, Hitler's friend, is one of three well-known British men mentioned by the German newspaper '12-Uhr Blatt' to-day as contributors to an article favouring the return of Germany's former Colonies.

"The others are described as Sir Ernest Bennett, National-Labour M.P. for Central Cardiff and a former Assistant Postmaster-General, and 'Professor' William Harbutt Dawson, of Oxford."

The Evening Standard, London, for February 2, 1939, said :—

"The Berlin newspaper 'Zwoelf-Uhr Blatt' to-day gives prominence to a statement by Lord Arnold urging Britain to take the initiative in settling the colonial question.

"The statements, says the newspaper, are parts of a speech by Lord Arnold in the House of Lords in February 1938, and are now published with his consent.—British United Press."

The Times, February 10, 1939, said :—

"Berlin, February 9.

"Sir Oswald Mosley is the latest contributor to the campaign of the '12-Uhr Blatt' for the return of former German Colonies and against the Jews."

Sir Oswald Mosley and his wife have been interned by the present Government. But Sir Oswald and Lady Mosley are no worse than the other members of this organisation.

Sir Barry Domville founded the organisation known as "The Link." Concerning this organisation, The Observer, London, for November 28, 1937, wrote :—

". . . Admiral Sir Barry Domville, friend of Herr Hitler, Herr von Ribbentrop, Herr Himmler, and other leaders of the New Germany . . . has set about creating friendship, personal, individual friendship . . . Hence 'The Link.' . . . Twice Sir Barry Domville has been Herr Hitler's guest. Recently he went chamois shooting for a week in company of Herr Himmler, head of the S.S. detachments."

The Observer proceeded to describe "The Link" as Sir Barry Domville's own creation, and to refer to him as "its founder and first chairman." It reported an interview he gave to its representative the previous day. Sir Barry Domville said :—

"Already we have nearly a thousand direct members, and branches have been formed at Birmingham, Southend, Chelsea, and Bayswater. Others are about to be formed in Belfast, Croydon, Maldon, Oxford, Aberdeen, and Cape Town. We hope to enrol Germans in London and other parts of the country. They will meet English members at social gatherings . . . Herr Hitler himself is very keen on the movement."

Always remember the dictatorship in Germany and that Germans, as Germans, cannot mix democratically and freely. Admiral Sir Barry Domville was Assistant Secretary, Committee of Imperial Defence, 1912-14; Director of Naval Intelligence, 1927-30; Vice-Admiral, commanding War College, 1932-34. He retired in 1936. No wonder Hitler entertained him.

The Vice-Chairman of "The Link" was Professor Sir Raymond Beazley. Its Council were: Lord Redesdale; Lord Semphill; C. E. Carroll; Professor A. R. Laurie; A. E. R. Dyer; and Archibald Crawford, all members of the Anglo-German Fellowship.

C. E. Carroll was editor of The Anglo-German Review, published monthly at 6d. This paper supported Hitler's attacks on British statesmen and politicians for being the enemies of Germany. It was supported by German advertising. In May, 1938, it described Anthony Eden as "probably the most unfortunate choice of a Foreign Secretary within living memory." In October, 1938, it said that Winston Churchill is "unquestionably the biggest war-monger in Europe to-day."

In the same issue, Sir Barry Domville expressed his Nazi complex in connection with Munich. He wrote :

"There was one piece of good fortune. Parliament was not in session. The discussion of foreign affairs at such a time on party lines in the House of Commons is a grave danger to peace."

He also defined his opposition to Socialism or Communism by misrepresenting Dr. Benes thus :

"So exit Dr. Benes, High Official of the Grand Orient Lodge of Freemasonry, Patron of the 'Anti God' Congress, and outpost of Bolshevism."

Sir Barry Domville, also in the same issue, attacked Baldwin for appealing on behalf of Jewish and other refugees from Nazi terror. He wrote :

"It is not the first time Lord Baldwin has shown a lack of understanding of the mentality of other countries. His announcement that the frontier of Britain lay on the Rhine will not be forgotten abroad."

The Anglo-German Review built up Nazism by pretending opposition to Socialism and Communism, and thus revealed the fact that Anti-Socialism, and not Socialism, has been the enemy of Great Britain, democracy, and even the British Empire.

Professor A. P. Laurie—described as a "famous scientist, pedagogue, student of affairs" —wrote in the December 1938 issue :—

"The second difficulty was Czechoslovakia, a tumor in the heart of Europe ruled by the Communist Benes, which required a surgical operation to prevent it poisoning the life-stream of Europe."

Dr. Benes is not, and never was, a Communist. Nazism has poisoned the life-stream of Europe, as an expression of the last disease of Capitalism.

In December, 1938, The Anglo-German Review supports Germany's claims on Lithuania. The same issue—and this is why we lack sympathy to-day with Sir Oswald Mosley and Captain Ramsay, M.P.—published articles by experts, urging the suppression of liberty of speech and of the Press in Britain. Major-General Wyndham Childs wrote an article suggesting that the law of criminal libel might be used to limit attacks on dictators. This is a disgraceful suggestion.

Professor A. P. Laurie, in the April, 1938, issue, wrote on: "Where Democracy Has Failed."

The same issue discussed Hitler's plebiscite in Austria and declared: "In face of these figures, talks of democracy become meaningless."

In December, 1938, Professor Laurie contributed an article entitled: "The Back of Hitler's Mind." He wrote :—

"The whole conception of a League (of Nations) . . . was the product of the 'intellectuals' who are the curse of the United States and Britain."

At this time, Professor Laurie was seventy-seven years of age and had spent his long life in academic and intellectual surroundings. For twenty-eight years, he was Principal of the Heriot-Watt College in Edinburgh.

The Anglo-German Review was not content with Nazi propaganda. In its issue for November 1938, the Review boasted that Germany had learnt military secrets from Czechoslovakian fortifications. It says :—

"Meanwhile, Germany has learnt much from the surrendered Czechoslovak fortifications, of which some were built by French engineers with experience of the Maginot Line, and, thanks to that knowledge the Siegfried Line is likely to be the strongest in the world. . . ."

Having noted the treacherous character of "The Link," and the Anglo-German Review, let us consider the names of the Conservative M.P.'s who sent messages of support to the Review :—

Name and Constituency.

*Sir Ernest N. Bennett, Cardiff, Central; Miss Thelma Cazalet, Islington (E.); Sir Henry Page Croft, Bournemouth; *Sir John Smedley Crooke, Birmingham (Deritend); Geoffrey Hutchinson, M.C., K.C., Ilford; Thomas Magnay, Gateshead; *Sir Thomas Moore, Ayr Burghs; *Captain A. H. M. Ramsay, Midlothian and Peebles; *Sir Frank Sanderson, Bt., Ealing; Sir John S. Wardlaw-Milne, Worcester.

Those marked with a star were connected with the Anglo-German Fellowship. Sir Thomas Moore was a member of the Council of the Anglo-German Fellowship. With him were two other Conservative M.P.'s :

Name and Constituency.

Norman J. Hulbert, Stockport; Lt.-Col. Sir Assheton Pounall, Lewisham E.

The other starred M.P.'s were individual members only of the Anglo-German Fellowship. With them as individual members were the following Conservative M.P.'s :—

Name and Constituency.

Lt.-Comm. Peter G. Agnew, Cornwall, Cambourne; Lt.-Col. J. Sandeman Allen, Birkenhead, W.; Hon. William Waldorf Astor, Fulham, E.; Sir Robert B. Bird, Bt., Wolverhampton, W.; Commander Robert T. Bower, Cleveland, Yorks.; E. Clement Davies, K.C., Montgomery; Sir Robert V. Gower, K.C.V.O., O.B.E., Rochester, Gillingham; Thomas Loel E. B. Guinness, Bath; H. Cobden Haslam, Horncastle; Wing.-Comm. A. W. H. James, Northampton, Wellingborough; Maj.-Gen. Sir Alfred Knox, Wycombe; Lt.-Col. Hon. G. K. M. Mason, Croydon North; Major Ralph Raynor, Totnes, Devon; Sir Alexander Russell, Tynemouth; Stuart Russell, Darwen, Lancs.; Sir Louis Smith, Hallam, Sheffield; Major the Hon. J. J. Stourton, Salford South; Rear-Admiral Sir Murray Sueter, Hertford; Lt.-Col. Edward T. R. Wickham, Taunton, Somerset.

The speeches of Sir Thomas Moore and Sir Alfred Knox against conchies have been most jingoistic. We refer readers to Hansard reports. Yet these men built up Nazism and the Fifth Column. Their speeches should be disregarded, and every Labour M.P. should demand their silence prior to expulsion from Parliament.

Sir Henry Page Croft has gone to the House of Lords. There he joins the following Peers who were active members of the Anglo-German Fellowship :—

Lord Aberdare; Earl of Airlie; Lord Arnold, Member of the Council of the Fellowship; Lord Barnby, ex-Conservative M.P.; Viscount Bertie of Thame; Lord Brocket, ex-Conservative M.P.; Marquess of Carisbrooke, grandson of Queen Victoria; Lord Decies; Lord Eltisley, ex-Conservative M.P. and member of the Council of the Fellowship, father-in-law of Sir Gifford Fox, M.P.; Viscount Esher; Earl of Galloway; Earl of Glasgow, brother-in-law of Sir Thomas Inskip, M.P.; Earl of Harrowby, ex-Conservative M.P.; Lord Hollenden, Member of the Council of the Fellowship; Lord Hutchison of Montrose, Paymaster-General 1935-8, ex-Liberal-National M.P.; Marquess of Londonderry, ex-Conservative M.P., ex-Secretary of State for Air, etc.; Marquess of Lothian, Parliamentary Under-Secretary, India Office, 1931-2; Lord McGowan; Earl of Malmesbury; Viscount Massereene and Ferrard; Lord Mottistone; Lord Mount Temple, until recently President of the Fellowship—also Chairman of the Anti-Socialist Union, ex-Conservative M.P., one-time Conservative Whip, Under-Secretary of State for War, and Minister of Transport, father-in-law of A. S. Cunningham-Reid, M.P.; Viscount Nuffield; Lord Redesdale, father-in-law of Sir Oswald Mosley; Lord Sanderson; Lord Sempill; Duke of Wellington.

This list omits Lord Stamp, who was mentioned at the beginning of this exposure. Viscount Esher was not content with defending German Fascism. He rejoiced in Japanese Fascism and defended Japan's aggression in China, and complained of British criticism of Japan, in the Times, July 1, 1938.

Lord Mottistone made a speech in the House of Lords on October 22, 1935, on Italy. The Friends of National Spain, and the Anglo-German Fellowship might have been one organisation. They duplicated membership, and also concurred in the Japanese expedition into China.

Some Tory M.P.'s did not approve of these Fascist activities. Their names can be listed later with approval. Meantime we demand public action against those M.P.'s and public persons indicted in this article. Their activities have been completely Fifth Column Activity.

To the names listed we add the following names of M.P.'s who joined or associated themselves at some time with one or other of the three Fascist and Right Wing Anti-British organisations mentioned—organisations existing to destroy democracy and eulogising the Italian invaders of Abysinnia.

Sir Harry Brittain, who was also a member of the Anglo-German Fellowship, was Hon. President of "The Friends of Italy." This organisation was reported in the Observer, May 29, 1938, to be forming an Anglo-Italian Political and Economic Council, guided and advised by Count Grandi, the Italian Ambassador.

Sir Arnold Wilson, Conservative M.P. for Hitchin, approved of the Italian conquest of Abyssinia. He wrote to the Times, September 24, 1935, describing a week's visit to Italy, and declared "I had the honour to be received by Signor Mussolini." Wilson attacked the Franco-Soviet Alliance from the German viewpoint and supported Franco's activity in Spain. "I hope to God Franco wins in Spain," cried Wilson, "and the sooner the better." In a word, the Friends helped also to cripple the British Empire in favour of Nazi-Fascism alike in the East and the West :—

M.P.	Constituency.

Capt. Victor Cazalet, Chippenham; A. T. Lennox-Boyd, Mid. Bedfordshire; R. Grant Ferris, North St. Pancras; Sir Nairne Stewart Sandeman, Middleton, Lancs.; Alfred Denville, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Central; Viscount Wolmer, Aldershot; Lt.-Col. C. I. Kerr, Montrose; Capt. J. H. F. McEwen, Berwick; Viscount Castlereagh, County Down.

Ignore the speeches of these men; pay no heed to their appeals; remember their Fascist and Nazi speeches and associations; demand their retirement from public life.

BRITAIN, BEVIN & BAKUNIN

Ernest Bevin has been accused of being aggressively working class in office. On July 10, he addressed a weekly patriotic "big business" lunch in London, and stunned his Tory audience by declaring that the Fifth Columnists come not from the working-class but from the capitalists. Said Bevin in clear terms :—

> "There is no evidence in Norway, in Holland, in France, or in Belgium that any part of the working-class, whatever the political party may have been, operated as Fifth Columnists.
>
> "The Fifth Columnists Came from Higher Up."

This is true. Because it is true, the task of defeating Fascism belongs to Socialism and to the Socialists.

We must learn from Spain. We must pursue revolutionary methods to end Fascism and war. Socialist conscientious objectors—as distinct from those who are genuine but simple pacifists only—include many who would lay down their lives in the fight against Fascism, if they were sure that their Socialist allegiance was respected, and would not be exploited nor betrayed. Socialists must be allowed to form a Socialist Anti-Fascist Militia. Their scruples must build the European armies of Freedom. Only Socialist propaganda can give powerful Anti-Fascist morale to those who struggle against and under Fascist terror.

Britain's answer to Hitler and to Mussolini is social revolution throughout Fascist Europe. Answer Hitler with Liebknecht; Mussolini with Malatesta. Spread the Libertanian shadow of Bakunin across the Pyrenees. Bakunin was the pioneer of Anti-Fascist struggles and his spirit inspired the resistance of Barcelona. Let the British Government close down the most correct and perfectly absurd British Council for Cultural Relations with other countries. There are no other countries. The struggle against Fascism is civil war. Establish a British Council for fomenting Revolutions in Nazi-Fascist Europe. Let Britain become aggressively Libertanian and working-class. And so destroy Fascism.

SCOTS MARRIAGE

On Monday, July 1, the old Scots Law of Irregular Marriage was abolished except for a very doubtful and difficult preservation of a phase of the Irregular Marriage by habit and repute. This subject is dealt with very clearly in an appendix to our pamphlet, Studies in Communism. Wars pass but the rights of the people lost in war-time are recovered with difficulty, if at all. The assassination of the Scots Law of Marriage ought not to be accepted without protest.

It was in the House of Lords, in 1811, that the Scots Law of Irregular Marriage was first established. This was in the celebrated case of Dalrymple versus Dalrymple. This marriage was contracted by word and presence, a verbal exchange of consent. The man went to England and the woman sued in the Consistory Court. In a word, this case was decided in England and not in Scotland. Lord Stowell delivered the celebrated judgment upholding the sanctity of irregular marriage, of marriage by consent in the presence of each other. The House of Lords upheld this decision establishing the Scots Law of Irregular Marriage.

Four years after the Dalrymple decision, in the case of McAdam, the Court of Session re-affirmed the Scots Principle of Irregular Marriage. Although tried in Scotland, this case was confirmed in the House of Lords.

These cases were reviewed by one of the most distinguished Scots judges and lawyers, and a most distinguished member of the House of Lords, Viscount Dunedin, in the lecture he delivered before the David Murray Foundation Society, March 21, 1935, on the Divergencies and Convergencies of Scots and English Laws.

The Scots Marriage Law is part and parcel of the Constitution of the Scots people. Since the Act of Union of 1707, there has been a continual and constant invasion of the rights of Scotland, above all, of the habits of life and thought of the Scots people. The new law makes the invasion complete by undermining and destroying the fundamental principle of Scots morality. This is no mere national question in a narrow political sense, however, but one that concerns the whole of Britain, and for that matter, all the world. The Scots principle of marriage, defined twice and upheld by the House of Lords since the Act of Union, embodies a fundamental moral principle. The State cannot tinker with or amend this principle in any way without striking a blow at marriage as an institution and mating as a moral fact. It is not a question of geographical boundaries, nor even of theology, but rather one of the deep-rooted custom and understanding of a people: a people that has shown itself powerful, sober and practical in agriculture and industry at home and administrating and pioneering abroad: and, therefore, not a frivolous people as suggested by those who queried the morality of its marriage customs.

Actually, the Scots Marriage Law is practical, ethical and religious. It asserts the ancient Christian view that those who are married in the sight of God must be regarded as married in the eyes of man. Although modern philosophy expresses the same fact without reference to the Theism or the deity, the mental approach is substantially the same. Scots Law expresses the principle that what is marriage de facto, there being no legal impediment, must be marriage de iure. It asserts, also, what is denied by the English insistence of registration as a necessary preliminary, that the actual marriage consists of the solemn matingfor life of one man and of one woman. It can be argued with plainness and simplicity, amounting to brilliance, that Scots Marriage Law, above all other law, does recognise the solemnity and importance of mating, as marriage in its highest sense. The late famous Prince Peter Kropotkin, in his memoirs of Russia, describes how, in the Czar's time, a priest of the Greek Church adopted the very principle prescribed in the Scots Law, and declared that a colony of men and women who have been faithfully living together in the honourable relationship of husband and wife, without any State permission, were married in the sight of God and the Czar.

This brings me to the main point of my indictment of the new law.

Usually, before any amendment is made in the law of the land, and particularly as regards an issue that affects the life of the people so directly as the law of marriage, some enquiry is instituted. The number of Royal Commissions that have sat and have published volumes of evidence on this or that matter of social importance, sometimes without any resulting amendment to the existing law, attest the truth of this contention. In the present case, what has been done? Certainly a Committee was appointed. Certainly that Committee called for evidence. Can it be said that that Committee noted any evidence? Can it be said in the real sense of the term, in the strict literal and grammatical use of the words, that the Committee functioned, seriously considered evidence; duly questioned the witnesses, and actually left on record an account of these proceedings? Did the Committee enquire into the volume of learning that has been published on this matter, canvassing its every aspect? The truth is, no such record was published. The enquiry was polite, frivolous and shallow. It failed, totally, to treat with the patient consideration that was demanded, the most important question of marriage in Scotland.

Another question arises—how did this Committee come to be appointed? Was there any demand for a change in the Law of Marriage for Scotland on the part of the Scots people? Or did the demand come from England? It is my contention that the Scots people never wished any change in their law of marriage; that there was never any need for any change, since the Scots Law of Marriage is neither more nor less than an expression of the simple fact and principle of marriage. From the standpoint of commonsense and ordinary human decency and morality, it is dangerous and unwise to interfere with the Scots Law. If the demand did not come from Scotland, it must have come from Scotland's southern neighbour. But what right had England to demand that the Scots Law of Marriage should be changed to suit the vagaries of the English temperament, its foibles and weaknesses? The answer is to be found at Gretna.

It was alleged, by the English, slandering themselves, that Scotland's English neighbours unwisely plunged into marriage, or contracted bogus marriages, by taking advantage of the facilities at Gretna. This is a very old story. The first attack on the Scots Law of Marriage made in the English Parliament was in 1856, when the Brougham Act was passed requiring 21 days' residential qualification.

Although a very slight modification, even the 1856 Act was an invasion, because its spirit was quite contrary to the idea of Scots Law of Irregular Marriage. The reason given for that Act was the number of runaway English marriages at Getna. It was not asserted, or even pretended by the most bitter critic of the Scots Law, that the Scots had abused their law. But the law had to be changed to suit the convenience of the English, who could not contain themselves but were impelled by the devil within them to treat the moral code of Scotland either as so much fun or else so much menace. We were brought to this position in 1856, and we are brought to the same position more drastically today, because the demand has been more sweeping and uncompromising in its attack.

The Scots Law of Marriage operated well in Scotland. It was part and parcel of the Constitution of the Scots people. It was recognised by the Scots aristocracy and endorsed by the Law Lords of the House of Lords, by the Consistory Court, and by the Court of Session. It has been honoured and practised by the Scots peasantry, and was subscribed to by Scotland's immortal bard, Robert Burns. That moral code which expresses the genius of the thinker, the aristocracy, and the peasantry of Scotland, has been abolished to suit the vices and to please the whims and scandalous behaviour of England's sons. Englishmen have reduced a moral code to a legal sophistry, and so Scotland's law and moral status had to be changed.

England's sons eloped to Gretna with no knowledge and with no understanding of the law of marriage. They had no sense of moral responsibility, and were imbued purely with false notions of adventure. They saw nothing but rare sport in this solemn procedure. Because they were irresponsible, the responsible conception of marriage that is defined in Scots Law, and has been affirmed repeatedly by the Court of Session and the House of Lords, had to be destroyed. The ancient Scots Law of Marriage has been put on one side, annihilated, in response to a mere English whim, and in deference to an English proclamation of its sense of vice.

It is not a principle of Scots Law that those who marry in irregular ways should have the marriage registered, and every attempt to make registration compulsory is a total negation of the fundamental principle of the Scottish Law of Marriage.

Registration was not compulsory because registration does not constitute marriage. Registration is but a convenient official way of recording a fact. Marriage is the fact, not the record of the marriage.

Because of the very exactness of Scots Law on this point, it was assumed by the English critics and deriders that Scots morality is loose. In effect, and in practical working, it was strict. The assumption, made on more than one occasion in the minor Courts of English law, that any relation between a man and a woman, or any exchange of agreement to cohabit, constitute marriage, is incorrect. The supreme morality of Scots Law and its absolute soundness were never better illustrated than in the case of Duran versus Duran, which was decided before the Second Division of the Court of Session of November 1904. The case is reported in the Scottish Law Reporter, Vol. XLII. pages 69-74. Most important and valuable decisions were recorded by the Lord Justice Clerk, Lord Trayner and Lord Moncrieff, Lord Young concurring. Their Lord-Kincairney. In this case it was decided that the ships upheld the decision of the Ordinary, Lord mere exchange of documents was not in itself proof of marriage in Scotland, but there must be supporting evidence of intention, and, if signed by both parties in the knowledge of its terms, and at the time of the signing one of the parties sincerely intended marriage, no mental reservation on the part of the other would prevent marriage resulting. This case brought into high relief the way in which Scots Marriage protected a person against being made a victim of fraudulent misrepresentation.

It is at this point that I wish to attack the procedure of the Committee of Enquiry. Before that Committee, suggestions were made to overcome, very simply, any alleged disadvantage said to result from lack of registration. In the Committee's Report there is no evidence of such a suggestion having been made. I am compelled to conclude, therefore, that the purpose of this Committee was not to seek to amend the Law of Scotland but to pave the way for its utter annihilation. Other evidence was submitted to this Committee as to the way in which English Courts have treated expert legal evidence establishing marriage across the border. In no case has the indignity proceeded from the Scots Law but merely from the failure of the English to understand the nature.

I have said that the new law of compulsory registration is immoral because it approaches the subject with an unclean and an unnatural mind. It is an expression of a strait conventionalism, but not of a strait morality. It is an irresponsible conventionalism divorced from the soil. It includes no understanding of life. After all, marriage is a matter for the individuals concerned. In itself, it is not the affair of the State. It becomes the affair of the State when it is necessary to refer to it as a fact, when it is necessary to record the fact.

The new Act was devised badly and ill-advisedly. There is evidence of this in the Act. For example, the clauses of the Act follow an excellent preamble. The most important thing about Acts of Parliament are to be found in the appendix contained in a schedule of the Acts which are repealed, but a preamble is no part of an Act. In the present Act, the preamble states that marriage of habit and repute is to stand. I cite as evidence of the hurried and incompetent construction of this Act: First of all, there is no clause in the Act that does protect definitely, and in precise terms, marriage by habit and repute. Secondly, since marriage by habit and repute implies non-registration of marriage, and since that implies a period during which the parties must be married by declaration and consent, how is it possible to abolish the one form of irregular marriage and retain the other? One can only do so by instituting chaos in the moral affairs of mankind in relation to the sexes. To satisfy the clauses of this Act, one must conclude that a man and woman will live together, and although they discharge all the normal relations of husband and wife, they shall be deemed unmarried. Then one day, some slight having aroused their anger, and there having been a due lapse of time, they may appear before the Court of Session and demand a Declarator of Marriage. If, unfortunately, that anger should express itself at one month and it be held that sufficient time has not elapsed to establish habit and repute, they will be deemed unmarried. If their anger is amenable to the requirements of time, and postpones its expression for the required period, then they will be married.

The new Act does not amend the Law of Scots Marriage. It ridicules marriage as an institution, and the law of mating. It has destroyed the ancient commonsense of the people and substituted a careless and irresponsible servitude of conventionalism.

THE DUKE'S VIEW

[Recalled by the Duke's appointment as Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Bahama Islands.]

The Duke of Windsor is once more in the news. His future is uncertain, like the fate of the world. With his abdication, he ceased from being front-page news, and Labour Leaders no longer yearned to receive his smile, handshake, and general patronage. Their Socialism was too political and too careerist to go out to a king in exile.

After three years virtual exile, the Duke returned to Britain on a fleeting visit, on September 12, 1939. He received almost as much welcome as a discharged soldier returned penniless from the wars, to a new and barren post-war world.

The abdication of Edward VIII. was very much an Edward Windsor versus Stanley Baldwin controversy. Working-class readers will be interested in another aspect of dispute between these two once public figures.

Earl Baldwin, as Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin, on August 6, 1926, broadcast to the United States of America the following message:—

> "There is no foundation for any statement as to starvation among the mining population. There is little or no indication of the presence of severe distress, even among such miners' dependents as are not receiving poor law relief in their own homes."

What inspired Baldwin's message?

Speaking at Sheffield, on June 10, 1926, A. J. Cook said:—

> "In the latest list of shareholders in the huge concern called Baldwins, Ltd. (return January 1, 1926), there is an entry which shows that the Rt. Hon. Stanley Baldwin, P.C., M.P., Astley Hall, Stourport, Worcester, owns no less than 194,526 ordinary shares and 37,591 preference shares. Baldwins, Ltd., employs over 2,000 miners."

The fact explains the speech. Statesmen are mostly mediocrities, and mediocrities think from their economic interests.

Against Baldwin's broadcast, let us set the broadcast of Edward, Prince of Wales, afterwards Edward VIII., and now Duke of Windsor. In his broadcast to the United States, on December 25, 1928, Edward gave the lie to Stanley in the following terms:—

> "You know that miners have not been in full work for the last four or five years. Almost every worker has experienced short time, fewer shifts per week, less earnings to take home, with month after month things going from bad to worse, until this Christmas there are 250,000 miners out of work. A quarter of a million miners not only with no wages, but who have had none since months. Everything gone, and nothing left to sell. Becauses the distress is concentrated in special districts, do not let us take the line of least resistance, and put out of mind what happens to be out of sight."

It is to be regretted that the Duke permitted himself to be pictured in Fascist Madrid inspecting the ruins made by the civil war. He should note that Fascism was responsible for those scars. Fascism made a toll of life and beauty in Spain.

NO FIFTH COLUMN IF—

In July, 1936, the United Socialist Movement commenced an intensive series of meetings throughout Glasgow, not in large halls, but at street corners, on behalf of the Spanish workers' struggle against Fascism. Leaflets were issued pleading the workers' cause. The series were headed Regeneracion, and were 19 in all. The first leaflet was issued on July 28, and declared that the Spanish struggle would assume an Anarchist and syndicalist character. Regeneracion was a typed-duplicate sheet of which thousands were circulated. The last leaflet was issued in October, 1936.

On September 7 a French comrade wrote from Barcelona acknowledging the receipt by the C.N.T.-F.A.I. of Regeneracion, and criticising No. 7, which detailed a programme of practical unity and action for the defeat by the working class in Britain of Fascism. Had this programme been embraced by the workers, Nazism and Fascism would have been smashed. Our comrade wrote on the official paper of the Secretaria of the Confederacion Regional del Trabajo de Cataluna. Part of the correspondence that followed, urging loyalty and assistance to the Spanish workers in their magnificent struggle, was published in Regeneracion.

On September 19, 1936, the Confederacion invited the U.S.M. "to send to Barcelona a small delegation duly mandated to represent the U.S.M. and to organise here a British Information Propaganda section, a sister-section of our French one."

On September 27, 1936, the U.S.M. was advised that comrades "on the border line" had received instructions to admit Ethel MacDonald, as representing the U.S.M., and Jenny Patrick, of the A.P.C.F., who could "join in the work against Fascism as soon as they will come." It should be explained that Comrade Patrick received a direct personal official invitation from the C.N.T., as an individual, because of her long Anarchist activity.

On October 14, the U.S.M. was informed that Ethel MacDonald was to act as Secretary of the English Propaganda and Information Section.

On October 20, with very little money, Comrades Patrick and MacDonald left Glasgow for Barcelona. The radio speeches of Ethel MacDonald were widely circulated. There is no need to refer to their text here. They called to the war against Fascism and emphasised the fatal consequences of betraying Spain to the Fascist powers. Jenny Patrick, after spending some time in Barcelona, proceeded to Madrid, when she served on the Committee of Defence, and then returned to Barcelona to witness the May Days.

Many of the Conservative M.P.s, who are today attacking conchies and denouncing the Fifth Column, were busy then applauding the Fascist legions in Spain and eulogising the Fifth Column that was betraying the cause of democracy and labour in Spain. The Fifth Column began in Spain. It betrayed Spain and so spread the war calamity that afflicts us now.

The workers should have rallied to the call of the United Socialist Movement in 1936. There would be no Fifth Column in 1940.

CONCHIES! WHAT WAS SAID IN 1917!

(Commons Report continued from Page 116, Vol. I.).

Mr. Keating—The argument is false.

Sir G. Younger—Very few are religious.

Lord Hugh Cecil—Even those few my hon. Friend does not propose to exempt . There are other persons who escape not because you have not imposed the Military Service Acts, but they are persons who are highly disobedient to the State and quite as disobedient as the conscientious objector. There is the whole body of Sinn Feiners. There are the more amiable Sinn Feiners, animated by a great desire to establish Irish nationality, and the less amiable ones who are perhaps moved by German money, but they are all to have votes. There are also the persons who have been actually convicted in the course of the rebellion; those too, I apprehend, are to have votes. There are a great many other persons. I find it difficult to read without a cynical smile my hon. Friend's Amendment, because there is such an air of absurdity in the language of it.

The second part of the Amendment reminds me that there are a great many other people who have been court-martialled besides conscientious objectors. The disqualification is there carefully limited, and it must only be for refusal to obey orders, and only if that refusal has assigned to it a conscientious cause. There are also those who have been insubordinate, and deserters, and all those who have been sentenced for various military crimes and for crimes not merely military but civil, those guilty of criminal vice of the worst and most atrocious kind—all those may have votes. All those who have been sentenced by civil Tribunals, such as pickpockets, robbers, all those concerned in fraud, acts of violence, and those animated by the most odious lusts, the names of whose offences must not pass honest lips—all those may have votes. And why not? There is, at any rate, nothing conscientious about them. They are free from the damning taint of a strong but enlightened conscience. Even if I accepted the basis of my right hon. Friend's argument, I should still feel this Amendment was a scandalous absurdity. If you are really going to disfranchise persons who, because they are disobedient to the State, are to incur this penalty, you must certainly disfranchise all those who have been disobedient by way of crime as well as those who have been disobedient by way of a conscientious objection.

Let me remind the House of some of the cases which will be included in this disfranchisement. They will include the Quakers who are working with the ambulance units abroad. How is it possible to justify setting them below all those bad people of whom I have been speaking. They have gone out and they are serving. They are even running great risks. I do not agree with the scruple which has led them to refuse military service, but who can say that they are not well and honourably employed? I want the House to fix its mind on those and other objectors of the Quaker sort. I do not mean only those who belong to the Society of Friends, but those who belong to other religious bodies, simple-minded people, perhaps, under the influence of a mistaken scruple, who say, "We are sorry that we cannot fight in the War, because the guilt of shedding blood will lie at our door." The first observation I will make about that is, that according to the common religion we believe, holding the view that they do, they are bound to act as they do. To those who in all sincerity think it is wicked to fight in war—for them it is wicked to fight in war—it ceases to be a mere delusion, and it becomes truly operative upon the conscience. As I pointed out during the Committee stage, this is a principle which we are bound to recognise, and we do recognise it in our government of other races. We do not impose on them what they foolishly and superstitiously believe to be wrong. We never require Mahomedans, or Hindus, or any other race which has a different moral standard to our own, to violate their own conscience. We do this not only on the ground of policy, but because we think it right to do it. Although some particular scruple may be superstitious, we think that to violate it is in truth wrong.

On the first point, then, of going before a higher Tribunal, we find that objectors are right, and that they are bound to obey their conscience. What, then, can we say in this case? We can only say their conscience is mistaken.

I am sure they are thoroughly and utterly mistaken, but are you going to disqualify people and punish them for being mistaken in their opinions? If you do you are surely back again to the old familiar ground of religious persecution. Certainly if I held that view, that you might disqualify for opinion, I should not begin with the conscientious objector. I should begin myself with Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists, and many other classes, and I am not sure that my right hon. Friend himself would escape before my disfranchisement was complete. It is to me quite as clear that the Presbyterians are mistaken on the points in which they differ with the Episcopalians as that conscientious objectors are wrong about military service. Both propositions seem to me to be perfectly plain.

That is always so in these matters. Very good people have over and over again felt bound to impose their views because they were so certain that they were right—and I do not think that they were always wrong—but the point is that we have come surely to the conclusion that it is both impolitic from the point of view of the State and also inconsistent with the best interests of religious truth to punish people for erroneous opinions.

Sir J. D. Rees—What about the War and the Army?

Lord Hugh Cecil—Perhaps if my hon. Friend will make an effort he will be able to follow a consecutive argument. I say, therefore, when we come to argue it on that ground, that we must either adopt the position of religious persecution or we must say, as I say, "Yes, you are mistaken, but I am not justified in forcing your conscience, because it is against my own conscience to do so, and therefore I give you exemption."

I thought that was the position that Parliament took up, and I am persuaded that it is the right position for Parliament to take up. We must not refuse the vote to people who are doing what they sincerely believe to be right upon moral or religious grounds merely because we think that these moral or religious grounds are mistaken. If you do not adopt that position you must disfranchise a great many people besides conscientious objectors. But, above all, I feel most strongly—and this, I confess, is why I care about the controversy apart from the strength, as it seems to me, of the case—the danger of the particular error into which my right hon. Friend for a moment slipped last night. I am most anxious that this country should maintain the proposition that there is a higher law, that we view with admiration any appeal to that higher law, and that we will not listen to the doctrine that the State's interest is to be supreme, but on the contrary that we will make our authority conform to the higher standard and keep the State within its proper function, and within its proper scope.

Belief in the State ccannot help us to bear the sufferings or control the passions of the War. It is a barren faith, as well as a degrading faith. It does but encumber us and shut out from us that higher world in which we ought to live. It is like a mist that hangs round the surface of the earth ,and beyond which the sunlight and sky of the higher life shine serene. I was taken up in an areoplane on a misty day, and all was hazy and dark below. We passed through, and there was the sun shining in strength and the sky radiant and brilliant; the mists were no more than a white carpet beneath our feet. So we ought to rise, if we are to face the dangers and difficulties of this War, above the belief in the doctrine of the State. We ought, on the contrary, to maintain that the State must conform to this higher law, and so we say as against the Germans. But shall we even retain to ourselves that self-respect which is essential in maintaining a great moral cause if we do not act up to our own principles for which we are fighting in the face of Europe if we do not say to ourselves and in our own country when people are acting conscientiously that their conscience must not be forced, and when they obey their conscience that they must not be punished and disabled for so obeying, because that is the allegiance we owe to the higher law we obey, and because so we must act as citizens of the true city of the new Jerusalem which is the mother of us all?

It is in the belief in that higher region of alleigance, which imposes upon us something more than the State can ask from us, and which gives us something that the State can never give, that we should vindicate the great cause that we have in hand. We are fighting, we sometimes say, for civilisation. I would rather say that we are fighting that civilisation may remain a Christian civilisation, and certainly, according to a Christian civilisation, it is wrong to force the conscience of the sincere. It is wrong to impose upon them a duty which they believe to be contaminating and corrupting. I hope, therefore, that this Amendment will be rejected. I hope it, first of all, because it is a retrospective law, and so contrary to all sound principles of legislation. I hope it still more because it appears to enforce the law of the State as superior to the moral law, and I am certain that if we give countenance to that way of thinking, we run the danger of becoming, as I fear that the Germans have some of them become, idolators of the State, so that it is, indeed, the abomination that maketh desolate, a blood-stained idol, the Moloch of our time.

[Mr. Adamson's speech to come. House of Lords' speeches by Lords Charmwood and Parmoor, and the Marquis of Crewe.]

EDITOR'S PERSONAL APPEAL

This was an appeal for funds to meet the expenses of the Hyde Park Proceedings and the deficit incurred on The Word prior to Xmas 1939. The deficit has been very heavy since that date. The total received down to March 1940 was £16 6s. 6d. The total to come was £149 6s. 9d. Our appeal was for £166 13s. 3d.

Since March we have received £60 11s. 1d. We have hesitated to acknowledge the amounts because so many comrades wished to remain anonymous. They were afraid that their names in The Word would lose them their employment or lead to some victimisation. With paper shortage we did not wish to publish a column of anonymous sums. We can publish a complete list if it is required; but we thought it wiser to total the sum. Anonymous acknowledgments are stupid when several comrades use the same pseudonym.

The personal appeal stands:

Sum Requested	£166	13 3
Sum Received	76	17 7
Total to come	£89	15 8

We would ask comrades who appreciate our work to raise this sum before the next issue is printed. We work under great difficulties and need all the solidarity comrades can give. In a later issue we shall detail our difficulties. If every reader makes a small sacrifice, this deficit can be raised.

AGAINST FASCISM

WHEN WE WARNED IN VAIN

In 1936 the United Socialist Movement produced and circulated widely 19 minographed leaflets, headed Regeneracion. These were produced by Ethel MacDonald, Secretary of the United Socialist Movement, who subsequently went to Barcelona, to assist the struggle against Fascism. Comrade Jane H. Patrick, of the Anti-Parliamentary Communist Movement, who was imprisoned with us in 1921, went at the same time, and subsequently proceeded to Madrid, when she served on the Committee of Defence. During their stay in Spain, both comrades witnessed the bombing of the Spanish people by the Fascist planes. This bombing was done mostly by Italian planes, although there were some German planes. It should be pointed out that the Spanish Government did practically no bombing and had very little anti-aircraft. Therefore the bombing of the Spanish cities was wanton. It was a war on the civilian population, on women and children, that could not be excused. During this period we called in vain for anti-Fascist activity in Britain.

No. 10 of the Regeneracion leaflets consisted of an open letter to the airman Campbell Black, who was killed subsequently in an accident. When that leaflet was issued, its circulation by our comrades at Renfrew was resented, both by the police authorities and the irresponsible well-groomed civilians who were enjoying the display. Yet every word was true. Had the warning been attended to with the attention the subject merited, Fascism might have been arrested, and there would have been no Mediterranean question to-day? The people who cry out against conscientious objectors, and Socialists, were guilty, at that time, by their indifference to the calls of suffering and humanity and truth, of treason to the very Empire and very Patriotism in which they claim to believe. Now their sloth has proven itself a mortal sin. We remind them of their offence by reprinting in full the leaflet then issued. The text, including errors, and advertisements of meetings, is exactly as found in the original.

HERO OR MERCENARY?

AN OPEN LETTER TO CAMPBELL BLACK.

WHY YOU MUST BE BOYCOTTED.

Sir,—I am informed that on Sunday you will be seen performing numerous airflights at Renfrew. Although the conquest of the air is abused to further the murder of man rather than used to promote the advance of civilization, I should have made no comment on Sunday's performance had the circumstances been normal. When war has ended, as one day it will, air travel will be a boon to humanity, making, as it does, a mock of distance, and uniting the ends of the earth. You have played a great part in this matter of developing air travel, and as a result you enjoy status and popularity. Living as you do, under the capitalist system, you were compelled to commercialise your heroism. Even commercialism should have its limits. The fatal need for money, which assails us all, and turns saints into sinners, and makes blackguards of the best of men, ought not to become such a lust as to turn heroes into gentlemen adventurers, which is but a polite description of banditism. Yet, Sir, you have committed this crime. Hence this open letter.

I am inviting the common people of Glasgow to boycott the Renfrew display because of your association with it. I am asking you to consider the enormity of your offence—an offence, which, if committed in the future, according to the recent declaration of the British Government, will be visited with heavy penalties.

In the News of the World for August 9th last—again for money—you told the story of your employment on July 28th last by the Marchese Rivas de Lingares, Spanish Fascist leader. In other words, you assisted in the war on the properly elected and properly constituted Spanish Government. You rendered able and efficient assistance for purely mercenary motives. Your ethics became the ethics of the bootlegger. You assisted the agents of Mussolini and of Hitler, the employers of Moorish troops against the liberties of the Spanish people. You received money from the persons responsible for the murder wall of Badajoz. For money, you proved yourself an enemy of the common people of Spain, an enemy of humanity, a menace to the peace of Europe and the world. Actually, the money that rests in your bank, or that has been spent in purchasing your creature comforts since your Spanish flight, is the price of accessory to murder. It is stained with blood. Your hands, Sir, though you never fired a shot, are Reproduction is a little smaller than the original typed leaflet.

Concluding portion same leaflet.

I call for the boycott of your air display in the best interests of mankind. Every worker, every man, woman and child from now on should boycott you. By your own conduct you have excommunicated yourself from the society of right thinking humans. You are an outlaw of greed.

now crimson. In your sleep, did conscience operate, you would hear the cries of women and children and hear the steady tramp of the weary feet of the heroic men and women of Spain who are defending their liberty, your liberty, and my liberty. You can be excused from ignorance, but you can never again be the fit associate of those who love democracy and respect human liberty. You exhibition should be boycotted.

What have you done?

You have identified yourself with the Italian and German attacks on Spanish liberties. The Spanish Fascist insurgents were aided by Italy and Germany. If Fascism triumphs in Spain it will be with this aid, and the price to be paid will be the concession of Spanish Morocco to Italy and the Canary or Balaeric Islands to Germany. Do you know what this means? It means not merely the coming triumph of Fascism in Britain, but it means war for the Mediterranean, war for the defence of the British Empire. It means the bloodletting of the British people.

By serving the Marchese Rivas de Lingares, by flying from Bouget to Burgos, from Burgos to Lisbon, and from Lisbon to Burgos; by selling the rebels your machine, you have warred on a friendly government, a government whose Ambassador is received at the Court of St. James; and you have prepared the way for war on your country. For if your Fascist friends and employers win in Spain, the stragetic value of Gibraltar is lost to the British Empire, and there must result war for the mastery of the Mediterranean. You have done this not from any motive of idealism but from your lust for comfort and your desire for gold.

You served in the war of 1914-18, in the R.N.A.S. and R.A.F. You have served the king, when Prince of Wales, personally as airman. You wish to rank as a patriot and an upholder of the British Empire. Certainly, you do not wish it to be said, you have brought bloodshed on your race. Yet this is what you have done. You have menaced Europe and you have menaced Britain with war. You have behaved not only as an enemy to Spain, not merely treasonably against a weak but friendly government, but you have menaced your own home land. For money you have acted traitorously, more traitorously than a man who traffics in State secrets.

I acquit you of understanding in the matter. But no one can acquit you of responsibility.

I call for the boycott of your air display in the best interests of mankind. Every worker, every man, woman and child from now on should boycott you. By your own conduct you have excommunicated yourself from the society of right thinking humans. You are an outlaw of greed.

Franco flies Moors across the Mediterranean at the rate of one plane every quarter hour. Their purpose is to murder Spanish Christians and Democrats.

Germany and Italy supplies Franco with planes.

The Spanish people defend democracy with their lives against foreign Fascist bombers and black troops.

You fly across Spain from headquarters to headquarters of the Rebels conveying Franco's henchmen and adding to Franco's planes. You make a mock of the British pretence of neutrality. Your conduct is treason.

Your friends await the fall of Madrid and the collapse of the Workers' Militia in Barcelona.

A friend of Democracy and a foe to Fascism,

I am,

IMPERIALISM IN THE ORIENT

BUDDHISM, FASCISM, AND WAR

By SIR W. W. STRICKLAND, Bt., B.A.

[In 1934, Sir Walter Strickland wrote two essays on the subject of Buddhism and War. One was entitled: Buddhism's Message of Sanity To The Western World. The other was less friendly to Buddhism and was inspired by opposition to declarations made in favour of Fascism by Japanese Imperialism. We consider the second essay to be the wiser and more useful of the two, as being based on fact, and less dictated by an idealistic regard for metaphysic. We publish this severely critical essay below, and will issue the other essay, in all fairness, later.—Ed.]

"It is all folly."—Dean Swift.

"The gift of truth is above all other gifts."—Buddhist Proverb.

"I do not believe in labels, and therefore profess myself neither Buddhist nor Freethinker, but in the case of two so kindred cults, any misrepresentation of the one by the other, however slight, is regrettable."—Author, writing from Genoa, September 9, 1920, in the Freethinker, October 3, 1920.

Orthodox defenders of Buddhism imprudently, and impudently, maintain that Buddhism was spread in the extreme orient, without provoking conflict: that the teaching of Gautama the Buddha, is without metaphysic, and that its world-concept anticipated the conclusions of modern science.

This claim is far too extreme. It resembles the claims made on behalf of Christianity by orthodox Christian apologists. Buddhist philosophy is far too serene to merit such a degrading comparison.

Most Europeans may be disqualified from grasping the spirit and culture of Buddhism. I claim to have some knowledge of Buddhist culture and tradition. I have some knowledge of classical Chinese, the language into which all the sutras and the important documents were translated. Prominent Chinese, Korean, and Japanese Buddhists have defined Buddhism in Chinese essays.

Like Christianity, the Buddhism that has flourished historically is a mockery of the original teaching and discipleship of Gautama. Buddhism misrepresents Buddha, even as Christianity misrepresents Christ. The Buddhism that spread in the extreme Orient spread by provoking conflicts and promoting reaction everywhere.

In its own Motherland, India, true Buddhism was annihilated completely, and mercilessly by the Brahminists, the conservers of the old reactionary faith of the Hindustani people. Today there is no trace of Buddhism in India. No Buddhist influence is traceable except in Ceylon. There, many of the true Buddhist traditions and ethics survive. From Ceylon, Buddhism addresses its message of sanity to the Western World. That message I would consider before concluding this essay.

In China, Mahayana Buddhism flourished and attained its zenith. It sustained a long continued and bloody strife against Taoism, the popular faith of the Chinese folk. But it never secured a decisive victory. In Japan, Buddhism became almost, the national and official religion. But it provoked one of the most terrible civil wars in history of mankind. It may not be a matter for regret that the civil struggle effected the downfall of many aristocratic clans and passed into oblivion the faith of their ancestors. The facts are sufficient to warrant the statement that the diffusion of the accepted Buddhist faith has been as sanguinary as Christianity and Mohamedanism.

In Japan, when Baron Hayashi was War Minister, the War Office, at Tokyo, published a pamphlet, entitled: "The Principle of the National Defence and Its Intensification." This pamphlet created a great sensation both at home and broad. The opening sentence is a classic declaration of militarism. "War is the father of every creation and the mother of all civilisations.'

Such a statement was an ultimatum from the military to the public. It was a way of informing the public that it did not exist as a civilian entity, that it had no real right of thought or conclusion of judgment, either collectively or individual. The military mind views the mass of the people as so much man-power, so much cattle, to live or to die, as the military masters of the world, the priests of the God of war, decide.

Baron Hayashi's pamphlet calls for earnest consideration by the people of Britain and the United States, because it is directed against the English-speaking nations in particular, and because it embodies the dangerous platitude with which all militarists inaugurate wars. The great menace of war-preparation is that it evolves a huge tyranny which makes insecurity inevitable, and through insecurity, commands the complete sacrifice of humanity. One warmonger could persuade the world to a sacrifice of total destruction. His weapons are fear and suspicion, allied to profits, which are sought through fear. War is based on man's sense of insecurity, his fear that he cannot live well long enough. From this fear he dedicates himself to death.

The war extolled by Baron Hayashi was not to be the usual and common war popular with Western civilization. Baron Hayashi possessed an extraordinary capacity for correct thinking, and so was incapable of recognising that there has never been, in the history of the world, a war that was usual and common. Every war in which man has killed his fellow-man, has been a special war, different from all other wars, absolutely uncommon and unusual. Were it not for this illusion, brave men would never fight them, and kind men would never kill their neighbours. If wars were vulgar, they would not be fought. People go to war wearing blinkers placed on them by governments, systems, and financial interests. If they could get rid of the blinkers, they would shy at the wars. The problem of war is the fact that the knave, the fool and the ignoramus make war; the men of thought and feeling are trapped, and know not how to react. Once wars are declared, it is difficult not to participate; for, without battle, reaction might destroy progress. With battle, reaction perpetuates its nightmare of illusion.

Baron Hayashi defined the Japanese concept of usual and common war as practised by the Western democracies. This kind of war brought only:—

> "the merciless slaughter, mutual hatred and incessant conquest and aggression. Such wars are the necessary consequence of government based on might and malicious struggle, which has no chance ever to penetrate into our nation and State, . . . whose mission is to break down and to tame all the malicious struggles and the tyrannies, and to assimiliate them with the gentle forbearance which characterises our life, in order to make the other nations go the broad and smooth road the Empire is following. The responsibility to be borne by the imperial army and navy is to accomplish that mission and nothing other."

Which is sheer military humbug and merely the enunciation of the political platitudes employed by all war mongers, East or West. It is a pity that youth is reared for destruction to serve such unholy nonsense as is expressed by the Japanese War Lord.

Having enunciated his platitudes, and soothed thought to slumber, Baron Hayashi proceeds to his imperial war demands on the body of Japanese youth. For the accomplishment of Japan's peculiar and unusual mission, and the execution of its responsibility as a nation guarding the way to world peace, as evidenced by its seizure of Korea and its greedy eyes on China, it is natural to expect the Japanese people to support national defence, without a murmur, to the full extent of the military demands made upon them. There has to be complete submission to a full exploitation of their every energy and no complaints under threats of prosecution and execution for treason. For this, Japanese Militarism was not to blame. The fault rested with Western Christian civilization. Hayashi explains, pitifully, the sad case of the Japanese Government:—

"Even in peace time, a sharp and fierce war already exists on such lines as those of economics, culture, and thought by all the countries of the world, menacing us to be kicked out to the position of a failure, if we neglect the synthetical control of every energy in our possession for that purpose. . . . The victory and defeat of the war to come is depending solely upon a good or bad organisation of the national defence, to say in another word, a modern war is the war of the organising abilities."

War is the only way! War, forced on poor, innocent, Japanese capitalism! This explains why Japan needs defensive powers disproportionate to her economic capacities—the old jingo alarmist, empire-spreading argument. Japan is surrounded by countries possessed with malicious ambitions and unjust ideas. America maintains and builds a great navy merely to offend and to threaten Japan, and not because Japan threatens the United States. Not because of mutual capitalist fears. The United States maintains a great navy, merely that her Western voice might be heard in the far Eastern problem, and that she might maintain her to-Japan-so-unjust policy of the open door in China, with its equality of chance for Britain and America. The English-speaking domination of the Eastern World!

Japan, said Hayashi, must overcome the Anglo-American desire to overpower her. To do this Japan had to overpower China. Japan needed a sufficiently strong navy to cope with any Power, and any combination of Powers, which threatened to disturb the peace of the Far East. Grandly ignoring China, and its vast population, Japan spoke imperially and declared that the maintenance of peace in the East was the sole responsibility of Japan!

The Japanese Statesman turned from the Western English-speaking maritime powers to Soviet Russia as a military menace.

Russia's gigantic red army, he declared, was organised for the sake of communising and sovietising the world. I cannot conceive of Communism being willed upon a people from above, and I cannot imagine a genuine Soviet system that does not spring from industrial democracy. I cannot vision armies menacing the world into Freedom, and my faith in Soviet Russia as an International agency of the proletarian revolution has been shocked by reality. Soviet Russia is just a national dictatorial power that has arisen out of post-war chaos. To my mind, its diplomacy is more dangerous and insidious than its militarism. Recognition of this commonplace would not aid the military schemes that ferment in the power-diseased brain of the honourable Baron Hayashi. He paints her as a menacing military power that he might impose capitalist-militarism on the proletariat of Japan. He concludes from Russia's scheming, that Japan needs a strong army to defeat Russia's malicious designs in the Orient!

Having paralysed the Japanese reader with fear, Hayashi piles on the agony by discovering an Eastern enemy. China's treacherous moves must be watched constantly. Japan must develop her espionage service. China adopts against Japan her traditional policy of cunning, the policy of allying herself with the remoter Western democracies to crush her Eastern and nearer neighbour. China wilfully and maliciously misunderstands Japan's sincere and disinterested will to ensure peace in the Far East. China's policy is one of disentegration and decadence for the Orient. So says Japan, whilst abandoning all the traditions of Eastern culture and fashioning her Empire building on Western standards.

Hayashi builds up the case for Japan as the land of liberty! She is to deliver the coloured races from the tyrannical yoke of the white races. Holland, Britain, and America must go. Their trade must leave the Orient. Japanese goods must replace Western goods. Liberty—and Trade! But especially trade! What a splendid slogan for war and sacrifice! The slogan of security through arms!

The pamphlet indicts and challenges the British and Dutch peoples on the ground of morality, and asserts:—

"If the British and Dutch Imperialists continue their unjust and immoral struggles to the last, it would become in certain circumstances inevitable for us to rise with arms in hand against injustices and for justice."

How simple! Just like that! Japan is to invade China and seize the Dutch East Indies and make Pacific warfare on the United States, after having martyred Japanese Socialists and Anarchists and Anti-Militarists, for justice and freedom and morality!

Hayashi falls back upon Buddhist phraseology to prove that Japan's aim is one of Altruism. He uses the word "Mahayana," which means Altruistic, and declares:—

"Our force of arms is a Mahayana sword, to be drawn only for Justice and against injustice; and has nothing to do with the Hina-Yana (egotistic) sabres of the other countries, which are founded upon the tyrannical rules and the principle of the dominance of the strongest over the weakest."

I do not say that the rule of the West is not that of the Hinayana sabre. In my Black Spot in the East, I have stressed this fact. In my travels, time and again, I have recounted evidence of the fact. But I will not accuse the West in order to placate falsely the Westernised East. It may sound strange to those who read Baron Hayashi seriously, but it is none the less true, as everyone who has visited and lived in Japan really must know that the social conditions prevailing in this unique Mahayana land of the rising sun are atrocious and abound in injustice.

(To be concluded.)

WAR: EQUAL MIX-UPS

The Glasgow Evening News, in its issue for June 8 last, devotes two paragraphs of its "Round The Town" feature to C.O.s and the Peace question. The first paragraph is headed "C.O.'s FRIEND," and eulogises Tom Kerr, who was a "conchie" in the great war, and identifies himself with the "conchie" of to-day. It says:

"A Glasgow Bailie who has appeared more than once at Conscientious Objection Tribunals as the 'friend' of young men appearing before the bench is Tom Kerr.

"Lean-faced and spectacled, with a humorous twinkle in his eyes and a smile playing round the corners of a grim mouth, Bailie Kerr is one of the most intellectual-looking men in the City Chambers.

"In debates, he scores with sarcasm. His pronouncements from the Magistrates' Bench in the past have gained him headlines.

"Now he finds himself in a different position. He is speaking for the 'man in the dock.'

"Bailie Kerr is a wiry, athletic type, fond of long hikes and cycle runs.

"He also conducts a Socialist Choir, and is generally a great enthusiast for the arts."

This description is worth while preserving as a cameo of Glasgow civic life.

The paragraph immediately following is headed "PEACE MIX UP," and comes to grips, without mentioning the paper, with The Word and its editor thus:—

"Pacifism makes strange bed-fellows. In one and the same issue of a newspaper in which he gives conscientious objectors the news (and hints) about appearing before Tribunals, the Glasgow Anarchist, Guy Aldred, compliments a Roman Catholic 'conchie' on his stand, and congratulates the Protestant leader, Alexander Ratcliffe, for espousing the pacifist cause.

"Aldred himself is the author of several books which 'expose' the 'superstitions' of both Catholics and Protestants.

"Ratcliffe is noted for his outspoken attacks on the Papacy. He has organised several demonstrations in the city against what he thinks are wrong religious tendencies.

"Recently he has attacked Lord Provost Dollan for 'inconsistency.'

"'Pat" didn't approve of the last war, but heartily supports the nation in this one."

Pacifism makes no stranger bed-fellow than war-time patriotism. Witness the present Cabinet and Dollan's present associates. The Evening News objects to our eulogy of Boyle, for being a Catholic objector, and of Ratcliffe, for being a Protestant opponent of war. This might make argument if the apologists for war did not include Catholics, Protestants, Jews, Atheists, Tories, Liberals, and Socialists. Since this common alliance against Fascism does not cause our contemporary to make comment, why should a common alliance against war itself excite comment?

We praise Philip Boyle because he is loyal to his ideal, and brave, modest, unassuming. We praise Ratcliffe because his pen is fearless. Is that wrong?

The charge against Dollan is not his inconsistency, but the fact that, if the conchie is a coward, he avoided the draft as a conchie when he was of military age, and now that he is over military age he is photographed in the centre of troops, and is all for militarism. In due course, he will receive a title. This looks very much like having the best of both ages. In the House of Commons references are made to present-day C.O.'s with contempt, whereas his name is mentioned in war connections, with respect. It is a strange situation and surely warrants comment. At least, it is a militarist mix-up that equals any pacifist mix-up.

M. P.s' HONOUR

EVACUATION AND EXIT PERMITS

From the House of Commons' Official Report, Oral Answers, for Thursday, July 11 last, we excerpt the following item :—

EXIT PERMITS (MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT).

38. Mrs. Tate asked the Home Secretary the names of Members of the House of Commons to whom exit permits have been granted within the last three months; and for what Government missions such permits were granted?

Sir J. Anderson—It is not possible to ascertain from the records of the Permit Office without undue labour what cases may have been dealt with in the last three months; but if, as I understand, my hon. Friend has in mind the cases of the hon. Members for St. Marylebone (Captain Cunningham-Reid), Blackpool (Mr. Roland Robinson), and Chatham (Captain Plugge), I may say that the hon. Member for St. Marylebone was granted an exit permit at the request of the Children's Overseas Reception Board, and the other two hon. Members were granted permits for business purposes.

Mrs. Tate—Does my right. hon. Friend consider that it is a suitable selection on the part of the Children's Overseas Reception Board to choose as their representative a Member of this House whose Division record is under 5 per cent., whose association has passed a vote of censure upon him, and who also happens to be on the Reserve of Officers, and with regard to the other two Members, was their business of a national character?

This report does not show that Mrs. Tate was shouted down for raising this intriguing question of vital importance. According to the Sunday Dispatch, for July 14, this is what happened :—

" 'With regard to the other two members,' continued Mrs. Tate . . . But at this point a number of shocked M.P.s, feeling apparently that it was more important to guard the reputations of fellow-members than thrash out in the open a situation that has caused uneasiness among the public, shouted 'Order, order,' and were successful in stifling Mrs. Tate's further criticisms."

The Sunday Dispatch denounces those alarmed M.P.'s as "opponents of Free Speech and as enemies of democracy." Our contemporary adds :—

"Mrs. Tate's questions and criticisms were of great importance, and they should not be smothered by the shouts of Parliamentary Yes-men, who were elected to guard the country's interests and preserve the liberties of free speech."

Mrs. Tate informed the Dispatch that, if she had been allowed to finish her supplementary question, she would have said :—

"If members apply for an exit permit except for Government business they should be forced to apply for the Chiltern Hundreds, for they in no wise represent the people.

"Moreover, unless they return to their country in its hour of need they should be called upon to forfeit their nationality."

Mrs. Tate supports this statement in a powerful article, in which she denounces the way in which parliamentary candidates buy their way into their seats, and concludes: "We cannot afford bad politicians over here."

Is it not equally wrong that the children of Ministers should be evacuated, whilst the children of the poor remain behind? We wish harm to no children. But we would think that it ought to be a point of honour for the children of those in office to be evacuated last.

The Sunday Express for July 14, beneath a big heading, informs us :—

"Among British children evacuees reaching New York yesterday in the United States liner George Washington was the son of Mr. Duff Cooper, Minister of Information, says British United Press.

"Asked if he thought Britain would win the war, the boy replied: 'I am convinced she most absolutely will.'

"Other children in the ship were Jeremy, the 14-year-old son of Mr. Ronald Tree, M.P., Parliamentary Private Secretary to Mr. Duff Cooper. Viscount Bayham, a grandson of the Marquess of Camden, and the two daughters of Lord Louis Montbatten."

It is a difficult problem, and we can understand family affection; but if Mr. Duff Cooper felt like this about his son, and his parliamentary secretary felt like that also about his son, then both ought to have resigned their positions. To our mind that is the path of strict and simple honour. The children of the unfortunate should come before the children of the fortunate.

PHILIP BOYLE

PHILIP BOYLE

Philip Boyle was court-martialled for the second time at Maryhill Barracks on Monday, July 15. He was defended by Mr. Gordon Stott, the Edinburgh Advocate and member of the Labour Party. In Parliament, James Maxton and Campbell Stephen have worked hard to make the War Office realise that Boyle is completely genuine. The following question will have been asked (on Tuesday, July 16) by Campbell Stephen before this paper appears in print :—

"109. Mr. Stephen—To ask the Secretary of State for War if he is aware that complaints were made to the War Office regarding the treatment at Maryhill Barracks, Glasgow, of a conscientious objector, Mr. Philip Boyle, 246 Todd Street, Glasgow, who complains that he was forcibly dressed in a military uniform and was assaulted in his cell by military police, and was afterwards sentenced to 28 days' imprisonment for refusal to obey orders; and whether he will have enquiry made into the charges of assault committed against this young man, and take steps to have this case for exemption as a conscientious objector to military service re-submitted to a tribunal for consideration."

This question was asked. We reproduce the reply and supplementary questions :—

Mr. Eden: This man's claim as a conscientious objector was, I understand, dismissed by both the local and appellate tribunals. Nevertheless, he failed to report for military duty and had to be arrested by the civil police. On arrival at his unit, he refused to put on uniform, and was subsequently tried by court-martial for refusing to obey an order. He was sentenced to 112 days' detention of which 84 days were remitted. A court of inquiry has been held to investigate the complaints that have been made, and the evidence is that no force was used and no injury inflicted, and that the soldier made no complaint. His father was given the opportunity of calling witnesses of the alleged assault, but did not do so. Section 13 of the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939, defines the circumstances in which this man could apply to have his case re-submitted to the appellate tribunal.

Mr. Stephen: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when the inquiry was held?

Mr. Eden: I cannot without notice, but my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, at my special request, went carefully through all the evidence, and that is the information given to me.

Mr. Stephen: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that I have a letter from the father and a letter from one of the other prisoners stating that they were willing to give evidence?

Mr. Eden: If the hon. Gentleman has letters of that kind, I should be very glad to see them.

Mr. Maxton: Is the Minister aware that this matter is common knowledge in Glasgow and that the facts are accepted by a large section of the community? Is he further aware that the Glasgow Trades Council has specifically protested against this case, which is the only conscientious objector case about which they have felt it necessary to protest, and will he have these things in mind when he is looking into the matter?

Mr. Eden. It is precisely because of that that the inquiry was held. I was very anxious that the matter should be cleared up, but if there is any fresh evidence, I shall, of course, be glad to consider it.

We saw Boyle at Maryhill Barracks and was in constant daily touch with his father. There is no doubt that he was treated badly. We do not believe that either the officer commanding or the adjutant were responsible directly for such treatment. When Mr. Boyle asked for his son to be allowed to resume civvies, the adjutant agreed instantly.

Boyle was sentenced to 98 days' imprisonment, without hard labour, in Barlinnie (Civil) Prison by his Second Court Martial. The adjutant has reported the sentence to the War Office. Boyle will be taken from Barlinnie to have his case heard the Appellate Tribunal at Edinburgh.

ESSAYS IN REVOLT.

Guy Aldred's nine pamphlets in "The Word" Library have been collected and bound in one volume under the title "Essays In Revolt." The volumes are limited to a small number. Cloth binding, red, gold-lettered. Price 7/6. Post Free, 8/3.

This volume makes a handsome present.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I shall be glad to have a copy of the July WORD this week.

Judging by the number of arrests in Hyde Park it would appear that freedom of speech is over pro tem excepting for those who have nothing to say of any consequence whatever.

Yours faithfullly,
JOHN D. SMYTH.

London, S.W.1., July 10.

Dear Sir,—Will you kindly send me Guy Aldred's booklets, as per list, for which I enclose postal order? Please give the author every good wish from far away New Zealand, from a member of his own open air group upon Clapham Common, London, away back in 1914-15. Well do I remember his battles with Galloway, the little man in the top hat—a bootmaker or shop-owner, I am not sure which.

Anyway, a warm well-wish to G. A., and thanks in anticipation for the literature. We do need such literature here in New Zealand.

Yours sincerely,
JAMES B. TURNER.

Dunedin, N.E.1., N.Z.

Dear Guy,—Have just come across THE WORD. I must say that it is the goods and the real Aldred. You may remember me at Dyce in 1916, but I knew you long before that. It is a treat to know that you are active still. To read your tit-bits in THE WORD is to enjoy a breath of pure air in these days of insanity. Carry on, comrade, and may good luck attend you. Thank heaven that there are a few of us who can hold fast to Socialism. All the best, Guy! Fraternal Greetings.

BERT BREWER.

Northwood, Mdx., 8/7/40.

Dear Friends,—I have enjoyed and appreciated the writings of Guy A. Aldred, and wish to maintain contact with all such efforts to keep alive the spirit of reason and humanity in the present Dark Age.

Yours,
GEORGE WILLIAMS.

Manchester, 15/7/40.

Dear Comrade,—I remember you as a C.O. in the last war, though I did not meet you "inside" when I graduated at Scrubs and Pentonville. Still earlier, I remember that in 1904, when I was living at the Browning Settlement, Walworth, I went one evening to a meeting of the South London Ethical Society at which, sponsored by Harry Snell, you appeared as a recent convert. Recently I have been in contact with your son, Annesley Aldred, in connection with the present C.O. movement, in which I am assisting, as treasurer of the Hornsey Joint Advisory Bureau, and in other ways locally.

With all good wishes, yours sincerely,
CECIL E. CALFORD.

London, N.10, July 10, 1940.

TO YOU!

A cross at this paragraph means that your subscription has expired. Or we may have been sending you the paper free, feeling that you were interested. This paper is produced at a loss and we have had to reduce the amount printed each month to preserve the size and quality of the paper. If you like the paper and cannot afford to pay, we will send it still meantime. But we would like a word from you anyway. The annual subscription, owing to postal changes, is now 3s. 0d. Send to The Word, 104 George Street, Glasgow, C.1.

Sir Arnold Wilson, M.P., mentioned in the first article, is presumed to have died in action. He repented his Mussolini and Hitler worship and decided that Fascism had to be fought to a finish. He refused, in his own words, "to shelter behind the ramparts of the bodies of millions of young men." At the age of 55, he qualified for air-gunner. He never returned from a flight over "enemy territory" made early in June.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

The question of conscientious objectors has been discussed in "Letters to the Editor" in papers published in every part of the British Empire. Many of these are anonymous. Most of them bitterly criticise and denounce the "conchie" for being a coward. Some see the other side of the story. We select mainly the defence apologies, because that side is not considered so well.

The Sydney Morning Herald is the leading newspaper in Australia in prestige. The following letter appeared in its columns for April 9 :—

Sir,—At the sixth annual country convention of the U.A.P., a motion recommending that no exemption from military training be given to "so-called conscientious objectors" was carried without debate. One wonders what is the logical outcome of the trend of mind shown here. A significant implication is most obvious in the use of the words "so-called." Does the U.A.P. consider there are no genuine objectors? Does this party think conscience is dead? Of course, there are those who seek a refuge for their cowardice by playing the role of "conscientious objectors," but even "patriotism" can be the refuge of cowards. Let us credit other people with honesty, even if their views differ violently from ours.

If we are to be caught up in this "totalitarian" tendency and individuals are to be deprived of their rights as such, then we must ask, what are we fighting for? We tell ourselves we are fighting against Nazism for the preservation of democracy. What is democracy? Does it not place foremost the rights of the individual as a member of the community, and hold religious convictions sacred?

Yours, etc.,
B. C. ARCHBOLD.

Glen Innes, April 6.

The Midland Daily Telegraph is the only paper published daily in Coventry. A Miss Sheringham suggested that conscientious objectors were unwilling to combat the disease called "Hitlerism." The appended letter was published in the Telegraph for May 27 :—

Sir,—Miss Sheringham draws a parallel between combatting fire or disease and war, but a very little thought will reveal the weakness in this analogy. A doctor does not kill the victims of disease in an epidemic, but attacks the disease itself which is causing the suffering.

Miss Sheringham has surely stated a very good case for "C.O's." War, the cause of wars, is the disease they are fighting for the good of mankind.—

Yours faithfully,
EILEEN DAVY.

5 The Riddings, Coventry.

From the Bolton Evening News, May 25 :—

Sir,—The greatest glory of the English Constitution is its respect for individual conscience: and the elasticity of the English system has reaped its reward in, for instance, the opportunity to use Mr. Herbert Morrison's genius for organization as Minister of Supply in 1940. The rigid regime of Russia, Germany and France would have blotted him out when he was making pacifist speeches exactly like those of the conscientious objector of to-day.

Mr. Morison's sincerity was not then, nor is it to-day, in question. And surely, in a democratic country, the respect accorded the opinions of our legislators should be extended to the opinions of those for whom they legislate. Hence the Tribunals. —Yours, etc.,

SAMUEL WALSH.

16 Mornington-rd., Bolton.

From the same paper, but date lost :—

Sir,—Critics of conscientious objectors do not seem to realize that pacifists are as passionately devoted as they are themselves to the ideals of freedom, democracy and justice. They only differ in that they do not believe that these good things can be created or defended by evil means (for surely only a Hitler or Mussolini would deny that war is evil). . .

If the constructive ideas of pacifists and similar people had been put into practice before the war, this war might never have happened, so you cannot blame them for refusing to help in this ghastly work of destruction. Or, at least, let us put our much-vaunted ideals that we are fighting for abroad into practice at home by allowing them the right to express their opinions without abuse and misrepresentation.—Yours, etc.,

E. M. CRITCHLEY.

24 Berne-av., Horwich.

From the News Chronicle, London, May 30 :—

It is often urged by those who are not conscientious objectors that C.O.s should not be paid more than a soldier's wages. This is good as far as it goes, and I am sure no true C.O. will object. But it is unfair that those who are in reserved occupations should be permitted to continue their work at normal and in many cases increased rates of pay.—

H. F. TAYLOR.

Surrey.

From the Bristol Evening World, May 31 :—

Conscientious objectors are for the most part those who have a sincere and deep objection to war as a policy, and who have held these long before hostilities began. Their sincerity is judged by Tribunals; the judges are men of integrity and insight.

Conscientious objectors who have been given exemption are willing to be imprisoned or even shot for their convictions, rather than take part in war; but they are also willing to do any work which their conscience will allow them, and this work is for the most part essential to the country.

To "make it as uncomfortable for them as possible" is to forget that it is freedom of thought and speech that Britain is fighting for, and for which she is honoured—the right of individuals to their own convictions, whether they are the same as our own or not. Intolerance and persecution are part of the regime we stand against.

MARGARET BONHAM.

Cotham.

From the Nottingham Evening News, May 23. It is unfortunate that the letter is anonymous :—

GETTING EXEMPTION.

A good deal has been said about conscientious objectors. These young men do at least come into the open and say they are unwilling to fight. Yet the Government is allowing boys who have served seven years' apprenticeship in armament works to be taken and trained to fight and at the same time is sending fit young men into training centres to fill their places after being at the trade for only a few weeks. A number of the young men have gone into these centres with the sole object of getting exemption from the armed forces.

PATRIOTIC.

Nottingham.

The Oxford Times is read in nearly every house in Oxfordshire. It has devoted tremendous space to the discussion of conscientious objectors, especially from the pen of Councillor Yeatman, who attacks C.O.s bitterly. From the issue of May 24, we select a letter that proves that C.O.s are not cowards :—

Sir,—May I inform Councillor Yeatmen that I volunteered for and served in H.M. Forces for four years during the last war, and at the end of that time I resolved never to participate in or support another war. During the passage of time nothing has happened to shake my resolve, and the carnage and slaughter now taking place only deepens my conviction that war is an utterly futile way of settling international disputes.—I am, etc.

P. M. GILLIANS.

Bletchingdon, Oxford. May 19, 1940.

The Cambridgeshire Times has published tremendous correspondence on the C.O. question. We select these letters from the issue for May 10 :—

Sir,—Your correspondents seem to have overlooked the fact that teaching is a reserved occupation and that were the C.O. teachers to lie low they would most probably escape this attempt at ostracism. All credit is due to them for the fact that they have come out openly and fearlessly with their convictions. . . .—Yours, etc.,

LEONARD BUSH.

13 St. Mark's-street, Peterborough,
May 4, 1940.

Sir,—I have always been loth to enter the arena of newspaper controversy. But, faced with the correspondence and agitation of the last few weeks, which has, I understand, culminated in the decision of the Education Committee to dismiss conscientious objectors, I feel that my rule must be broken. . . .

There are certain important issues raised by the recent decision which call for the careful consideration of all members of a democratic community.

In the first place, the decision of a legally constituted Tribunal has been over-ruled and repudiated. The Tribunal, charged with proving the sincerity of the objector, registered these men as conscientious objectors, providing that they continued their work of teaching. The refusal of a responsible public authority to abide by that decision is in my judgment a serious challenge to its authority and to the authority and express wish of the Government responsible for its appointment. The action is really a veiled request for dictatorship of conscience similar to that existing in the totalitarian states.

Secondly, has the Committee given any thought to the future of the men concerned? Surely it is better for them to be engaged in useful work for which they are specially equipped rather than to waste their lives in unemployment.

Thirdly, if one of the reasons given for the dismissal is the harmful effect their teaching may have upon the children, what of those who hold similar views but are protected by their reserved age? . . .

I have no desire to minimise the sacrifices of those who have willingly responded to the call for service, sacrifices affecting both the combatants and their friends, but I am concerned that the rights of conscience, when considered sincere by a responsible Tribunal, should be upheld by others. This is our duty as members of a country which has always upheld the right to freedom of opinion.

Yours, etc.,
LESLIE A. STRINGER.

16 Ash-grove, March, May 8, 1940.

The Torquay Times, May 10, published a lengthy letter, under the heading "NO WAR WITH REAL C.O.s." The essence of the letter reads :—

I have long wondered why a minister of the Gospel did not make a contribution on the subject, so I was very pleased to see the letter from the Rev. A. Cutts in your issue of the 26th ult. I would like to say I support his plea for a little less criticism on your part of the genuine C.O. I admit that many so-called C.O.s need indeed to be exposed for their professions of belief are ridiculous. There are, however, some real C.O.s, and while quite allowing that they should be required to do something, I would like to say that I think they should be treated with tolerance and even respect, for they are only standing up for their faith.

If there were more real C.O.s in England and elsewhere, the world would not be at war. In case anyone should misunderstand me, let me say I am not a "political pacifist" or a "Stop the War" crank; I am sure that as a nation we were bound to go to war.

My definition of a real C.O. is a human being who, having been born again by the Spirit of God, cannot for a second contemplate causing the death of any other human soul for whom the Lord Jesus Christ went to Calvary.

The Northamptonshire Evening Telegraph for June 1 published the following letter :—

BUSMAN C.O. SAYS HE WAS GIVEN NOTICE.

Sir,—I should esteem it a favour if you would print this letter concerning a paragraph under the heading "Left," in last Saturday's Evening Telegraph, in which it was stated that an employee at the Kettering depot of the United Counties Omnibus Co., who was a conscientious objector, had left the employment of the company and that no pressure was brought to bear on him. I, the undersigned, was the person referred to, and I wish to say that the only pressure brought to bear on me was that I was given notice to leave and that notice expired on the 28th May, 1940.

The following letter from the Bishop of Nottingham was published in the Nottingham Guardian, on Tuesday, June 25 :—

Sir,—I have recently been away from Nottingham owing to indisposition. Hence my ignorance as to how matters exactly stand in regard to the reported decision of the City Council that all conscientious objectors are to be dismissed from the Council's employment. If the report is true, I wish to raise my voice in protest. Such action seems to me to mean that we are being infected by the very spirit of intolerance and persecution against which we are fighting.—I am, sir, &c., NEVILLE S. TALBOT, Bishop.

Nottingham, June 24th.

The Bishop's protest was endorsed in two letters published in the Northampton Guardian on June 29 :—

Sir,—May I say how glad many people are that Bishop Talbot has protested against the reported decision of the Nottingham City Council to dismiss all conscientious objectors. Surely Mr. Neville Chamberlain did not intend that conscientious objectors should be hounded out of their jobs and persecuted for their convictions. After a man has had the courage to face a Tribunal and has been declared genuine, that decision should be allowed to stand. No newly-formed bunch of local dictators should be allowed to make such a travesty of justice.—I am, sir, &c.,

CONSTANCE BARRITT.

Nottingham, June 28.

Sir,—I too, in common with Bishop Talbot, wish to raise my voice in protest in regard to the reported decision of the City Council that all conscientious objectors are to be dismissed from the Council's employment. It is said that imitation is the sincerest form of flattery. It seems to me that we are in danger of imitating some of the methods of the Totalitarian States.—I am, sir, &c.,

WHEN THE HEROES RETURN—WHAT?

House of Commons Debate Reveal a Public Scandal That Demands Immediate Remedy

Leading articles in the capitalist press have denounced the conchie and applauded Tommy Atkins. We have been told of the rights of the soldier. Meanwhile, the soldier, according to the facts now made known in a House of Commons debate, has been denied even decent human consideration after reaching London from the horrors of France. We indict this treatment. We indict the capitalist press that upholds the system under which the soldier has been victimised as a pauper and a vagrant after returning from the jaws of death and from a nerve-wrecking sojourn in hell. We claim that these men should have received preferential treatment under the conditions, above every civilian. Let M.P.'s tell the actual story of what happened to the heroes of B.E.F. when they reached Blighty. End the abuse of the conchie and concentrate on the common rights of humanity.

It is a grave pity that every worker does not read Hansard. This is very true of the issue for Wednesday, June 26. We ask our readers to consult the Official Report, House of Commons, for this date, in their library, or to obtain a copy from His Majesty's Stationery Office, at one of their five addresses in the United Kingdom. Read fully columns 535 to 566 inclusive, and then consider how the capitalist order welcomes back to Blighty the heroes of Dunkirk and of the second French evacuation.

At 7.50 p.m. Mr. W. W. Boulton, Sheffield, Central, moved: "That this house do now adjourn." On this motion, Mr. Robertson (Streatham) initiated the discussion on Accommodation, London Railway Termini. We want our readers to follow the exposure as it was revealed in the course of M.P.'s speeches.

Mr. Robertson (Streatham)—Yesterday I asked my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War the following Question:

> "Whether he is satisfied with the welfare arrangements for soldiers in Euston, King's Cross, St. Pancras and Liverpool Street stations?"

My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the War Office replied:

> "Adequate provision of rest rooms, washing and lavatory facilities and food canteens at King's Cross station will be available almost immediately. At Euston, St. Pancras and Liverpool Street stations progress is necessarily slow owing to the congested nature of the stations, but accommodation is available in the neighbourhood and efforts are being made to improve accommodation in the stations themselves." [OFFICIAL REPORT, 25th June, 1940; col. 285, Vol. 362.]

After 10 months of war I regret that I am unable to accept that answer as satisfactory. In addition to the interest which all hon. Members take in the welfare of our troops I have a special interest, because I have the honour to represent the Association of Scottish Societies, 92 in number, who requested me to look into the conditions at the northern stations particularly. To my very great regret I found that there is a total lack of rest accommodation for the thousands of soldiers, sailors and airmen who pass through those great stations by day and by night, and that catering facilities are either absent or hopelessly inadequate. I found that if a soldier wishes to wash himself he has to pay 3d.—if he can get a basin to wash himself in—and that if he wishes to shave himself while washing he is taxed another 4d. for that. If he wishes to use the W.C. he pays a penny. I take the view that the emoluments of a fighting man are inadequate to meet those imposts, which may be quite satisfactory for the civilian population.

I tried to get this matter adjusted without raising it on the Floor of the House. I did not rush in to put down a Question, I spent a month with the Ministers concerned attempting to get things put right, and I am sorry to say that I am still just about where I was when I started. I want to make it clear that this matter affects every hon. Member. Every constituency is represented at those great stations every day. It has been a distressing thing to me to see men lying on trolleys by night, and to hear from Metropolitan policemen, military policemen, railway transport officers and voluntary workers connected with the Y.M.C.A., the Salvation Army and the Church Army of the conditions that prevail, in those stations—for instance of 70 men lying on the linoleum on the floor of the waiting room at King's Cross. Men arrive at 2 o'clock or thereabouts in the morning, and because there is no accommodation available for them they have to try to sleep under those miserable conditions until such time as the morning trains to their destinations start running.

My attention was directed to this matter by officials at the stations who learned that I was interested in the welfare of the troops and hoped that I could do something. To particularise. Take Euston Station. There there is no rest-room accommodation at all for the troops. There is a small canteen operated by the Y.M.C.A. at the extremity of the station. Frequently the entrance to it is cluttered up with mail bags, and in the darkness it must be exceedingly difficult for any soldier or sailor to find it, and I am amazed that they do find it. At King's Cross conditions are similar. My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the War Office, when I spoke to him about the matter, was good enough to take steps to try to meet the needs of the case. He did not get the room which was required but he did get another one, and I, through the associations with which I am connected, found a considerable part of the money to have it fitted with shower-baths, washhand basins, wire beds in tiers where men could rest by day or night and easy chairs in which those who had only an hour or two to wait could sit.

In this connection I wish to make it clear that a trooper is in quite a different position from a civilian. We are masters of our own destiny. We can catch trains to suit our convenience. We can go to the station 15 or 20 minutes before time, or one minute before, and catch the train. We do not need the same facilities as soldiers and sailors, but the railway companies do acknowledge that facilities are required, and provide for the civilians waiting-room accommodation and some catering accommodation. My hon. Friend got a room for us, and I met the Salvation Army authorities and the builders, and we hoped to get to work immediately; but we found we were tenants for a day. The building belonged to the Post Office, or was built for the Post Office, and even though we had spent £500 on it, as we contemplated, it might still have been taken away from us. I submit that my hon. Friend was fobbed off by the railway companies. They gave him not the permanent accommodation which they could have given, but something which they probably knew the Post Office would demand within a day or two.

At St. Pancras Station there is no accommodation at all on the station. Here, again, troops sleep on the floor of a small waiting-room. There is a little hut outside the station, but all that the soldier arriving is confronted with as he marches out of the station are announcements, in letters two feet high, "Cafe Bar." To his left front and to his right front he sees them, but there is nothing to tell him that there is a little Salvation Army hut where he can get food at cost price and within the limits of his meagre resources. The result is that the soldiers go into the more expensive places, whose prices they can ill afford. I found also on farther investigation that the welfare organisations—the Y.M.C.A. at Euston and at Liverpool Street, the Salvation Army at King's Cross and St. Pancras, and the Church Army at Paddington—had for months been trying to put their case before the railway companies and the Welfare Department of the War Office, but without success. They have been thwarted, frustrated, obstructed, and nothing has happened. To show that I am not exaggerating, which is the last thing I wish to do, I should like to read this letter from the Metropolitan Secretary of the National Council of Young Men's Christian Associations. It is dated 10th June and refers to Liverpool Street Station:

> "The use of this station by troops during the night has steadily increased over the last few months, and our canteen, which is open day and night, has often been filled with men who have to wait from four to six hours for a train. Some weeks ago the position reached a climax when our workers counted 40 men sleeping on the platforms and trolleys, in addition to those who packed the floor of our canteen. We applied for the use of a room and were given one of the empty offices. We placed mattresses and blankets therein for 25 men and employed a man to look after the place. To our great surprise we received an official communication from the railway company stating that they proposed to charge us £65 per annum for the use of this room. We have not, of course, agreed to this."

I have inspected that room. It is a kind of "Black Hole of Culcutta." There is room for about 15 men to sleep on the floor, on palliasses. The atmosphere is appalling. There is no proper ventilation, in fact, the ventilation is so bad that the paid caretaker has had to give up the job. Many soldiers have felt so suffocated in that room that they have gone out on to the platforms in the hot weather and walked about rather than lie in that room. I submit that by such arrangements we are paying only lip-service to the problem and not dealing with it as it should be dealt with. Here is another letter from a police constable, whose name I will not give, referring to King's Cross:

> "Catering arrangements appear to be very satisfactory, but many more beds such as those already available are very urgently needed. For the past two weeks about 250 troops have been on the station every night between midnight and 5.30 a.m. This means that a large number of troops still hang about the platforms for several hours and sleep in the waiting rooms. One can imagine the appalling conditions that would be prevailing but for your timely intervention."

That is at King's Cross, where there are very primitive and temporary arrangements pending the spending of £500 upon more adequate accommodation. I find that there is a welfare department at the War Office, presided over by a director who was recently a Member of this House, but has been ennobled. Here is a pamphlet published by him. It is headed:

"A Problem of the New Army."

What I have told you, Mr. Speaker, is not a problem but a necessity. The pamphlet begins, "New welfare scheme," and goes on with another chapter about the menace of boredom. I am speaking about the boredom of the man who cannot get a wash. The pamphlet goes on to describe "What welfare means in practice." At the end, there is an advisory council of 100 names. That council has been called together once, I believe, to hear a report from the director of what the voluntary organisations had done. The voluntary organisations—that is the Salvation Army, the Church Army, and the Y.M.C.A.—were called together to be told what they had done. My belief is that the welfare has been talked about and not done, and I have no other belief.

Now for the railway companies. They have some responsibility. These soldiers, sailors and airmen have all been paid for by the State, and I feel that the railway companies cannot shuffle off their responsibilities in this matter, as they have undoubtedly done at King's Cross, to places outside the station and not within the station

MOSLEY IN BRIXTON

His Imprisonment Described

By MATT KAVANAGH

[* Our old comrade, Matt Kavanagh, who has been active against Capitalism and Fascism for so many years in various parts of England, was arrested in June. Below he describes his experiences and gives his impression of the Fascist menace.—Ed.]

Comrades have read, no doubt, of my little adventure with the authorities. They wish to hear my account of what happened—the story of an anarchist interned among the Fascists. This is a story that upsets many of our usual conceptions of the class struggle and how it operates. For the Anarchist was released, his poverty notwithstanding; and the Fascists are interned still, despite their wealth. And yet Capitalism continues!

I was arrested on a warrant issued by the Home Office. I was described as a person holding views hostile to the State. I could make no answer to this charge from one point-of-view, for I am guilty, most certainly, of holding such views. For over 40 years I have not believed in the State. This means, also, that I do not believe in Fascism, which is the most absolute and most complete expression of Statism and Authority. I do not believe in Capitalist Democracy because it too often betrays democracy in the interests of capitalism and militarism. But I certainly believe in democracy and I am definitely opposed to Fascism. Have I not been opposed to Hitler and Mussolini all the time that the democratic statesmen and politicians were paying tributes to these gangsters in authority?

I was detained, with 3 Socialist comrades and 6 local Fascists, for 12 hours in the Police Station. We were conveyed in an army wagon, under a military escort, to Chelmsford Prison. This place impressed me as being the last word in organised Sadism, and I consider that an enquiry should be demanded by Maxton and others into the methods of provocation and of bullying employed by the officials. After all, no matter what charges might be advanced against us, none had been made. We were even less than untried prisoners and we were entitled to be treated as citizens, and to receive the rights that belong to people who are innocent of crime. That is the first principle of democracy; and if these paid prison officials do not understand this elemental truth, someone in authority should instruct them. In a democracy, innocent men have no right to be bullied, and even guilty ones should be treated with understanding and according to rules of justice and decency. Chelmsford Prison should be overhauled.

After a night and a day at Chelmsford, we were taken to Brixton Prison. Here we were treated decently and allowed to enjoy all the privileges accorded to political prisoners. Conditions in Brixton are as good as they can be in prison to-day.

There are 250 Fascists, I believe, in Brixton, such as Mosley and his general staff. I do not know how much outside influence they possess. It is true they are not charged with any specific offence, but I think that there can be no doubt as to their general attitude. If we put aside the vital issue of Socialism against Capitalism, and view this war as a struggle against Fascism, then Mosley and his supporters cannot complain justly against their internment. Since my experience in Brixton I can write and speak with authority on this aspect of the war: the Fascists in Brixton Prison make no secret as to the nature of their plans: they count on Hitler having an easy victory; they expect an invasion to come and to be successful; and they expect Hitler to proceed immediately to Brixton, and to release Mosley and his crew. They definitely expect Hitler to set up a puppet-government, like the one established in France, and that Sir Oswald Mosley will become the British Fuehrer.

I would not slander any man or men who are prisoners. I would not side willingly with any conventional political attack on someone who, for the time being, was in a position of political outlawry. My word can be relied upon in this matter therefore. However Mosley and his satellites reached their present political attitude; no matter what positions they have enjoyed in the services or the diplomatic service; no matter what their status as members of the British ruling class; no matter what they have said about defending Britain in their speeches or publications; the interned Fascists all hope for a Hitler victory, and all expect to be placed in a key position if that victory is realised. They are all confident of seizing power, as confident as any body of men can be. From what little I could learn during my sojourn in Brixton, the Fascists are well organised and have their roots in all departments of the State. I am sure that they are making no idle boasts. They know what they want and they know how they are going to get it.

Many of us, in our mistaken Socialist and Anarchist disdain of the absurd, have treated Mosley and his supporters too lightly. We have looked on them as mere playboys. I left Brixton Prison thoroughly changed in my outlook and very sober in my reactions. I felt that the danger of a Fascist State was very real and very near. The Fascists do not believe in patriotism nor yet in capitalist democracy. They believe in Hitler and a very definite Anti-patriotic struggle for power. Their belief is in Power. The spineless, chaotic Labour movement, that offered no resistance to Fascism in Germany, Austria, and France would offer no resistance in Britain. Labour Parliamentarians are mere puppets of the capitalist class.

It is a mistake to regard Mosley as a poseur. He is a real leader. In Brixton Prison he takes no advantage of his wealth. He could have a prisoner to clean his cell for 5/- a week, but he cleans it himself. He could have his food sent into him from outside, but he lives on the prison diet, and fares no better than the poorest of his followers in the prison. He maintains a strict discipline over them, and this they obey. It requires no imagination to understand how the Fascists would act once they got in power. It is clear that, despite the virtuous serenity with which Mosley disciplines himself, that Socialists and Anarchists can have nothing in common with the imprisoned Fascists.

I regard the People's Party as the other wing of the Fascists, although they deny being Fascists. The leaders in Brixton are John Becket and Ben Greene. There is no love lost between these two factions and I do not know what the exact differences are. The amazing thing to me was the fact that they all seem well supplied with funds, whatever its source. I would estimate that 75 per cent. of the Brixton internees were definitely Fascists and definitely supporters of Hitler and his policy.

There were only 3 Anarchists in Brixton Prison: Lamb; Lall, the Indian comrade, who speaks in Hyde Park; and myself. There was only one I.L. Per, my comrade Park, who was arrested the same day as I was, at Southend-on-Sea. There were a few I.R.A. men, who are suspected of Fascist associations.

After 8 days' detention the 4 of us mentioned above were released. We were given warrants to take us home. No explanation was given and no undertaking as to future conduct was asked. The Governor, who saw us out, did not seem to know why we had been arrested; nor yet, why we were being released. We were not asked to give any undertaking not to hold views hostile to the State or to refrain from propaganda.

It is announced in the press that Captain Ramsay is in the prison hospital. During my sojourn at Brixton he looked very fit. I believe that he has appealed against his internment and has been turned down. Life in Brixton is irksome, but it may prove to be also useful political resting, during a period of crisis, if you have money. Eighty per cent. of the Fascist internees have money. Sir Barry Domville draws a pension of £1.200 a year. He has all his meals sent in. With him are his son, Compton Domville, and his secretary. He certainly cleans his own cell. Major Davidson Houston was formerly a King's Messenger and draws retired pay from the War Office. Captain Ramsay is a wealthy man, and now draws £600 a year for not sitting in Parliament for the duration.

MATT KAVANAGH
Comrade Matt Kavanagh was an intimate associate of Malatesta, who knew Bakunin better than most Anarchists of his generation.

These people all feel that they are members of the ruling class. If circumstances arose under which they were released, they might easily direct their attention to civil war, Fascism versus Anti-Fascism; especially if a Labour Government were established. We would face either Social Revolution or Social Reaction.

If Fascism is deemed the enemy by our ruling class, then our release was right and only our internment wrong. We, Anarchists, can make no compromise with Fascism. We were fighting Fascism when our present patriotic democrats were building up the claims of Fascism as the bulwark against Socialism. We were fighting Fascism when we were being slandered as bomb-throwers and the enemies of society. We remember Spain and the struggle against Fascism in Barcelona. We were opposed to Fascism then when our present democrats were compromising with the Fascist dictators and ignoring the Fascist outrages which destroyed the liberties of the Spanish people. We are against Fascism still and are opposed to those social conditions that breed Fascism, militarism, and war. We will fight against Fascism, but we insist on establishing a Free Society; inaugurating a social order that knows no more economic misery or distress. Fascism must be destroyed, but war and want must end for ever.

precincts, at Euston to places where one would not have looked, and at St. Pancras, providing no place at all. Every effort is made to force the troops into the catering establishments of the companies or of their licensees. I am sorry to say it, but I have the feeling very deep in my mind, and it is shared by railway transport officers and other voluntary officers whom I have met, that the railway companies have deliberately frustrated this welfare movement because of the loss of revenue to themselves in selling things and the loss of revenue to their tenants in selling cigarettes, tobacco and chocolate.

IN THE DOCK

The Editor's Trials

In May, 1929, we announced our intention to collect and to publish our various trials. A generation has arisen to whom this record of struggle and agitation is unknown. In the February issue of this journal, our tribute to the memory of the late Sir Walter Strickland compelled us to refer to the 1909 trial. This opened at the Law Courts, London, before the Judge in Chambers; proceeded to the Bow Street Police Court; and ended with conviction and sentence at the Old Bailey.

"No man is bad enough to be sent to a place like this," George Lansbury told a visitor when he was confined for a very short period in Brixton Prison. After that, he became a Cabinet Minister in a Labour Government, but no serious change was made in the prison conditions.

Lansbury's conditions were better than those of the average prisoner. It was like those enjoyed by Oswald Mosley and Captain Ramsay to-day. We have enjoyed those conditions. We have been imprisoned in the First Division in Brixton and experienced Civil Imprisonment in Barlinnie. But we have suffered military detention in Devizes, and endured hard labour conditions in Wandsworth, Wormwood Scrubbs, Winchester. We have been on remand, an unconvicted prisoner, denied bail, at Brixton and at Duke Street. Also, in the Old Calton Prison, Edinburgh. These experiences, and the weary business of facing police court proceedings on innumerable occasions at Central Police Court, Glasgow, and Marlborough Street and West London Police Courts, have come to us because of our belief in the need for Freedom of Speech and Press, and the need to play one's part in the class struggle.

The Daily Mail description of our appearance in the Bow Street dock in 1909 has been reproduced. We now publish the photograph taken and published by the Daily Mirror at that time. We reproduce, also, in addition, to the summarised report from the ordinary press, of the criminal proceedings, the legal report of the Old Bailey trial, that appeared in The Justice of Peace, for February 12, 1910. We understand that a similar report, often cited, appears in Cox's Criminal Trials. That report we have not seen.

The later trials will be published as space and time permits.

I.—1909 SEDITION TRIAL.

Guy Alfred Aldred, aged 22, 35 Stanlake Road, Shepherds Bush, was charged on a warrant before Mr. Curtis Bennett, at the Bow Street Police Court, on Thursday, August 26, 1909, with writing, printing, and publishing "a certain scandalous and seditious libel" in the Indian Sociologist for August, 1909. The defendant conducted his own case throughout, whilst A. H. Bodkin appeared for the Treasury.

GUY A. ALDRED in the Dock at Bow Street Police Court, London, Thursday, August 26, 1909.

In opening the case for the prosecution, Bodkin stated that the prosecution was one that had been commenced by the Attorney-General for an offence of a public character and of a serious and important nature. It was committed deliberately by the defendant after warning, and not committed by him merely as a printer, but committed by him as a printer and as a writer of some of the seditious matter contained in the publication. The defendant was connected with the Bakunin Press. He held Anarchistic views, as appeared from the issue of August, 1909, in respect of which this prosecution had been undertaken, and he was a person who was known as the associate of Anarchists in London. The Indian Sociologist was a paper which appeared to have reached its fifth volume. It was described as an organ of freedom, and of political, social, and religious reform. It was edited by Krishnavarma from Paris, and was published for the express purpose of advocating what was called Indian independence, and in furtherance of the Indian Nationalist movement. It was patent, as far as the pages of the paper were relevant to the case, that there was preached, doubtless from the pen of Krishnavarma, to a large extent, doctrines intended to bring about the absolute subversion of the Government of His Majesty in the Empire of India, and advocating and urging those upon whom appeals of that sort would be likely to have an effect to take all means to throw off what was called the alien yoke, means including open rising, violence, murder, and assassination. In May, June, and July, 1909, the paper was printed by Arthur Fletcher Horsley of Manor Park, who was arrested, tried, and sentenced on the very same day as Dhingra was sentenced. Prominence was given to the trial and to the remarks of the Lord Chief Justice in passing sentence, and thus any person who after that date did what Horsley had done had the most ample and open warning that this sort of printing and publication of seditious matter could not be regarded as otherwise than committing a very serious breach of law.

In July, a prominent Indian official was murdered in London by the man Dhingra, and it was borne in on the minds of all thinking people that the promulgation of seditious matter sometimes led to very terrible consequences. In spite of the awful occurrence in July, the prisoner, in the August number of this paper, put himself forward as the advocate of a Free Press. About August 20, this issue came to the knowledge of the police, and copies were applied for and obtained. It bore the name and address of the prisoner as printer and publisher. As soon as its contents had been sensed by the authorities, they decided to act promptly. It was thought quite possible that, under the Newspaper Libel Act, this paper might fall within the definition of a newspaper, and on Wednesday, August 25, Mr. Justice Hamilton, sitting in Chambers, granted leave to serve a summons on the defendant, calling upon him to show cause why he should not be prosecuted for libel as the editor and person responsible for what had appeared. The defendant appeared before the Judge in Chambers, and failed to show cause, Mr. Justice Hamilton making an order sanctioning the prosecution. A warrant was immediately applied for and executed, and at the defendant's premises 396 copies of the paper were seized.

The publication's contents on many pages were redolent of sedition. The accepted definition of sedition was the publication verbally, or in a document, of any matter intended to, or calculated to bring into hatred or contempt, or excite disaffection against the person of His Majesty, the Government, or the Constitution of the Kingdom, or the administration of justice, or to excite His Majesty's subjects to attempt, otherwise than by lawful means, to alter any matter that was by law established, or to raise discontent or disaffection among His Majesty's subjects, or to promote feelings of ill-will or hostility between different classes. There could be no doubt that a serious attempt had been made to raise discontent and disaffection among His Majesty's subjects.

Counsel then proceeded to call evidence of arrest. Chief Inspector McCarthy, of New Scotland Yard, then confirmed the statements of the Counsel bearing on what the prisoner had stated, etc., when arrested, adding that when asked where the Indian Sociologist was printed, the prisoner replied: "I must not give other people away," and refused to give any information on this score.

At this stage the case was remanded until Saturday, August 28, when Chief Inspector McCarthy, of the special branch, New Scotland Yard, was recalled. He said it was part of his duty to keep observation on and attend meetings of Anarchists in London. He had known Aldred for about 2½ years, and had seen him at such meetings, and had heard him speak at them. Defendant held the views of a philosophical rather than violent Anarchist, and his remarks were of a theoretical rather than violent kind. The witness had never heard him advocate violence. Defendant had never suggested that it was necessary for any individual members of the meetings he addressed to indulge in any form of assassination, but had said that it was necessary the people should be educated, and subsequently there would take place what the defendant termed "the social revolution." The defendant advocated what was called a general strike—anarchy through industrial conditions. Everybody would lay down their tasks and do nothing until the millenium arrives. So that by revolution, as expressed by the defendant, he had always understood some future occurrence which would take place after definite education, and not necessarily a violent uprising. When the witness arrested Aldred, the latter produced certain post cards and letters he had received from Shyamaji Krishnavarma dated from his address in Paris. In a letter of July 30, was the phrase:—I approve of your idea of reprinting portion of the prosecuted numbers of my paper and the reprinted portions with any remarks you may make thereon may be circulated along with the Indian Sociologist without mention that it is a supplement."

A police officer, named William Sauge, of the C.I.D. Special Branch, stated that he called at the accused's house on Saturday, August 21, and failed to secure a copy of the Indian Sociologist. He represented himself as a private person interested in the movement. Acting under the instructions of Chief Inspector McCarthy, he then wrote, on Sunday, the 22nd, the following letter to the defendant at his Shepherd's Bush address:—"As I notice that you have taken charge of the publication of the Indian Sociologist, I should feel glad if you would kindly forward me four copies of the same, and oblige, your faithfully, Thomas W. Hudson." He enclosed six penny stamps, and received the four copies as requested. He did not think that, if it was true that the publication was of a seditious character, he was inciting the defendant to commit a deed against the law of the land by writing a letter in a false name after he had failed to secure a copy by falsely representing himself to be a friendly inquirer. He could not give any opinion as to whether it was a crime to incite a person to distribute a seditious paper, or what was called a seditious paper. He had not given a second thought to what it meant to incite a person to commit a crime.

The prisoner here scornfully indicated that his cross-examination of this witness was at an end by sharply turning to the magistrate with a sarcastic: "I think that will do, your worship."

Detective-Sergeant Brust stated that he wrote for a dozen copies of the Indian Sociologist for "himself and a few friends" on August 24, and received them by post the following day.

Detective-Sergeant McLaughlin said that he had kept the defendant under observation for some months past. He had known him as an Anarchist. He had heard him address meetings dealing with general political affairs, but not on the subject of India. He had heard him treat of imperial affairs, however, although not of India directly. He had never heard him suggest political assassination or violence of any immediate kind at these meetings. So far as the witness had observed, the defendant had always acted straightly and uprightly, and had not sought to evade observation.

This concluded the case for the prosecution.

Accused then made the following

SPEECH FOR THE DEFENCE.

"In the first place, I wish to plead 'Not Guilty' to all counts in this indictment. In the second place, I desire, if I may, to point out, so far as the evidence already adduced is concerned, and also the opening remarks for the Treasury, that the prosecution is one of malice, conspiracy, and calculated misdirection; and I object to an immediate committal to the sessions on the ground that such committal would be one of indecent haste, likely to make for a non-securement of justice. So far as the question of malice and conspiracy is concerned, I will pass that, but for the moment, to return to it immediately. So far as the question of calculated misdirection is concerned, I will direct the Court's attention to what Mr. Bodkin, for the Treasury, described as the accepted definition of sedition. That definition reads as follows:—'Sedition is the publication verbally or in a document of any matter intended to, or calculated to bring into hatred or contempt or excite dissatisfaction against the person of His Majesty, the Government, or the Constitution of the Kingdom, or the administration of justice, or to excite His Majesty's subjects to attempt, otherwise than by lawful means, to alter any matter that was by law established, or to raise discontent among His Majesty's subjects, or to promote feelings of ill-will or hostility among different classes.' Like so many other definitions of sedition, or, for that matter, of any subject, which seem at first to be thorough and correct, when submitted to a little analysis, this definition is seen to be particularly void of meaning, and to be one that is likely not only to lead to the apprehension of any person who is known as an anarchist, but for that matter, also to any person who ventured to justify the decapitation of King Charles I. Were it to be defined as an offence against His Majesty's person only, it might lead to an entire abrogation of the present constitution, inasmuch as that constitution is the outcome of the middle-class uprising of Cromwell against absolute monarchism, which resulted in the setting up of the Revolution dynasty of William and Mary. In so far, therefore, as this definition described sedition as being an endeavour calculated to bring into contempt, etc., it may lead to political embarrassment and misapprehension on the part of the loyal and faithful subjects of the realm, since, should the King desire—which I don't for a moment suggest—to usurp the functions of the Commons, sedition would be the condition in which both the King's supporters and the supporters of the Commons would find themselves, according to the point of the view. For the rest, I do not think——"

Mr. Curtis Bennett, the magistrate, who frequently interposed during the speech for the defence, now said: "You must try to put it rather short. This is really showing no defence. I cannot allow you to go on for ever in this strain. What is your defence to this charge?" The magistrate followed up this remark by moving from his seat to exchange some remarks with Mr. Bodkin. The defendant waited calmly throughout this interruption, and when the magistrate had resumed his seat, after laughing and chatting with Bodkin, he proceeded to resume the thread of his discourse as though no interruption had taken place:

"——that anything is likely to create such disaffection as the sense of non-sacredness of one's private letters. Now, in this case, while it has been admitted by the police that my character is quite good, and that I am upright, the authorities have caused to be sent to me certain private letters which afterwards formed the basis of the prosecution. This, I suggest, is more likely to cause serious incitement to anti-constitutional methods by people who do not view things in the same philosophic way as myself than any activity of mine. Were the individuals who did this not agents for the police, and was their action aimed at the overthrow of some established authority, it would, legally as well as morally, be described as a conspiracy. The fact that I am only an ordinary subject of these realms should secure to me the same justice as if I was an established authority. If this be so, the fact that I am a victim of this conspiracy does not make the incitement——"

The magistrate again intervened by saying this was not to the point, the prisoner replying: "By thus dealing with this definition and the question of a conspiracy, I shall get directly to the point of the charge." This comment the magistrate over-ruled, by saying that the defendant was wilfully wandering from the point of the charge. The latter now somewhat tartly replied: "Well, if I am beating about the bush, you have only yourself to blame for allowing Mr. Bodkin to lose himself and the court in the woods. I am only following him." On the magistrate again interposing, the accused, amid some "hear, hears," from the well of the court, said: "Very well, I have secured my object. In that case I reserve my defence." He was then committed for trial at the Central Criminal Court, bail being allowed in £100 himself and two sureties in £50 each, or one in £100.

The sureties were not forthcoming until Friday, September 3, when the defendant was released from Brixton Gaol, where he had spent the interval.

The case came on for trial at the Central Criminal Court on Friday, September 10, before Mr. Justice Coleridge. Two days prior to this, in charging the Grand Jury to bring in a true bill against the accused, the Recorder of London, Sir Forrest Fulton stated that both Krishnavarma and the defendant had been guilty of writing and publishing "a great deal of dangerous and pestilential matter."

When the trial came on before Mr. Justice Coleridge, the prosecution was represented by Sir William Robson (the Attorney-General), his Junior Counsel (A. H. Bodkin), and an array of other counsel. The accused here, as at the Bow Street Police Court, conducted his own defence.

In reporting the case at the time, the Daily Express stated that he was "boyish and defiant throughout," that he followed the case with keen interest, and "delivered a Hyde Park oration from the dock." The Globe stated that he was perfectly calm and self-possessed, but defiant. The entire capitalist Press commented on his youthful appearance.

In opening the case for the prosecution the Attorney-General was careful not to repeat his junior counsel's definition of sedition which formed so prominent a portion of the case for the prosecution before the Bow Street magistrate. This omission was quite noticeable. His speech otherwise proceeded along much the same lines as those along which Bodkin's police court effort had developed. He stated that the defendant wrote offering help and sympathy to a man who was avowedly defending murder of the worst kind, and who had brought down upon himself the reprobation of all decent persons in every civilised community. It might be said that Krishnavarma and the defendant—as the men who had advanced and expounded such a creed—were not only responsible for the death of the victim who happened to be slain by Dhingra, but also for the death of the murderer whose life was taken in obedience to the necessary law.

The Attorney-General then proceeded to cite quotations from the defendant's contributions to the columns of the Indian Sociologist. Defendant had contributed a column of Passing Reflections above the initials "G. A. A.," and seven columns of closely-printed matter, headed "Sedition," under his full name. In the passages thus quoted, defendant declared the existence of the Government to be "a conspiracy against the liberty of the people," or, in other words, "a matter of high treason." He declared that "Prosecution for sedition was anti-constitutional"; stated that, "according to all the laws of jurisprudence, India, in its relations with England, was in a state of nature"; avowed "that the British Government glories in its association with the Czar, the cowardly murderer of many, whilst executing Dhingra, the political assassin of one"; eulogised Krishnavarma as being "a modern incarnation of the much-abused Marat," possessed, as such, of "the same political insight, same uncompromising proclivities and thoroughness"; but confessed that, in his opinion, the workers had nothing to gain as an International oppressed class from identifying themselves with the cause of Indian Nationalism. He remarked, however, that it was the duty of the English military rank and file to refuse to bear arms equally against the Indians, the Egyptians, and the class from which they (the military) were recruited at home. The defendant also wrote :—

> "The question at issue is not the views of any particular person. It is the matter of the unlicensed liberty of speech and writing. If we would not be hanged separately by police repression we must hang together in opposition to political tyranny."

> "Without the assistance of the British workers the tyrants who exploit them could not extend their dominions beyond the seas."

> "Beccaria has denounced as barbarous the formal pageantry attendant on the public murder of individuals by Governments. He sees in these cruel formalities of justice, a cloak to tyranny, a secret language, a solemn veil, intending to conceal the sword by which we are sacrificed to the insatiable idol of despotism. In the execution of Dhingra that cloak will be publicly worn, that secret language spoken, that solemn veil employed to conceal the sword of Imperialism by which we are sacrificed to the insatiable idol of modern despotism, whose ministers are Cromer, Curzon, Morley & Co. Murder—which they would represent to us as an horrible crime, when the murdered is a Government flunkey—we see practised by them without repugnance or remorse when the murdered is a working man, a Nationalist patriot, an Egyptian fellaheen, or a half-starved victim of despotic society's blood-lust. It was so at Featherstone and Dershawai; it has often been so at Newgate: and it was so with Robert Emmett, the Paris communards, and the Chicago martyrs. Who is more reprehensible than the murderers of these martyrs? The police spies who threw the bomb at Chicago; the ad hoc tribunal which murdered innocent Egyptians at Densbawai; the Asquith who assumed full responsibility for the murder of workers at Featherstone; the assassins of Robert Emmett? Yet these murderers have not been executed! Why then should Dhingra be executed? Because he is not a time-serving executioner, but a Nationalist patriot who, though his ideals are not their ideals, is worthy of the admiration of those workers at home, who have as little to gain from the lick-splittling crew of Imperialistic blood-sucking, capitalist parasites at home as what the Nationalists have in India."

These passages, the Attorney-General urged, proved the serious nature of the seditious incitement of which the defendant had been guilty, especially when one remembered the excitable temperament of the Indian population to whom it was addressed.

The case for the prosecution was now brought to a conclusion by a repetition of the evidence that has already been recorded as having been given during the police court proceedings.

The defendant declined to call witnesses or to go into the witness-box himself. But he remarked that he wished to address a short speech to the jury for the defence.

This speech lasted fifty minutes, and included, of course, a good deal of matter of but transient value. Its most important passage was the following :—

> "I have no apology to make either for my attitude towards Krishnavarma, or for what I have written with reference to the Indian question. I claim the absolute freedom of the Press, the absolute right to publish what I like, when I like, where I like. The only condition on which I can secure that right as a proletarian thinker is that I shall secure it for the Indian Nationalist Patriot, Krishnavarma. I can only do that by maintaining, at the price of my own liberty, the freedom of the Indian Nationalist Press, even where I may not agree with its principles. Krishnavarma has been denounced by the Attorney-General as 'a criminal resident in Paris.' Apparently that gentleman means he does not stay in London to risk being transported to India. Sir William Robson knows that if Krishnavarma is a 'criminal' he can be extradited. Why is his extradition not applied for? Because the Attorney-General is repeating in this prejudiced Court in safety that which he would not dare to express as an ordinary citizen in Paris. Gentlemen of the jury, I do not wish to be harsh with the prosecution, but, if you condemn Krishnavarma for not coming to London, you cannot acquit the Attorney-General for not going to Paris."

The Attorney-General now replied for the prosecution, after which the judge addressed his summing up to the jury, who returned a verdict of "Guilty" without retiring. The following colloquy now ensued between the judge and the defendant :—

Justice Coleridge: "Have you anything to say?"

Guy Aldred: "Nothing, my Lord, except that I desire no mitigation of sentence."

J. C. (mildly surprised): "Is that all? Have you nothing else to say?"

G. A.: "Nothing, except that I do not advocate political assassination."

J. C. (passing sentence): "Guy Alfred Aldred, you are young, vain, and foolish; you little know that others regard your statements far more seriously than they deserve. The sentence of this Court is twelve months' imprisonment in the First Division."

G. A. (smiling): "Thank you, my Lord!"

The defendant then left for the cells below, prior to departing for Brixton Prison, where he served his sentence. Before leaving for Brixton, however, he was allowed to see his comrade and companion, Rose Witcop.

The authorities at Brixton treated him with every consideration. He was released from gaol on Saturday, July 2, 1910. It may be mentioned that Mr. Justice Coleridge passed the highest possible sentence that the law permitted.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

September 10, 1909.

(Before COLERIDGE, J.)

REX v. ALDRED.

[The Justice of The Peace Report, February 12, 1910, Vol. LXXIV. A similar report appears in Cox.]

Criminal law—Seditious libel—Attempting to alienate the allegiance of the Indian native liege subjects of the King—Publication of document calculated to stir up discontent and unrest among his Majesty's liege subjects—Definition.

A. was indicted for printing and publishing a seditious libel, in the form of a newspaper attempting to stir up and excite discontent and unrest among his Majesty's liege subjects, and to alienate the allegiance of the Indian native liege subjects of the King, and to cause it to be believed that it was justifiable and commendable to resort to political assassination with a view to liberate India from the government of the King.

Held, that whoever by language either written or spoken incites or encourages others to use physical force or violence in some public matter connected with the State, is guilty of publishing a seditious libel.

The accused may not plead the truth of the statements that he makes as a defence to the charge, nor may he plead the innocence of his motive.

If the accused publishes the libel, there is no distinction in law between what he writes in it and what any other person writes in it.

The defendant was indicted at the Central Criminal Court for printing and publishing a seditious libel.

The indictment recited that, before the commission of the offence charged, one Shyamaji Krishnavarma, was proprietor and editor of a certain publication called The Indian Sociologist, an organ for advocating the independence of India by subverting the government of the King in his Indian empire; that certain previous parts of the said publication contained passages applauding the conduct of certain Indian native subjects of the King who had recently been tried, convicted and executed for murders, commited by them in India and advocating political assassination as justifiable and commendable; that immediately following the publication in England of the July part of the said Indian Sociologist (printed in June) containing the aforesaid passages to wit, on July 1, 1909, one Madan Lal Dhingra, being an Indian native subject of the King, murdered one Sir William Hutt Curzon Wyllie in London, and was tried, convicted and executed for the said murder; and that one Arthur Fletcher Horsley was tried for and pleaded guilty to printing and publishing a certain seditious libel contained in the said July part of the said Indian Sociologist—and charged the defendant with printing and publishing a seditious libel in the month of August, 1909, contriving and intending to stir up and excite discontent and unrest among his Majesty's liege subjects, and to alienate the allegiance of the Indian native liege subjects of the King, and to cause it to be believed that it was justifiable and commendable to resort to political assassination with a view to liberate India from the government of the King; and set out certain passages of the alleged libel (specifying the innuendoes they were said to contain) applauding the conduct of the said Madan Lal Dhingra in murdering the said Sir William Hutt Curzon Wyllie, and repeating the aforesaid portions of the July part of the Indian Sociologist.

The Attorney-General (Sir William Robson, K.C.) Bodkin, Rowlatt and Graham-Campbell, appeared for the prosecution.

It was proved in evidence that the defendant's connection with the Indian Sociologist commenced with the publication of the August number. On the conviction of the late printer, Horsley, for publishing a seditious libel, the defendant communicated with Krishnavarma, the editor and proprietor of the paper, residing in Paris, and volunteered to continue the printing of the paper. And he actually printed the August number, and sold copies to (inter alia) detectives who were acting on instructions from the Criminal Investigation Department. That issue contained articles by Krishnavarma advocating the principle that "political assassination is no murder," and proclaiming Dhingra "a martyr in the cause of Indian independence"; it also contained a violent article by the defendant, justifying the methods of Indian "Nationalists."

At the close of the case for the prosecution, the defendant addressed the jury from the dock, denying that he had ever advocated political assassination or described Dhingra as a hero, and saying that he had printed the Indian Sociologist because he claimed the right of a free press.

Coleridge J., in the course of his summing up to the jury said: It is not necessary for me in this case to give you a full accurate and comprehensive definition of all that could come under the head of seditious libel, because the prosecution have practically limited their case to one form of seditious libel, and that is, that in a publication for which the defendant was responsible, he used language implying that it was lawful and commendable to employ physical force in any manner or form whatsoever against the government of our Lord the King or towards and against the British liege subjects of our Lord the King; and the case has all turned upon that form or species of seditious libel. Nothing is clearer than the law on this head, namely that whoever by language either written or spoken incites or encourages others to use physical force or violence in some public matter connected with the State, is guilty of publishing a seditious libel. The word "sedition" in its ordinary natural signification denotes a tumult, an insurrection, a popular commotion, or an uproar; it implies violence and lawlessness in some form; but the man who is accused may not plead the truth of the statements that he makes as a defence to the charge nor may he plead the innocence of his motive; that is not a defence to the charge. The

THE "CONCHIE" HERESY HUNT

In the June and July Word, we instanced twenty Municipal Corporations that had decided to dispense immediately with the services of conscientious objector employees. This policy of victimisation was supported by working-class organisations, that did not see that they were upholding the policy of a reduced standard of living. If the soldier is worse off than the industrial worker, his status ought to be improved. We dealt also with dismissals brought about in other cases by work-mates striking and a co-operative attack on the "conchie" employees. The present article collects more records of conchie-baiting.

Conscientious objector employees have been sacked, receiving one month's pay in lieu of notice by the County, Town, City, or Urban District Councils of Gillingham, Worthing, Middlesbrough, Horncastle, Worcester, Cambridgeshire, Watford, Bebington, Hull, Bullingdon, Southport, Blackpool, Caterham and Warlingham (Surrey), Friern Barnet, Wolverhampton, East Ham, Brighton, Plymouth, Rugby, West Bromwich, Burnley, Ilford, Stoke-on-Trent, Bradfield, Dudley, Torquay, Birmingham, Chiswick.

Some of the discussion that preceded the motion for dismissal being passed is noted in the present summary. The date is given in each paragraph.

Bradfield, May 15. Decision announced by the Chairman, Brig.-General R. C. Lukin. He said that if the Council's one objector employee was allowed to remain in the Council's employ, it would cause considerable discontent among the other clerks who were being called-up.

West Bromwich, June 5. Councillor J. J. Grant said conscientious objectors were a luxury they could no longer afford.

Gillingham, June 3. The Council decided to discharge its employees, two conscientious objectors, and to pay them one month's salary in lieu of notice. One man was an accountancy assistant, Borough Treasurer's Department, and the other a junior clerk, Health Department.

"They have been tried and found wanting," said the Deputy Mayor, Alderman J. J. Knight.

Bullingdon, Southport, Blackpool, July 3. In the first case, rates clerk and evacuation clerk affected. Tribunal had exempted each conditionally upon remaining in present occupation. Southport decision was carried by 28 votes to 9. Alderman Sir Ernest Hadfield said that the resolution penalised the genuine C.O. Blackpool applied its decision, taken previously, to a schoolteacher, who objected to taking human life, but was willing to serve in the R.A.M.C. at home or abroad.

Blackpool's Deputy Mayor, Councillor Jacob Parkinson said there was no difference between one C.O. and another. He added :—

"If a person is registered as a C.O. his services ought to be dispensed with."

Councillor Hill protested against the decision. He said that if the school-teacher were dismissed from the employ of the Corporation, and subsequently served his country in the ranks of the Royal Army Medical Corps, he would have no claim to being taken back into Corporation employment after the war, even though he had served on the field of battle.

Plymouth, June 17. Voting was 52 to 1. Alderman Churchward was one of 15 who abstained from voting. But he defended the conscientious objector in his speech and was interrupted a great deal. He had scores of friends who were pacifists and conscientious objectors, and he respected them because they had made great sacrifices. The Government had set up tribunals to see if the C.O. was valid, and he was afraid that the Council was setting itself up to judge the man again. He described as a "blue pencil lie" the statement that conscientious objector teachers engaged in subversive teaching, and thought that the Council ought to have something more worthy to do at a time of emergency than heresy-hunting.

There had been a previous discussion at Plymouth, by the Education Committee, on June 7, when it was decided to dismiss all conscientious objector teachers, unless they were willing to undertake non-combatant service. The Chairman said that he had suspended from teaching, pending a decision by the Council, a member of the teaching staff of the Devonport High School for Boys, who was a conscientious objector. It turned out that the Chairman had suppressed a letter, addressed to the Council in defence of the teacher.

Councillor V. Pedlar declared that, as the teacher had not been guilty of any moral lapse or misconduct in connection with school work, the Chairman had no right to suspend him. Councillor H. L. Spear denounced the suspension as high-handed. Councillor A. L. Strachan stated that the action had perturbed the school staff. Alderman Oke said that a serious injustice had been inflicted. The Chairman excused himself by saying that Plymouth was a service town and the dismissal of a conchie school-teacher was a "good and urgent course." Alderman J. W. A. Campbell said that there was no evidence of pernicious doctrines being taught, and it was wrong to assume it. Conscientious objection was not criminal; the law allowed it and there was a proper Court to decide whether it was valid or not. Alderman Campbell added :—

"Unless we are anarchists, we must accept that legal system. I have no use for false objectors, but I have the greatest respect for those who are genuine. There are many who shelter behind objection, and it is difficult to find out who are genuine.

"We ought not to make things more difficult for them. They are worth more than those who have not the pluck to say they are objectors."

Councillor Lt.-Col. N. J. P. Revington was appalled by Ald. Campbell. With great naiveness, he asked and explained :—

"Would they tolerate it in Germany? I believe in everyone having a conscience, but those who are objecting are doing it from blue funk. I cannot see where genuineness comes in and I cannot draw the line."

Alderman H. G. Mason said they had not yet reached the form of Nazi-ism where they could not hold their own opinions. He added :—

"This teacher told the Tribunal he was prepared to take up non-combatant work, and it has been stated Tribunals consider teachers' capacity as of greater use to the country in their own profession. Even in wartime we should not stifle rights and endorse a Nazi system when the menace is so close upon us."

Rev. J. H. McDonald (head master of Beaconfield College) said he had refused to appoint C.O.s to his staff and the governors had taken the unusual course of appointing a woman because the other applicants were C.O.s.

Wolverhampton, June 10. Councillor Guy said that there was a nest of conscientious objectors in the treasurer's department and some of those officers had been sent round to pay members of the A.R.P. personnel. Councillor G. Williams said that if the war is worth fighting for, it is worth fighting to preserve the privilege of freedom of action in this country.

Alderman Alan Davies proposed that dismissal should not apply to the man whose conscientious objections are to combatant duties only. The alderman suggested that everybody should be put on soldiers' pay.

Councillor Beach declared very pertinently, and with some heat, that men who went into a factory to evade service were bigger cowards than conscientious objectors.

Alderman T. A. Henn pointed out that the resolution cut right across the principle for which we are fighting—the liberty of personal conviction.

Friern Barnet, June 27. Decision affected one man, the junior accountancy assistant in the Treasurer's Department.

Dudley, July 16. Reversed June decision in favour of conscientious objectors, by a large majority. Strong views, pro and con, were expressed in the debate. Alderman Molyneux feared that the opposition to conscientious objectors was so much playing to the gallery, and served to hide the failure of others to assist the country.

All the hullabaloo was about one man who had carried out the law and everything else imposed upon him. He was in the Housing Department, some officials of which had said they did not like doing voluntary service in the A.R.P. so long as there was a conscientious objector on the staff. The man was prepared to do A.R.P. work and he was exempt by the Tribunal so long as he had carried on with that work.

Councillor Bennett said the recommendation was "tainted with Hitlerism" and was opposed to the law on the subject.

Caterham and Warlingham (Surrey), June 6. Three members of the Auxiliary Fire Service affected. Decision followed long debate on a letter signed by 39 members of the A.F.S.

Hull, July 4. Alderman Shepherd stated that it was nauseating for a serving man to know that a conscientious objector could sleep in a comfortable bed and receive a good wage and be free from injury at the end of hostilities.

The Alderman should be careful. He will find himself attacking statemen and financiers, and preaching the class war if he continues to find arguments like this against conscience.

Torquay, May 16. Councillor Narracott denounced "conchies" in these words :—

"We know how Hitler is working through his Fifth Column. I would not trust these men. The time has come for us to put our house in order."

Councillor F. March made an excellent attack on last war C.O. who is now a pro-war Councillor, etc. He stated that there was a lot of beating of the big drum. Local Tribunals were set up during the last war, at which thousands of men evaded national service.

He added : "I believe there are some members of this Council who appeared before Tribunals, and who evaded national service. Now they have the audacity to get up and speak like this."

Cambridgeshire, June 14. Councillor Mrs. Pease defended the position of objector teachers, and said she would rather run the risk of her children being corrupted by a conscientious objector or a Nazi or a Communist, than have them taught by people who were only too anxious to agree with the majority. The names of those who voted for civic liberty, against the majority, were Ald. Stubbs, Councillors Mrs. Carter, Hardman, Darlington, Matthews, Mrs. Parsons, Mrs. Pease, Mrs. Pirie, Mrs. Rackham.

Councillor D. R. Hardman said that he was ashamed of being a member of the Council. It was such things as the waste of petrol shown by the cars on Newmarket Heath on Derby Day they should condemn, not conscience.

Councillor Mrs. Rackham—answering Councillors Gordon Frost and Miles Burkitt—said it was a good thing for children to understand that they lived in a country which had the courage to grant exemption to conscientious objectors.

Horncastle, May 17. The Clerk of the Council said that he could say that for people who had brothers serving and had to work alongside conscientious objectors, it was a pretty sickening business.

Councillor T. H. Morris : "They all ought to be out against the wall; shoot the whole lot of them."

We would like to know what constitutional right the Clerk of a Council has for intervening in the Council's decision.

East Ham, June 11. Decision was reached following protests that Mr. J. A. Smith, L.D.S., R.C.S., of 109 Chapel Road, Forest Gate, aged 26, who was recently appointed as a dental surgeon at £500, had registered as an objector

Mr. Smith was appointed school dentist, and had to divide his time between the School Medical, Public Health, and Public Assistance Services. His duties covered Harts Sanatorium, Aldersbrook Children's Home, Maternity and Child Welfare Department, and schools. Smith was first appointed by the Council on a part-time basis on July 12, 1938. He was appointed to carry out the wider range of duties before he registered as a C.O.

Facts overlooked by those who forced the conscience issue in East Ham and secured Smith's dismissal were :—

(1) He had been employed in a similar capacity previously under another Council authority. Consequently his appointment was merely a transfer and not war-time appointment.

(2) Dental surgery is a reserved occupation. Had he not registered as a C.O. it would not have affected his appointment.

(3) He could have obtained a commission in the Army Dental Corps, where his financial prospects would have been equally as healthy as in his East Ham appointment. Thus he could have been engaged upon the same work if he joined the Forces without being subjected to the criticism of being a C.O.

Smith simply refused to shelter behind his work reservation.

These facts counted for nothing with the ignorant people who attacked him.

A letter was addressed to the Chairman of the East Ham Education Committee, and published in the Stratford Express for June 7. This was written by C. J. Biggs, of 139 Capel Road, and signed by him and by the following persons who styled themselves "Rent and Rate Payers of Capel Road": George Hope, George Copory, B. E. Smith, F. E. Maddox, G. Day, G. A. Etheridge

After complaining at Smith receiving £500 per year, the letter said :—

"While I, as a householder who will shortly be in the Army, leaving my wife and child with an allowance of 29s. per week, from which the rent and rates are to be paid, and as he draws his salary from the rates, I and the like of me will not only have to bear the burden but will also man the guns to protect such as he."

The Stratford Express for June 14 also published a letter from Arthur A. Neale, of 18 Leigh Road, East Ham, who described himself as Air-Raid Warden, late Royal Artillery. The essential passages from the amazing letter written by this man read as follows :—

"In my estimation, this disgusting appointment is a downright insult to the intelligence and public spirit of East Ham's ratepayers, and we cannot submit to this degredation lying down.

"After the marvellous show of British grit by our boys at Dunkirk, affairs like this are absolutely vile, and it is time the East Ham Council toed the line with most others and dispensed with the services of all their C.Os."

Burnley, June 3. Councillor Oakes said that the Council had no right to dismiss a man for going before a Tribunal. He might not be accepted as a C.O., or he might even change his mind, and prove himself a good soldier. Yet he would be dismissed.

Councillor H. Hudson said that it was no use electing representatives to Parliament to enact legislation and then to undermine that legislation as a local authority. They could not say they were upholding the law if they took away the right of an individual under the law. The Council was taking a page out of Hitler's book and denying freedom and a man's right to his conscience.

Councillor Cobb said :—

"A man who registers as a conscientious objector has no right to citizen status. A man who refuses to pick up a rifle in defence of his home, his womenfolk and his children, has not the status of a rat. A rat will turn round and fight when it is in a corner."

Councillor Massey said that a man who registered as a conscientious objector was not a coward. He might go before a Tribunal with a view to volunteering for non-combatant service. In this event he would be in just as much danger as a man carrying a rifle. He disagreed that anyone who stood up for his principles should be called a dirty rat. They could not tell him that anyone serving with the R.A.M.C., the Royal Naval Sick Berth Reserve or the Mercantile Marine was a coward.

Councillor Whatmough said he would not be a party to a heresy hunt for a man who had the courage to stand by his convictions. The enemies of the people of this country were to be found in high places and not in the ranks of conscientious objectors or among the working classes. They were in seats of power at the present time. The conscientious objector had been straight and they knew where he stood. It was the person hiding under the cloak of patriotism who was stabbing the country in the back at the present time. The Council would be wise to pay more attention to that aspect rather than persecute these other people.

Councillor Green said that if Councillor Whatmough moved among the weavers and knew the attitude of those who had to go and those who had objected to go, he might think differently. Why should some stay at home while others were doing their duty? Councillor Whatmough had a perverted view of the position.

To our mind, Councillor Green's statement of the weavers' position does not put them in a very good light. If they go to war only under compulsion, and not from principle, and then resent only the fact that others resist, their attitude is without worth and utterly contemptible. Councillor Green's argument was on a very low moral plane indeed.

A FASCIST CARDINAL

Cardinal Hinsley ranks with the Tory M.P. Fascists. He was an enemy of the Spanish workers in their struggle against Fascism, and to-day he is an opponent of the Conscientious Objector, and an ardent militarist and warmonger. If the Catholic Church had not upheld the Fascist and Nazi invasion of Spain, there would be no war in defence of civilization against the attack of Fascism and Nazism to-day. The Catholic Church has added to its crimes. The Spanish workers were defending world-peace, world progress and the advance of civilization.

The Universe, for May 17, 1940, announced that a delegation, consisting of Major-General Sir Walter Maxwell Scott and Fr. Alphonso de Zuleta on Wednesday, May 15, 1940, left for Spain with gifts for Cardinal Goma from the Catholics of England to aid the restoration of churches destroyed in the civil war.

Bishops throughout Britain collected sacred vessels and vestments, and the offerings include 70 complete sets of Mass vestments, 14 copes, 12 humeral veils, 27 albs, 77 stoles, six altar frontals, 90 chalices, patens and ciboria and a good collection of altar linen.

Two special gifts were carried by the delegation. One was a crucifix picked up by a Maltese sailor from a dump on the docks at Barcelona. The other was a 5-ft. tall 17th century crucifix of Spanish manufacture. It was a personal gift from Cardinal Hinsley to Cardinal Goma, Archbishop of Toledo and Primate of Spain.

In a statement to Spanish Fascist newspaper correspondents in London, Cardinal Hinsley said :

"We Catholics of England and Wales stood by our brethren in Spain throughout the fiery trials of 1936 and onwards, a trial inflicted on them by foreign agents, of violence and of falsehoods.

"Whatever we could do or say to support and assist the martyred land we did and said with our whole hearts. For Catholic hearts, which are truly Catholic, ever beat in unison and when one member of Christ's Mystical Body suffers all the members suffer in sympathy.

"The Bishops' Committee for Spanish Relief sent their ambulances to Spain to succour the sick and wounded. We sent also our assistance to the victims of the cruel war—the homeless, the hungry, the helpless women and children.

"We pray earnestly that Spain now as in centuries past may prove during the crucial dangers which face us, the great bulwark of Christian civilisation.

"The civil war swept away the ruinous ideas of a philosophy of life that never was Spanish but imported from Eastern barbarism. Eternal Spain, the Spain of Cardinal Ximenez, of St. John of the Cross, of St. Teresa of Avila and of countless saints and heroes has triumphed over the powers of evil. Arriba España!"

Every word in this statement breathes ignorance and falsehood. The Catholics of England and Wales in 1936 upheld the foreign invasion of Spain and the bombing of Madrid and Barcelona, the murder of innocent women and children, by the conscripts of Hitler and Mussolini. They helped to martyr Spain, with the Pope's blessing, and the Cardinals' unctious, hypocritical prayers for the triumph of Fascism in the name of God!

The Fascist-Catholics swept away no philosophy but racked, as in the days of the Inquisition, poor human bodies. The Fascists destroyed cities and employed Mohammedan Moors to murder Catholic Christians. The "Eternal Spain" of Hinsley's dream is a nightmare that must be swept away by twentieth-century thought in the interest of human sanitation.

Many Catholic C.O.'s have asked us for advice as to their legal status during this war-crisis. We have advised as wisely and as conscientiously as we could, for we believe in the right and power of individual conscience. When we consider the sacrifice this war is demanding from humanity, and when we consider how the martyrdom of Spain was but the prelude to this martyrdom of the world, it makes us angry to think that men and women possessing conscientious approaches can dare to remain Catholics. All this rubbish Cardinal Hinsley sent to Spain represented the power of Medieval darkness, and the curse of human thought. Cardinal Hinsley stands for ignorance, suffering, bodily illhealth, and mental enslavement. He is entitled to no honour nor respect. And he sponsored and aided the war of darkness on Spain when the Spanish cities were defending the Freedom of Europe.

To my Catholic C.O. comrades we say : Look around! See the war the Catholic Church has promoted. If you believe in conscience, and the power of the inward, spiritual life, leave that Church for ever. Let the Cardinals rot with the past. Let the dead bury its dead. And you, as men of conscience, declare war on the Church that has massacred and martyred; for power has allied itself with Nazism and Fascism. Leave Catholicism, Fascism, Nazism, and come into the open, allied to Commonweal and Freedom.

WILL HAYDEN'S EXEMPTION

Under the heading, "Mr. Will Hayden Before The Tribunal," the Islington Gazette for Tuesday, July 30 last, published the following report :

"'I refuse, directly or indirectly, to kill, mutilate, or starve my fellow man, his wife and children with whom I have no quarrel and whose interests are identical with mine,' stated Will Hayden, the well-known Islington pacifist, when he appeared before the London Tribunal for Conscientious Objectors.

"He was one of a number of cases who had refused to register in the prescribed manner.

"He stated that he was an employee of the Co-operative Movement, and that since 1926 he had been active in various peace movements including the League of Nations Union, the Independent Labour Party and the Peace Pledge Union, 'writing, speaking and organising on their behalf.'

In answer to a tribunal member's assertion that Britain was not fighting the German people but a terrible spiritual menace, Mr. Hayden said that in his view 'Hitlerism is not something peculiar to Germany. It is to be found all over the world. As I live in England I feel it my duty to oppose it here.'

TO APPEAL.

"Another tribunal member claimed that conscientious objectors were not tolerated in Germany.

"In reply, Mr. Hayden said that he understood there were several thousand objectors in Nazi concentration camps. 'In my opinion,' said Mr. Hayden, 'the stand made by the C.O.'s in the last war is largely responsible for my being privileged to stand here this morning.'

"The chairman (Judge Hargreaves) announced that the tribunal was satisfied as to Mr. Hayden's conscientious objection to war and were of the opinion that he deserved exemption from both combatant and non-combatant service conditional upon his taking up full-time A.R.P. or agriculture.

"Mr. Hayden signified his decision to appeal against the conditions of exemption."

Commenting upon the case, The Tribunal, August, says : "Hayden made a complete political case."

Hayden is a well-known writer to the North London Press and a frequent contributor to the columns of the Islington Gazette in defence of Socialism and Anti-Militarism.

IMPERIALISM IN THE ORIENT

BUDDHISM, FASCISM, AND WAR

By SIR W. W. STRICKLAND, Bt., B.A.

(Concluded from page 8)

Anticipating objection on this score, Baron Hayashi plunged boldly into the fray and defends National Socialism, Fascism; urges the Corporate State, with the end of liberty of thought and speeches; and rattles out apologies for this bastard Socialism of the Sabre. Here is Hayashi's vision of Nippon reformed and glorified and dominating the Orient:—

"It must be recognised that the present economic system has much contributed to the economic development of our country. If it is viewed, however, from the standpoint of the State totalism and the national defence, there remains a large room to be reformed and a need of re-adjustment. (1) The present system is developed on the basis of individualism and, consequently, is apt on the one side to abandon the economic activities to the private interests and individual caprices, which are not necessarily in accordance with the interests of the State and the peoples in general. (2) As a result of the unlimited free competition, it brings forth an exclusivism and the ideas of class antagonism. (3) It is to be regretted that the stability of the people's life is unattainable under it, as it produces an accumulation of the wealth in the hand of a few and incurs an impoverishment of the masses, the unemployment and the withering of the medium and small industrialists and agriculturists. (4) Owing to an insufficiency of the State power of control, the present system is inconvenient to make an unitary management to mobilise all the national capacities for the full exploitation of the national resources, the development of the industry and for lending impetus to the export trade. It also places an extreme limit on the State budget, making impossible the realisation of an indispensable improvement in the national defence."

This is indeed Socialism of the Sabre—an unique perfection unto and for death! Socialism of the Corporate State! Mahayana Militarism! The standard of living of the people must be improved, so that they might die gloriously.

Says Hayashi:—

"The maintainence and advancement of the people's standard of living in parallel with the completion of the national defence, which demands a large expenditure, is to be the first matter to be fully considered, asking at once a reorganisation of the economic system of the society.

"If a class antagonism is brought forth in conseqence of the fact that a minority of the nation monopolises all the economic interests and enjoys an unearned income in the face of the distress and misery the majority is suffering, it is the grave matter which cannot be overlooked easily from the standpoint of the State policy and the national defences. For the sake of wiping out its existence, it is demanded of all the people equally the abandonment of the self-seeking and individualistic economic ideas and the awakening to the totalistic-ones founded upon morality, thus making the people to march on to establish an economic system best fitted to the realisation of the ideals of the Empire."

And so we have the Corporate State. Peasants and fishermen are told that their distress and miseries are due to the conflict between the city and the village. The remedy is not socialism but totalitarianism. Thus:—

"In addition to the social political palliatives, there is a need of the radical remedies to bring about a readjustment of the economic system, which shall be founded upon a national totalism that means a common prosperity and an inter-dependence of the city and the village."

And then come further definitions of the totalitarian remedy:—

"The firm grasp by the people of the ideals of our national foundation and the missions of the Empire. The awakening to the grave responsibility of the Empire in the present situations to give the light of a resurrection to the world, in eradicating the universal pains brought forth by the erroneous conceptions of the Life and the State or by the false and mistaken philosophies, religions and arts, and the cultivation of a resolute will to fully execute that responsibility. The people should be penetrated thoroughly with the spirit of loyalty and patriotism and should live in a spirit to sacrifice oneself for the growth and development of the State. They should be unified in a spirit of the united front to stamp out all the ideas of internationalism, individualism and liberalism from the country. It must be pointed out here that all the Powers at present are fighting with the best skill of propaganda works to propagate the anti-State thoughts, to make other peoples conspire against their own States, to cause an alienation between the military and the public and to inspire a dislike of the international struggles and the defeatism, in the purpose of getting a final victory through a thought strategem.

"To establish a strong and firm State and moral idea which is unmovable in any way by the radical and disturbing thoughts which are rampant in and about the Empire. To cultivate a sublime spirit of self-sacrifice for the State and the totality and eradicate the radical ideas of internationalism, egoism and individualism which disregard the existence of the State, dislike the necessary controls of the State and act against the interests of the State."

In the eyes of Baron Hayaski, in the eyes of the Socialists of the Sabre, Buddha becomes the Corporate State glorified. Communism, Anarchism, Socialism, Pacifism, proletarian struggle, belong to the categories of individualism and unwholesome internationalism, opposed to the sanguinary glory of totalitarism or totalism.

The natural revolt in Britain against Christian cannibalism and superstitution, the truine god, the immaculate conception, and all the accumulated rubbish of Christian worship, has produced many admirers of the Oriental mood of life, its civilization, cultures, and faith. As this essay shows, their admiration is founded upon pure inventions. For one thing, contrary to Kipling's reasonings, East and West have met and the West, unfortunately, has conquered. The Orient is no more. It has added its superstitions to those of the West but it has surrendered its pacific wisdom to the martial ignorance of the West. Buddhism has gone down before Christian Militarism and Capitalist Utilitarianism. Buddhism has proved itself to be no guaranty against the cruelty, inhumanity, and brutality of the ruling-class.

I have made a life-study of Buddhism and am friendly to Buddhism. I was reared in the Christian faith and have rejected its absurdities and obscenities. My word may be taken as that of one who would not write down Buddhism willingly. And I am compelled to admit that Buddhism in power has behaved with all the licence of the marauding Christian crusader. Jenghis-Khan and his Mongolian horsemen of the thirteenth century were Buddhists. One need not enlarge on their crimes. Tibet and Mongolia are Buddhist countries and endure the most abominable and terrible exploitation. Even Mussolini and Hitler could not excel the Buddhist criminals of power who rule these lands.

The political and military systems of Japan are not based on Buddhism but shielded by the philosophy, and even the superstition, of Buddhism. It has been argued that Buddhism leads to Socialism as some urged that Christianity leads to Socialism. Buddhism has been welcomed by the ruling class only in so far as it does not lead to Socialism and does not quarrel with existing social conditions. In practice, Buddhism has proven itself the healthiest religion in the world—for the ruling class. It teaches resignation to Karma and preaches an unreal individual deliverance, which, for all practical usage, comes very near to the impotence of the Christian's heaven. Of course, the defenders of Buddhism declare that the famous and immortal Emperor Asoka is the typical Buddhist ruler. By contrasting Asoka against Charlemagne and Napoleon, the case for Buddhist philosophy is established. The citation of Asoka, as the typical Buddhist ruler, is paralleled by citing Marcus Aurelius as the typical Roman Emperor. Even a schoolboy realises how absurd that would be. The glory of Napoleon fades into a mean nothingness before the greatness of Asoka, and the Corsican Conqueror of the French is seen at his true level, rightly portrayed as a gangster robed with Imperial splendour. What the Buddhist apologists forget is that there must have been hundreds of Buddhist Emperors or Kings, who flourished some before, and others after Asoka, whose conduct as rulers would make the ex-Kaiser seem a magnificent ruler of genius, and the executed Tsar, a saint of democracy, by comparison and contrast. If we collect the records of the Buddhist Emperors, and so arrive by a process of induction at our conclusion, we shall find it demonstrated amply that Buddhism in power knows no Socialism except the Socailism of the Sabre: the Socialism of the National or Corporate State, and not the Socialism of the proletarian struggle. Buddhism in Japan has favoured the growth of Fascism.

There is a sound historical reason why Japanese Fascism allies itself to Mussolini and Hitler, especially Hitler. There are geographical, economic, and political reasons also, but these merge into the historical. The Japanese State, as we know it, was constituted after the Bismarckian system of Prussia, which made supreme the power of military and the executive bureaucracy over the pretended voice and decisions of parliament. The shambles of 1914, and the military failure in Siberia, threatened to restore the power of parliament and democracy. The military organised the Manchurian incident and utilised it to its full extent, to recover their waning influence. Under the guise of "Mahayana National Defence," the armed forces of Japan were expanded, the supremacy of the military caste established, and friendliness towards Hitler expressed. As to the people at large, the great mass of the workers and peasants, they found themselves in a state of incessant uneasiness as to their security of living. Their movement of protest had been reduced to a low ebb. As in the Occident, so also in the Orient, Socialism had been reduced to impotence. Buddhism did nothing to revive the consciousness of the people because that would have been contrary to the law of Karma.

Buddhism teaches the peasant or the worker that he can never avoid or obviate the realisation of his Karma, unless he accepts Buddhism, recognises the Four Truths revealed by it, and lives up to the Eight Right Paths advocated to earn Nirvana, the position undisturbed by Karma. Buddhism asserts that Brahminism recognised Karma until Buddha came and showed the means of deliverance from Karma once for all, Nirvana. The peasant or worker must not negate Karma, must not objectively battle against his fate. He must accept Karma objectively and rise above it, subjectively. Let Karma remain Karma and let militarism take its toll of humanity, but let the worker within himself, and within himself only, rise above Karma. Thus Buddhism reconciles itself to Fascism, poverty, world war, national insecurities that breed war as they are bred by war, and Empire building on the basis of poverty and exploitation.

There is no hope for people unless there is some idea of change. Buddhism is changeless. In Buddhism there is no change, no knowledge, no call to scientific research: no idea of evolution, no Mendellian theory, no Copernician theory, not even the Newtonian theory of Gravitation. Buddhism may be and is serene. It is a wisdom of conduct in times of crisis and despair. But Buddhism is as powerless and worthless in the realm of science, as much at war with the spirit of research that is science, as Christianty is. Guatama and the Mahayana Buddhists moralised deductively and knew nothing of the inductive method, which is the fundamental method of modern experimental science.

Someone has said that Buddhism anticipated the atomic theory; but Buddhism conceived of atoms speculatively and metaphysically by the dialetic method. Buddhism may have a moral wisdom, but it cannot pretend to a scientific method or approach.

The true strength of Buddhism is to be found in its cardinal superstition, the doctrine of transmigration by Karma, the doctrine conceived by Brahminism, long before the appearance of Gautama, and inherited and developed by the Buddhists. The doctrine of Karma teaches the immortality of the soul and its incessant transmigration. The present lot of the peasant is due to his behaviour in his previous life, and his future lot depends upon his conduct in his present life. The incessant and invisible circulation of Karma will have the peasant or worker reborn finally a king. This superstition of fatal individualistic optimism does not make for democracy or Socialism or economic revolt. It induces subserviency of minds, resignation to oppression, obedience to every demand of the State, and, finally, the mind that upholds Fascism, War, and Oppression. Buddhism is no whit superior to Christianity. The establishment of a commonweal, the democratic happiness of the people of the world, requires the spread of Atheistic understanding and the abandonment of all superstition. Human character can be developed and social happiness can be salvaged only by and through the spread of knowledge and rational understanding.

AMBULANCE AND A.R.P.

On May 9, conscientious objectors were banned from the air raid wardens' service in the Pontefract area. J. B. Coltam, chief warden, was cheered by South Kirby wardens, when he announced :—

"I have definitely stated that no conscientious objectors will be allowed to join the wardens' service in this area, where a large percentage of the personnel are ex-Servicemen.

"Such recruits would be an insult to the service and tend to make the wardens' badge looked upon as a substitute for a white feather."

Friday, May 17, Amersham A.R.P. personnel threatened resignation if a registered conscientious objector was allowed to join their ranks. The man concerned was Michael H. Middleton, of the Meadows, Stanley-hill, Amersham, who is a scenery designer at Buckinghamshire's only theatre, the Playhouse, Amersham. He was registered on condition that he joined the A.R.P. services.

Voluntary first-aid workers in Hoole objected to having a conscientious objector thrust upon them by the decree of the C.O. Tribunal. The matter has been taken up with the A.R.P. Committee of the Urban District Council. This was revealed at the Council's meeting on Monday, May 20, at which Councillor Ward Jones, the vice-chairman, presided.

Frampton Cotterell residents do not believe in the employment on war services of conscientious objectors.

On June 17, a specially convened parish meeting passed a resolution which the clerk was instructed to send to Sodbury Rural Council, requesting that all conscientious objectors resident in Frampton Cotterell or in any other of the 26 parishes in the Sodbury rural area be prohibited from holding any paid or unpaid office in connection with A.R.P. work, or any other position of a national character connected with war work which may be under the control of the council. It was added that, if any conscientious objectors at the present time hold any such position, it is requested that they shall be dismissed immediately. The meeting was very largely attended.

London Conscientious Objectors' Appeal Tribunal was told on Thursday, June 20, that an objector could not join the St. John Ambulance Brigade, because the Brigade in his district of Huddersfield had banned C.O.'s.

In our next issue we shall give accounts of pacifists and "conchies" who have been killed or wounded while on duty at first-aid posts. Their cry has been : "Tend others first."

WALTER STRICKLAND'S WANDERINGS

HIS DEFENCE OF THE UNDERDOG—IN EUROPE AND THE EAST

[The following article from our pen appeared in The Malton Messenger, for July 1, 8, and 15, 1939. We have preserved the cross-captions that appeared in our contemporary.—ED.]

Walter Strickland seems to have left Cambridge some time before 1888. Between 1888 and 1889 he wrote a number of poems at Richmond, York and at Redcar, "amid all the beauties of the Cleveland and Middlesbrough district." Outstanding among these poems was a bitter attack on an "English Hanging Judge," noted for his religious orthodoxy, who sentenced a youth of seventeen to death for murder, and read him a lecture whilst passing sentence. Although roused to bitter opposition by the sentence, Strickland knew this to be according to law, and denounced the judge, not for pronouncing the sentence, but for prolonging the agony of its passing by dressing its pronouncement with a great deal of sentimental moralising. Strickland accused the judge of rejoicing in sadism and declared that persons who punished others were often in the same criminal category as the persons they punished.

This sentence turned Strickland's thoughts to the question of capital punishment, of which he became a bitter enemy. Two years later, at Milan, at a time when he had decided to reside permanently in Italy, he wrote in E. Anglian dialect a vigorous pamphlet "Down with the Hangman." The pamphlet pretended to be an interesting interview with the public hangman, and was indeed a powerful attack upon the hangman and on the sensational Press. To show his opposition to the Judge who had passed the sentence, Strickland took as the motto of the essay the quotation "They that are in honour have no understanding, but are like unto the beasts that perish." This pamphlet was published five years later and largely popularised throughout the country by Robert Forder, the famous Freethought publisher, who had his publishing premises at Stonecutter Street, London.

This fact is interesting as tending to show that before leaving England, after his Cambridge days, Sir Walter Strickland was intimate with the leading figures in the Freethought movement. He had come under the influence of Charles Bradlaugh and was closely associated with many of the leading personalities of the Radical and Freethought movement that was then stirring London and the provinces. Darwin's thought exercised a great influence over him from this time on and he seems to have adopted as his motto the statement of the famous pioneer of evolution, "There was a time when I believed man to be a being destined to high aims and high purposes; now I should be sorry to think there was in man anything but the mere breath of his body."

THE STRUGGLE FOR FREEDOM.

There is a suggestion of pessimism in this motto, but it would not be safe to conclude that Strickland's attitude towards life became cynical. On the contrary he developed everywhere a lively interest in the struggle for freedom and the emancipation of the human understanding. For a short time his mind reverted repeatedly to this subject of capital punishment and he wrote studies at various places throughout Europe, in criminal psychology. The keynote of his reflections in this matter is to be found in the quotation that he made from "The Owlet," showing that the difference between sentence and acquittal is often one of luck and not of criminal intention.

ACQUITTED:

"Sharp flew my dagger winged with hate,
Straight to his heart—the eye-glassed toff.
A pack of cards there turned the point,
So I'm let off."

CONDEMNED:

"My knife struck murder, friend, but Fate
Smiled more perverse—here, take this ring;
Mine was too 'pi' to carry cards,
So I'm to swing."

Strickland visited Italy in 1889, but returned to London the following year. Before returning to England he seems to have visited Bohemia and to have developed a respect for the Czechs which he retained throughout his life. On his return home he was asked by one of his uncles whether the Czechs were not Hungarians. This caused him to protest against what he considered to be an expression of English ignorance, namely that whatever was not German in Austria must of necessity be Hun. He pointed out that Hungary was hedged in by a ringed fence of Slav nationalties; and that all these Slav races, with their great prolificness had infiltrated into Hungary and modified profoundly the Hungarian race. This visit probably decided the great folklore translations to which he afterwards devoted a large portion of his life. Immediately he spent some time at Hampstead, where he wrote a number of poems, and published with them some other poems he had written at Spalding in 1886 and 1887. These poems were very slight and poked fun at the English sentimental style of verse.

THE MILAN STRIKE OF 1898.

Strickland resided in Italy from 1890 to 1900. By this is meant that he made Italy his residence and centre, travelling from there through all parts of Europe, but always returning to Italy. He spent considerable time in Switzerland, Austria, Bavaria and the Slav countries, studying the Slav languages and dialects and slowly translating Erben's collection of Panslavonic Folk Stories.

Strickland was fourteen years old when Karel J. Erben first published his Panslavonic Reading Book at Prague. Thirty years later Strickland began its study and publication in English, comparing it with Bernoni's collection of Venetian Fairy Stories and also with the Fairy Stories and Folklore of Lapland. These studies represent a marvellous work of scholarship and they are only made possible by the extent of European travelling into which Strickland plunged after his Cambridge days. It must not be supposed, however, that he was merely concerned with scholarship.

During his residence in Italy, Strickland was never actually molested by "Italy's not admirable carabineri," as he termed the Italian Police. But he was advised politely to leave the country following upon the Milan strike of 1898. The massacre of Milan occurred on May 7, 1898, when the troops were called out and murdered a number of strikers, incidentally murdering a number of very young boys. This roused Strickland to fury and he wrote and widely circulated, in Italian and in English, both in Italy and in England, a poem entitled "On the massacre of Milano." In this poem he gives a vivid description of calm returning to the city after the strike, all human protests stifled, the only noise being that of owls, as he says in the night: "Hooting loud in delight at the odour of blood."

He describes the condition of the city after it has been made to quake by the canon's roar:

"Here, splintered with shrapnel, a pile of street boys Piled up in rags—like their own broken toys."

MOCK TRIBUNALS LEGAL

Important Glasgow Decision—Defence Regulations Case

On Wednesday, July 31, Frank Leech, James Kennedy, Frank Dorans, and Edward Shaw were arrested, under Sheriff's warrant, and charged with contravening E.P.A. Defence Regulations No. 39 A (1) b and 90 (1) a.

Leech was charged that, between June 8 and July20, in premises occupied by the Anarchist Federation at 127 George Street, Glasgow, he publicly displayed in a window facing the street an advertisement in the following terms :—

"Conscientious objectors and those about to register, meet here every Wednesday at 8 p.m. Call for free advice any time. Assert your right to freedom."

The charge alleged that this was an invitation and incitement to persons who had become, or might become, liable under the National Services Armed Forces Act, 1939, to be called up for service to attend a meeting in the premises, where advice and guidance were given concerning methods of procuring exemption from combatant military service. This, the charge continued, Leech did preparatory to an endeavour being made at these meetings by the three other accused and others unknown to incite persons attending the meetings to evade the duties and liabilities which they might become liable to perform or discharge by virtue of said Act, contrary to the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939.

The charge against Shaw, Kennedy, and Dorans was that on various occasions between the dates mentioned, and at the meetings referred to, which were attended by persons liable, or who might become liable, to be called up for service, they did mock Conscientious Objectors' Tribunals, and by advice and guidance concerning procedure at official Conscientious Objectors' Tribunals and the most effective methods for procuring exemption thereat, endeavour to incite those persons to evade any duties or liabilities they were or might become, liable to discharge.

The case was called in the Sheriff Summary Court, at 11 a.m., the following morning, Thursday, August 1. Trial was fixed for Thursday, September 4.

Sheriff Robertson presided and asked if the accused were represented legally.

Mr. John M'Sparran, a Glasgow solicitor, explained that he was deputising for the agent for the poor, and should have been representing the accused, but, he remarked amid some laughter, "I have a conscientious objection to representing them."

We cannot understand how any question of being represented by the poor agent arose. Defence, in political trials, ought not to be left to the uncertain aptitude and ability of agents for the poor. One of the defendants was quite able to employ legal defence, if required. In any case, whether one agreed with the conduct of the defendants or not, where folk are accused of political offences and cannot afford lawyers, the movement should supply legal defence. When possible, political accused should defend themselves.

The result of the trial made Mr. M'Sparran's remarks more tricky than wise. He ought to have had no conscientious objection to defending, in such a case. Solicitors are not called upon to agree with their clients. Agents for the poor are appointed—to defend the poor when accused. Mr. M'Sparran's remarks were an offence against the ethics and etiquette of his profession.

After appearing before the Sheriff, the defendants were released without bail. Subsequently, by notice served upon them, the prosecution advanced the hearing to Tuesday, August 20.

Evidence was given by two police officers, describing their visits, in plain clothes, to the mock tribunals held in the back-shop at 127 George Street. This was a small shop, outside which was a sign, "Anarchist Federation."

Constable John McHardy described how he was instructed on June 8 to take certain observations of the premises occupied by the Anarchist Federation. He observed that the persons who entered were men, most of whom were of military age—between 20 and 35 years of age.

On June 19, in plain-clothes, he entered the premises, and went into a rear or inner room. A man Duff was speaking. There were about 12 to 15 working class people in the room, three-quarters of them of military age.

James Kennedy was chairman and the man Duff related his experiences as a conscientious objector in the last war.

Questions were asked and then an announcement was made that there would be meetings for C.O's every Wednesday evening.

Kennedy said there would be a mock tribunal the following Wednesday.

Witness attended the mock tribunal and described what happened.

Duff gave an invitation to members of the audience to come forward for a mock trial.. A man then took a chair at a table at which Edward Shaw, Kennedy, and Duff were sitting. A mock trial was held then after the fashion of a Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal.

Duff asked the man in the chair various questions, such as would he take shelter in an air raid, would he assist any person wounded in an air raid, would he assist a soldier in uniform if he was wounded.

Questions were then put by Kennedy and Shaw. The man in the chair was then told whether the reasons he had given for objecting to military service would be accepted by the tribunal.

After that another young man, who said he was a printer's labourer, came forward. His objections were on political grounds.

"He was told that he was too cheeky and that he had to respect the tribunal, otherwise his case would fail," said the policeman.

Witness was cross-examined by each of the four accused. He admitted that the meetings were open to the public.

SHERIFF WELLWOOD JOHNSTON: Did you see anything in the nature of people who were not conscientious objectors being urged to pretend to be conscientious objectors?

WITNESS :-No.

SHERIFF : Did you notice any sort of attempt to advise people to profess opinions, which they did not really hold, in order to evade service?

WITNESS : No.

Constable M'Hardy said he made another visit to the premises the following week. Kennedy was in the chair and Dorans was also there. They asked for people to come forward as conscientious objectors.

A man of about 28 years of age, who gave his name as James M'Fadyen and said he was a coach painter, stepped up and said he objected on humanitarian grounds.

Kennedy and Dorans questioned him and the man was advised what to say in reply to certain questions.

Sheriff Wellwood Johnston put the same question, as to incitement, to the other police-officer, and received substantially the same reply.

The trial was adjourned till Thursday, August 22.

The first witness at the resumed hearing was Alexander M'Donald. He stated that he was brought into contact with the Anarchist Federation at the outbreak of the war.

Answering the Assistant Procurator-Fiscal (Mr. Robert M'Donald), witness said that to his knowledge the object of the Anarchist Federation was to give young men who had registered as conscientious objectors advice as to their legal status. The organisation had no political significance.

The Fiscal.—Were they in favour of the prosecution of the war, or were they against it?—They were against the prosecution of the war.

Witness added that if young men affected by the war made an appearance in the premises mock tribunals wereheld to give them advice. His business in the premises was connected with the sale of literature.

Witness said that on an average three or four persons attended the mock tribunals. There may have been more young men in the place, but they did not go forward.

The Fiscal.—If there were 20 persons in the place and none went forward, did the mock tribunal still go on?—On one occasion it did.

Who took the part of the conscientious objector?—I think it was Kennedy.

Witness added that some young men came forward on moral grounds, but as they were not capable of giving moral reasons they were instructed accordingly.

When asked what was the attitude of the "tribunal" to political reasons, he replied that unless a person was capable of putting forward political grounds in a good way he had no chance of exemption.

Leech cross-examined this witness, and asked questions about a gramophone record, taken away by the police when they raided the premises. Leech asked the witness if he knew what was on the record.

"Workers' songs, including 'The Internationale," replied M'Donald. "The police made me play it and danced up and down the shop."

Evidence for the defence was given by two men, one of whom was described as a free-lance journalist. The latter witness said that on one occasion he attended a mock tribunal in the premises of the Anarchist Federation, and afterwards he wrote two articles on the "tribunal" which appeared in the press.

In reply to a question by Leech, witness said that he did not hear anyone at the mock tribunal urging young men not to join His Majesty's Forces.

None of the four accused went into the witness- box. The Sheriff advised them that it was not necessary and that it was unwise sometimes for defendants to do so.

The Assistant Procurator-Fiscal summed up for the prosecution, and argued that the defendants were moved by an oblique political motive. They did not advise or counsel individually any who might seek advice but convened public meetings, which was not actually advising at all, within the meaning of the Act.

Sheriff Wellwood Johnston intimated that he did not propose to hear the four accused.

Finding the accused not guilty, he gave a most important ruling, which ought to be reproduced verbatim in the Labour press of the country, as an important statement of the right of civic liberty during the present period of menanced freedom.

The Sheriff stated :—

"In order to succeed in this case, the Crown must establish that an endeavour was made to incite persons to evade their duties or liabilities under the National Service (Armed Forces) Act.

"According to the dictionary, to 'incite" means 'to rouse or stir up, to move to action, to spur or urge on.' It is not easy, or perhaps it is not possible, to imagine incitement without some sort of direct exhortation, and in the present case direct exhortation to evade duties was not only not proved but disproved."

However this prosecution arose, it has served a most useful purpose. Sheriff Wellwood Johnston commands respect for the patient and careful way in which he presided over the hearing, and for the manner in which he directed himself. His decision betrays a regard for the first principles of jurisprudence, that is an example to judges and statesmen in times of crisis. It is easy to be a judge but not so simple to be a jurist. Yet when the bench does not respect jurisprudence, corruption is beginning to condemn virtue to the scaffold. We thank Sheriff Wellwood Johnston for his decison and his example.

The police officers ought to be commended for speaking the simple truth in answer to questions. It is clear that they carried out their duties, whatever one may think of such duties, with courtesy and understanding. In the Court, they assisted justice by not manufacturing evidence. They spoke directly to what they heard and observed and attached no trimmings. Truth is a social asset as well as an individual virtue. It is pleasant to record a trial where no false witness is borne.

We sympathise with the Assistant Procurator-

Fiscal. The case should never have been brought. We cannot understand how he examined his evidence before going into Court. He had honest witnesses, yet failed to understand their evidence, and to sense its import. He attempted a dangerous limitation of what liberties are left to us. He might have succeeded but for the clear legal analysis of the Sheriff.

It is to be hoped thatsuch a case will not again disturb the Courts in Scotland. The result is good however: mock tribunals have been declared legal.

CHISWICK COUNCILLOR'S PROTEST

Councillor W. E. Davies, of the Chiswick Town Council, writing from Mortimer, near Reading, on Friday, July 5, to the Town Clerk, protested against the Council's decision to give conscientious objector employees leave of absence without pay. He had been absent from the meetings owing to ill-health, and threatened to resign entirely, as a protest.

Essential passages in his letter read :—

"I have heard with considerable regret of the decision taken by the Borough Council last week in regard to conscientious objectors.

"I have never met any members of the Corporation staff with convictions of this kind, but it would appear that the practical effect of the Council's decision is as follows :—

"(1) To punish two existing objectors by taking away their livelihood before they have the slightest chance of commencing the alternative work ordered by their tribunals (in one of the cases the tribunal actually seems to have desired the man to stay where he was).

"(2) That coercion is being used towards future age groups by letting the staff know that immediately any of them exercise their plain legal right to register as conscientious objectors their position with the Council is forfeit for the duration of the war. Any such men would probably be family men and the purpose is obvious, and I do not know if the Council realises that, even if an employee happens to be medically unfit for service but yet ventures to register his honest views, he is to be penalised forthwith for such honesty.

"I am sorry I cannot remain a member of an authority behaving in what to me is an utterly mean and cowardly manner. Every decent instinct seems thereby to be outraged, to say nothing of the violence done to one's most elementary obligations as a Christian disciple. It is certain that our Corporation can only impede the cause of liberty and freedom by wilfully flouting legislation which seeks to pay proper regard thereto.

"Reluctantly, therefore, I submit my resignation to the Council and propose to post a copy of this letter to the local Press in explanation to my friends in the borough. That the Council's decision should be that of civilians, who are themselves for the most part unaffected by military demands, renders the same the more inexplicable. . . .

"I had hoped to keep on with my Council work in spite of all difficulties, but there are some things in which even involuntary acquiescence is a betrayal of principle, and with a final expression of my sincere appreciation of many courtesies shown to me by electors, colleagues, and Council officers alike, I have now, sadly, to make the break.

"Yours very truly,
(Signed) "WALTER E. DAVIES."

The letter was read at the Council Meeting and accepted without comment.

TROTSKY'S MURDER

The Daily Mirror, for Friday, August 24, 1940, devoted its editorial to the assasination of Trotsky. Our contemporary wrote :—

"All revolutions devour their own children. None has ever shown such a fierce appetite in that cannibalistic form of fodder as the Russian revolution, of which the murdered Trotsky was one of the chief organisers.

"This needs saying, since the Stalinites, who call themselves Communists to-day, have long received and obeyed their orders to deny or defame the early services of Leon Trotsky to the 'cause.'

"Glance at one or two of the Stalinite 'histories' of post-war Russia. You will find hardly a mention of Trotsky!

'The organiser of the Red Armies, the Carnot of the Russian uprising, the negotiator of the peace with a then triumphant Germany, the international Communist, for whom Russian nationalism was nothing compared with the true gospel of "workers of the world unite," simply doesn't exist in these lying tracts, of which the aim is to prove against all evidence that "Trotsky and Co."—their cant phrase—represented a plot against the immense, the pure, the devoted, the eternal, the immortal, the infallible, god-like Joseph Stalin. Against whom Lenin has warned his Party! Too late . . .

"No one who reads Trotsky's "History of the Russian Revolution" or his "Revolution Betrayed," no one who searches the facts of his achievement, can deny his great ability.

"His arrogance, however, led him to make one irreparable mistake. He under-estimated, he despised, his adversaries.

"While he laboured, Stalin plotted; edged his own men in; played for position; struck when the time came; then waited patiently (as his way is), stalking his rival, for years; has not at last "got" him.

"A noble story! Full of idealism, is it not?

"And to-day, as Trotsky is dead, you will read in the Stalinite Press either the usual foul abuse of "Trotsky and Co.," or else the denial that Trotsky ever existed.

"For these mean and credulous rats will deny or assert anything, as we saw when this war began with their approval; and was then denounced by them with the approval of Almighty Joe.

"W.M."

OUR LETTER-BOX

'This will be a feature of our next issue. A large number of readers have written, from all over the country, expressing strong disapproval of our attack on Tory M.P.s who approved Fascism. A few have expressed approval. The critics' letters will be published next month. Send along your opinion.

Below we publish one letter as typical of the adverse criticism received :—

Dear Comrade Aldred,—With regard to the August issue, I am very pleased with your article on the real "Fifth Column." Whilst the material in it is very good I feel that the dogmatic attitude conveyed in it is somewhat out of place. For instance your headline, "Tory M.P.s Who Must Resign" seems a little naive.

We all appreciate that the world might be a little better for the workers if such individuals, out of the goodness of their heart, were to vacate their offices but do you think such an event is at all likely. Bearing in mind our experience in Spain is it not more likely that such gentlemen would ignore even a widespread public demand for their removal. The facts even show that they have gone as far as to overturn "democratic" assemblies by force when they appear to threaten their interests.

Again you put "Criminal Anti-Socialism Exposed." Somehow this headline savours too much of American Yellow Journalism and the gutterpress to me.

I realise and sympathise with the thoughts which probably prompted you to use this phrase. To some extent I share them myself but I feel it is wrong for us left wingers to lower our propaganda to the level of the Daily Mirror, etc. I feel you would have done better to stress their double-dealing and hypocrisy in this phrase rather than to use such a smug, pharisaic phrase which after all is not likely to awaken a tide of moral indignation among the general public. On the contrary, many of them are not so enamoured of our cause as to stigmatise anti-socialism as a crime. Something more on the lines of "Hypocrisy of So-Called Anti-Fascists" would have been better.

I seem to be always criticising your efforts but I am sure you will appreciate the friendly spirit in which it is done. After all an ounce of constructive criticism is worth a pound of insincere flattery.

Wishing you all success and continued vigour in your campaign against militarism.

Yours fraternally,
J. D. THOMAS,
Hon Secy., New Malden N.C.L.

HOW TO HELP

You like this paper. You like our various pamphlet publications. We need your help to continue the paper and to improve it. You want to help but you do not know how to help. Let us explain.

Thousands of men and women have left the churches in despair. Thousands find themselves outside all political parties and groups. They are cynical or in despair. They do not know of the Bakunin Press or the Strickland Press publications. They know nothing about the United Socialist Movement. They have never seen this journal. Many of them would become subscribers if only the fact of its existence was brought to their notice. Why not let them know?

We are unable to reach the disillusioned ones through the ordinary channels of commercial advertising. We must rely on the willingness to help expressed by friends and comrades. You may show your willingness in many ways :—

(1) By taking an extra copy of the paper and sending or giving it to some interested friend or acquaintance.
(2) By sending us the address of an acquaintance, and paying for a copy to be sent to him.
(3) By sending us the address of every enlightened man and woman in your district; local Councillors who have spoken wisely; any local person; where possible, sending us a local news-cutting, with report.
(4) By lending your own copy to a friend, after you have read it.
(5) By leaving a copy in a train, tram, or 'bus.
(6) By taking a dozen or more copies at trade rates and selling them at meetings.

It seems monstrous that after so many years of Socialist, Freethought, Anti-Militarist, and Anti-Parliamentarian struggle, our publishing and educational work should not even be in an aggressive financial position. The paper and the pamphlets uphold and define a cause that is worthy of all that each and every comrade can do to speed its triumph.

House of Commons Debate Reveal a Public Scandal That Demands Immediate Remedy

Mr. Robertson speaking:—

The railway companies have told the Y.M.C.A., the Salvation Army and the Church Army that they should buy their tobacco, chocolates and cigarettes from the retail establishments in those stations. The voluntary bodies are trying to sell the troops something at cost price, but are compelled to buy from the retail organisations at the full retail price less five per cent. That shows, I believe, very clearly, that these welfare organisations are trying to do a job without any profit at all. They are trying only to do good, and it is distressing that this atmosphere of deliberate frustration—and of deliberate interest, if you like—is stopping the movement.

I am reluctant to say these things to the House—[Hon. Members: "Go on"]—but I would be still more reluctant to think that thousands of the most honoured passengers that the railway companies ever carried were subject to this treatment each day and each night. I know that it is not the wish of this House or of the people outside that hours of misery and discomfort should be brought upon these gallant soldiers, and I do charge the Director of Welfare, and those responsible for his work, with neglect. I hope that he stands the court-martial that soldiers who neglect their duty should stand in war-time, and he should pay the penalty. I charge the directors of the railway companies and their managers with neglect and with a great want of sympathy, and I hope that this House will send out a message to-night that will bring this state of affairs to an end.

Mr. H. W. Butcher (Holland-with-Boston)—I do not know who is to reply on behalf of the Government, but I feel that it is to the Minister of Transport that we are entitled to look for some speedy redress of the conditions existing at the present time. The railway companies are operating under the direction of the Railway Executive Committee, which is under my right hon. Friend. We must bear in mind that these companies have prided themselves, and have spent large sums of money during these months of war upon boasting and placarding in order to say, how they are serving the people. We have heard to-day how the railway companies are serving the soldiers. We remember that, in the months just before the war, these railway companies came squealing for a "square deal." Is there to be a square deal for the railway companies and their shareholders, but a dirty and raw deal for the serving man?

The statement made by my hon. Friend is one which I am sure the House will welcome. We are entitled to insist, through either my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the War Office or the Minister of Transport, that the companies shall be made to realise that they are public servants and that they have great privileges. During this time of war they have been guaranteed a return on their capital. They have had the advantage of protection which very few other organisations have, and it is their duty to put their house in order. I am bound to say that control of the railway companies is one of the matters that my right hon. Friend should take in hand at once. I see that two of these stations are Euston and St. Pancras, the property of the London Midland and Scottish Railway, the president of which line is Lord Stamp. He is able, in addition to fulfilling his duties in that capacity, to act as part-time Economic Adviser to the Government; I feel that it would be more desirable if, before he took on additional duties, he made quite sure that the ordinary soldier who travels on his line was treated with the same consideration as the fare-paying passenger.

In regard to animals, the railway companies are under a statutory obligation to observe certain conditions, and are liable for prosecution if they do not do so. Why is not the same consideration extended to the serving men? The statement of my hon. Friend about the way in which the companies seek, in a time of national emergency, to extract from voluntary organisations very heavy rents in London, when property is very difficult to let, and especially from voluntary organisations which administer comfort and help to the fighting men, is a revelation to this House and a disgrace to the country. I hope that before the House adjourns to-night we shall receive definite assurances that these things will be put right within the next 48 hours.

8.9 p.m.

Sir Joseph Nall (Manchester, Hulme)—My hon. Friend the Member for Streatham has rendered a real public service to-night. Many of us know that he has been struggling for weeks past with various Departments and people concerned to get this matter redressed. I heard reactions of it and really believed that something was being done. The House will appreciate from what my hon. Friend has said, that nothing serious in the way of a determined effort has been made. Responsibility for this state of affairs rests in several different quarters. First of all the War Office, with a great flourish of trumpets, set up this welfare organisation to which attention has been drawn. A one-time Member of this House, now gone to another place, preened himself on what was being done, but that Department is entirely futile. It has never done anything about this matter. I am not blaming the present Financial Secretary to the War Office—he has only just taken over his duties—but I would challenge his Department to say that any officer or person on the welfare staff of the War Office has ever been to any of these stations to see what is going on. I do not believe that any of them know anything about it or have taken the slightest trouble to make any inquiry about it.

This applies not only in London but all over the country. It is the same in Manchester, and I have no doubt it is the same elsewhere. There is complete lack of interest, and of co-ordination between the local authorities, the Ministry of Transport and the railway companies concerned. When voluntary organisations are willing to come along and do something to fill the gap, it is scandalous to demand rent and obstruct their efforts in this way. It should not be necessary for voluntary organisations to have to fill the gap in this way. Four main line railway companies have refreshment departments. They can do something. They cannot provide bivouacs for everybody who wants to stay the night in the station, but the refreshment departments of the railways seem to take no interest in these exceptional tasks which are thrust upon them.

One must be fair to the railway companies. They do cater for the carrying of these men quite reasonably. In certain cases special trains are run. Night trains are available, but the military authorities in sending men on leave seem to take no notice whatever of train connections. The men are not given proper instructions about train connections. They are thrown into Liverpool Street or King's Cross at two o'clock in the morning, after all the night trains have gone. If they are to be sent on an overnight journey they should be despatched from the starting station at a time to enable them to catch the eleven o'clock or midnight trains,, and not sent to a Southern camp or training depot just too late to catch the night train and too early to catch the morning train Nothing appears to have been done. The various training centres could give instructions as to how or when to catch trains.

The Ministry of Transport takes no interest in the matter. It may be said that it is not their job. It may be completely outside the scope of that Department, but at least it is within the scope of the railway companies and organisation to do something with their own refreshment rooms, and not to shut the doors of these places, as they often do, just when a train is coming in, merely because it is eleven o'clock and the licensing hours prevent them selling any more drink. That is what is happening up and down the country. Trains are late and do not arrive at scheduled times; the doors of the refreshment rooms are shut on the stroke of eleven o'clock, and the men cannot get any refreshment because it is after eleven. These points are details in the whole picture of the war organisation, but they are details to which attention should be given. Let us have somebody in the welfare department who can do something, who can get busy and get a move on. Let the Minister of Transport talk to the railway executives and urge them to make some sort of contact between their running departments and the refreshment people, so that these refreshment rooms can be open to people when trains arrive or when the men are waiting in the station.

There is a further aspect of this matter. The Minister will find that this question of night shelters for troops travelling on leave was raised months ago in the House. At that time, a case in point was Inverness, and whoever was in office at the time told the House of what had been done, and that shelters and bivouacs were being arranged. Why was not the same thing done elsewhere? Alternatively, why are not the men sent away at reasonable times? There are two alternatives. Either leave times should be so arranged that men need not come to a London station overnight, or else accommodation should be provided. This matter is not beyond some commonsense arrangement. I only rise now, on the spur of the moment, because it amazes me to think that after all the weeks the hon. Member for Streatham has been slogging away at this he has to state to-night that still nothing has been done.

8.16 p.m.

Mr. James Maxton (Glasgow, Bridgeton)—I wish to associate myself heartily with the action of the hon. Member for Streatham in bringing this matter before the House. As a fairly regular user of St. Pancras and King's Cross stations, I have been aware of this state of affairs for a considerable time, and I feel ashamed that I have not acted as energetically as the hon. Gentleman, merely contenting myself with casual complaints here and there. I always expected that the matter would be straightened out. I knew of the activities of the voluntary associations; I knew of the Army welfare scheme; I knew that the railways had been taken under the control of the Government, and I could not believe that in the course of weeks decent arrangements would not be made for the comfort of these men passing through the big terminus stations.

It was driven home to me in the strongest possible fashion in Euston one night about nine o'clock, when I was going up by the Scottish train, and I ran into a group of Glasgow men, members of the Royal Engineers, some of them my own constituents, who knew me. I entered into conversation with them. They had been over on the Norwegian Expedition. They had been in the terrible landing at Andalsnes. They had been up to Lillehammer, the furthest advance point of the Expedition, had been battered all over the place, had retreated and embarked again on ships under terrible conditions. They had to travel in a troopship through the most dangerous waters round the North of Scotland, down the west into London, and, having arrived here, were glad of a few days leave in which to return to their homes in the West of Scotland. That was a month or more of concentrated hell. I would have thought that, for men who had gone through those experiences, it would not have been too much to have thrown open the doors of Euston Hotel and given them a shakedown. That is as it would seem to me—and, as hon. Members know, I do not take the ordinary view about warmongers—and it would not be too much for these fellows if they had been given every scrap of hospitality and luxury that Euston Hotel could produce. Do the Ministry of Transport, the L.M.S. or the Army authorities think about anything of that sort—of Army men lying about the platform, with no arrangements made for their ordinary comfort, let alone for special treatment for the men who have been going through a rough time?

I hope that the action of the hon. Gentleman has been sufficient to ensure that this sort of thing will not occur again. It is terrible to think that while I and other Members of this House, and business men who travel up and down between Glasgow and London, can have all the luxuries of the hotels and the dining rooms, and can have first-class sleepers—when the ordinary routine of our lives has not been seriously disturbed by the war—those fellows, who have been going through the hardest conditions, must lie upon the platform among the mail bags. I hope that this Debate has been sufficient to open the eyes of the War Office, and to get something done.

8.21 p.m.

Mr. R. J. Taylor (Morpeth)—I am glad that this subject has been raised to-night. It is not applicable only to the London stations. The hon. Member for Streatham has rendered a public service in bringing the matter forward. When we consider how much our future depends on the men who are fighting for us, we should at least give some consideration to their comfort. I have been trying for months to get this question settled so far as the soldiers from the North are concerned. Having failed to get proper train connections out of Newcastle, I asked that consideration might be given to the times at which the men were sent on leave. Reference has been made to men being delayed on the London stations because they were unable to catch their last trains to the North, but my problem has been slightly different. The train which used to leave King's Cross arrived at Newcastle one minute before the connecting train left, and the men had to travel about a mile to get that connection. The railway company very kindly brought the connecting train into the same station as that at which the other train arrives. That arrangement lasted for a fortnight. Then they said that, on account of heavy traffic, they had to take the train back again to the other station. They then re-timed the train, so that there was no hope of a connection in any circumstances. Men who came back from France spent the night lying in the Central Station. It is true that we have a Salvation Army hostel, doing splendid work, but these men do not know of it.

Is it not a shame that a man who had been serving in France, should leave London, get to Newcastle, and then be left lying on the platform for a night, when only 10 or 12 miles from his wife and family? I approached the Secretary for War about this, and he pointed out that they could not control the times of arrival of soldiers of the B.E.F. But the same thing applies to soldiers before they have gone overseas. They have been getting into London at times which prevented them from continuing their journey home. There is no wisdom in this sort of thing. If we cannot arrange to get our men to their homes properly in such times as this, we are entirely lacking in organisation. I hope that the Secretary for War will take steps to enable these men, who are making all these sacrifices for us, to get home to their wives and families.

(To be concluded)

SIR THOMAS MOORE, M.P.: IS HE A TORY FIFTH COLUMNIST?

HIS FASCIST LOYALTIES EXPOSED

WHY AYR M.P. MUST GO

Last month we exposed the Tory Fifth Column. In one article we denounced Sir Arnold Wilson, M.P. On another page we mentioned that he was presumed to have died in action. The fact that he repented his criminal worship of Fascism, and so died in company with young men instead of sheltering behind them, does not atone for his political folly nor make his public views less criminal in their effect.

Sir Arnold Wilson is dead and so he can rest. Many of his colleagues remain and still sit in Lords and Commons, directing the policy of the country, attacking and denouncing Socialists, genuine Pacifists, and sincere Conscientious Objectors. They still sneer at Socialism, which is the only remedy for Fascism, and have no idea of atonement for their political imbecility than aggressive self-assertion. These arrogant friends of Fascism must retire from public life. Once a Fascist, always a Fascist. In any case, they have been too recently the friends of Hitler and Mussolini to remain in their present place of paid legislators of the nation, whose citizens are facing death from Fascist bombs.

One of these Fascist M.P.'s is Lt.-Col. Sir Thomas Moore, Conservative M.P. for Ayr Burghs.

In the Daily Mail for April 25, 1934, Sir Thomas Moore put his name to a newspaper article entitled: "The Blackshirts Have What The Conservatives Need." He described and enthused over the close affinity between Toryism and Fascism. He rejoiced at the Fascist rally in the Albert Hall. He wrote:

> "What is there in a black shirt which gives apparent dignity and intelligence to its wearer . . . All seemingly filled with the same emotions, pride of race, love of country, loyalty, hope . . . As I listened to the vibrant tones of Sir Oswald Mosley . . . I got my answer. There was little if any of the policy which could not be accepted by the most loyal follower of our present Conservative leaders. The majority of the essentials and many of the details are part and parcel of strict Tory doctrines. . . . In truth much of the national Blackshirt policy has already been initiated by the National Government. Why, therefore, the Blackshirts? The answer lies in the one word—Action! . . . But if my analysis is correct surely there cannot be any fundamental difference of outlook between the Blackshirts and their parents the Conservatives? For let us make no mistake about that parentage. The briefest study of the movement and the most casual examination of its members satisfy one that it is largely derived from the Conservative Party. This is perhaps natural for the instincts are the same, loyalty to the throne and love of country. With these two powerful bonds, surely the relationship can be made closer and more friendly. . . .
> "Why should there not be concord and agreement between that old historic party . . . and this new and virile offshoot? . . .
> "The country will be safeguarded from danger within and made more secure from danger without. The National Government will get a new lease of vigorous and successful life."

A few months before contributing this article to the Daily Mail, Sir Thomas Moore was writing for the Sunday Dispatch. Here is an extract from his contribution to that journal for October 22, 1933:

> "If we were to isolate Germany and therefore prove to the German people that Herr Hitler had failed them, deluded them, betrayed them, eventually they will discard him and seek another God . . . there is only one, the anti-Christ of Communism."

Moore was extraordinary blind to the growing menace of Nazism and Fascism. In his criminal opposition to Socialism he was arming the enemies of the British Empire with power and lulling the ruling class, even of Britain, to defeatism. He proved himself a political incapable whose domicile was the backwoods of understanding and imagination.

In the very same Sunday Dispatch article, Moore stated:

> "But if I may judge from my personal knowledge of Herr Hitler, peace and justice are the key-words of his policy."

Because political fools like Moore wrote, spoke, and alas! thought like this, the youth of Europe is being slaughtered to-day, and the workers of Spain were betrayed and crushed.

At this time, Moore was urging the return of the German colonies and the strengthening and developing of German power in Africa.

Sir Thomas Moore, Fascist and Nazi apologist, eulogist of Hitler, was re-adopted as Conservative candidate for Ayr Burghs in the 1935 election. The Tory machine worked overtime to secure his return. Why? Because of its criminal hatred of Socialism and the working-class. Whilst young workers face death, or discomfort in the Forces, he sits in Parliament and talks—at £600 per annum. Fascist, Nazist, Hitlerite, Mussolini-apologist, enemy of anti-Fascist Spain, he sits in Parliament and proclaims his hatred of Socialism, Conscientious Objectors, and Pacifists.

How can this man play any part in the defeat of Fascism? How can we expect his electors, or the political machine that returned him to Parliament, knowing his opinions, and endorsing those opinions, to serve the struggle against Fascism? Moore has no more right to be in the House of Commons than Captain Ramsay.

We demand his impeachment. The people of Ayr should demonstrate for his withdrawal. Not Socialism, not Conscientious Objection, not Pacifism, but Fascist Toryism pioneered this war and entrenched Fascism. Let us end Capitalist Fascism by meeting Fascism with United Socialist opposition. A Socialist Britain can destroy both Hitler and Mussolini; and only a Socialist Britain.

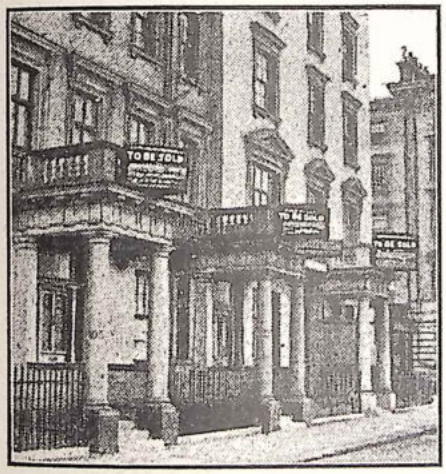
THE BOMBINGS—PROPERTY—AND THE POOR

LONDON'S ORDEAL AND LESSONS!

HOTELS, HOUSES, AND THE HOMELESS!



London and Glasgow have experienced the ordeal that Fascism but a few years ago imposed upon Madrid and Barcelona. This aerial bombardment may continue for long enough. It is part of the twentieth-century war-time life of civilised humanity. Woven into the horror is another tragedy—the tragedy of poverty, of the class-struggle. Property, and the evil of property, which has sacrificed humanity, and destroyed even capitalism's approach to commonweal, indulges its minor realistic cynicism midst the horrors of war's bombardments.

In London's fashionable West End, and wealthy suburban Hampstead, many many houses with deep basements and ample accommodation for many people stand empty. As the Sunday Express points out, they have been empty since their prosperous owners left London at the outbreak of war. They should be commandeered—requisitioned is the correct term—and placed at the disposal of the refugees from Stepney and Bermondsey.

Even the Sunday Dispatch realises how sane is this demand. On the same day as the Sunday Express said "commandeer"—Sunday, September 15—the Dispatch said: "SEIZE THESE HOUSES!" It said it in caps, and published the pictures we reproduce, without permission, on this page. The letter-press read:—

"Look at these houses! There are hundreds like them in the West End of London. Big empty mansions with 20 or 30 rooms or more and basements and cellars which could be speedily and cheaply converted into excellent air raid shelters.

"They stand empty waiting for tenants or purchasers able to pay huge prices.

"The owners may have to wait a long time to find people with enough money. But the mansions must stay vacant while the battle for London is raging and thousands of people in the suburbs are homeless.

"These great empty mansions must be seized at once by the Government and used for housing the Londoners whose own little homes have been smashed by the bombs of the Nazis.

"The opinions of the owners of these properties are not important in this crisis. The Government should act to-day and discuss the matter afterwards when there is more time."

What is the Government attitude towards this demand? Malcolm MacDonald—who owes his position in public life to the fact that his father once upon a time was alleged to be a socialist—acts as though he never heard the word: "Collectivise." He believes in conscription—that is only commandeering human beings; but he has never heard of collectivism, that means socialising property which is socially created and only individually appropriated. The value of war is questionable, at best. The value of making property serve humanity is without question. So Malcolm MacDonald puts property above humanity. He appeals for Charity—Charity for the bombed homeless! Charity to meet national emergency.

Says the Glasgow Evening News, Monday, September 16:—

"If the people are driven from their houses, as they have been driven from so many homes in the East End of London, what are we prepared to do with them?

"Charity is not a solution, either in the raising of funds or the friendship of more fortunate homes.

"This is a task for the people as a community, not as individuals."

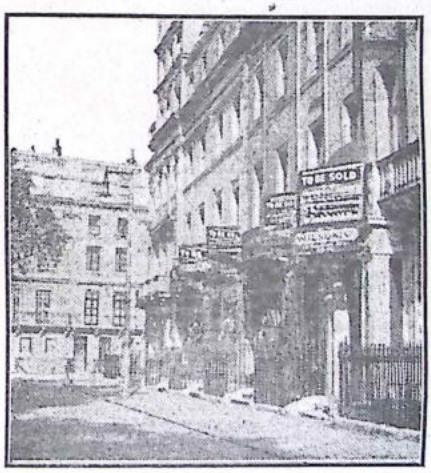
Charity, says the wealthy patriot who lives on dividends, and hopes he is immune from air-raids! Charity, says the some-time Socialist son, giving no heed to the need for social organisation. Charity! And this is how charity works!

From one of the Sunday papers quoted, we clip this excerpt from the news columns:—

Homeless March into the Savoy.

"Police were summoned to the Savoy Hotel last night, when about fifty men and women with two children in arms took shelter during an air-raid alarm.

"The party, who came from Stepney and other East End districts, decided that they were homeless and refused to move.



"Two directors of the Savoy were called in, and an inspector and a plain-clothes officer followed.

"It was pointed out to the party, which included Councillor Phil Piratin, of the Stepney Borough Council, and Mr. 'Tubby' Rosen, of the Stepney Tenants' Defence League, that they were on private premises, and that the owners could ask them to leave at any time even during an air raid. . . .

The police then demanded to see their identity cards, and took down particulars.

"A few minutes later the all-clear sounded and the party filed out."

Private property! Asked to leave at any time!

We do not believe in war; but war is here. So long as it continues the poor, who survive death, will be plunged into more desperate homelessness. And the amelioration is—to seize the houses, requisition the hotels, and commandeer the furniture stores. "Conscientious objectors" no longer face District Court Martials. They face Field Court Martials. Britain is the battlefield. And the battlefield demands that the front-line civilian shall be protected; the soldier's wife and children must be protected; requisition!

This is the lesson of London for the entire country. Practical social service. Common sacrifice means equality.

Seize the empty houses. Take over the hotels. Take over the hire furniture stores. House and comfort the homeless.

Capitalism has given us war and death. Let war lead us to peace and Socialism.

GOOD NEIGHBOURS!

BOLSHEVISM AND NAZI-ISM

The Soviet-German Pact was the immediate prelude to the present war. Molotov celebrated the first anniversary of that pact by going out of his way to stress the good relations existing between Soviet or Bolshevik Russia and Nazi-Germany. He repeated that those relations were based on the "fundamental interests" of both states. His eulogy of the pact was followed up by a leading article in Izvestia, which repeats the view that Britain and France were responsible for the war, and had endeavoured to make a breach between Russia and Germany, that is, between Stalin and Hitler.

The pact was summarised in the Daily Worker, London, for Saturday, August 26, 1940, under the following double column heading :—

SOVIET-GERMAN PACT A YEAR OLD

From Our Own Correspondent

Moscow, Friday.

The Communist Party dupes who read this paper were told in the letter-press that follows :

"An important editorial article on the occasion of the first anniversary of the signature of the Soviet-German non-aggression pact appears in to-day's Izvestia, the daily paper of the Soviet Government.

'The results of the past year,' says Izvestia, 'have fully confirmed the view that the Soviet-German Pact, signed on August 23, 1939, corresponds to the fundamental state-interests of the U.S.S.R. and Germany.

'A year ago the peoples of the Soviet Union received with keen satisfaction the news of the signing of the Pact which revealed among other things that Germany correctly understood the great importance of the U.S.S.R. in international life.

'To-day, as then, the peoples of the U.S.S.R. greet this historic Pact which has contributed so much to the preservation of peace throughout Eastern Europe.'

"The signature of the Pact, the paper says, was a real turning point not only in the history of Soviet-German relations but also in the history of the whole of Europe and not of Europe alone. The Pact is one of the most significant and important documents in the history of foreign political relations of the last decades.

IMPERIALIST AIMS.

'The pact was signed in a situation fraught with danger, when it was already obvious what tasks the British and French imperialists had set themselves. For a number of months before the conclusion of the pact Britain and France had made persistent attempts to harness the Soviet Union to their chariot, to use the SovietUnion for their imperialist aims. Above all they strove to provoke armed conflict between the U.S.S.R. and Germany.

'The conclusion of the Soviet-German Pact put an end to this provocative work and ended the hostility between the two countries. For this reason the Soviet-German Pact was and still is an important factor for peace. The two largest States in Europe have ruled out military methods of solving mutual claims and disputes. This should have a sobering effect on the warmakers. But unfortunately for mankind this was not the case.

'After the collapse of Poland the new Soviet-German Pact, which laid a stable foundation for lasting peace in Eastern Europe, could have served as the beginning from which the war at the other end of the continent could have been brought to an end.

'NOT FORTUITOUS'

'The good neighbourly and friendly relations between the Soviet Union and Germany are not based on fortuitous considerations of a transient nature, but on the fundamental State interests of both the U.S.S.R. and Germany.

'This truth has long been understood in the U.S.S.R. and Germany, but must be repeated once more for the benefit of those gentlemen who, with surprising stubbornness, cannot or will not grasp it and who build all kinds of plans on their incomprehension or disinclination to understand, thus dooming their plans to failure.'"

We have reproduced the Daily Worker summary in full, including its italics. That must remove all doubt as to the accuracy of the Stalinist attitude. Every honest reader knows that, from beginning to end, the article is a lie. Every statement is false and can be proved to be false.

Here are the statements summarised :—

(1) This historic pact has contributed to the preservation of peace throughout Eastern Europe.

(2) France and Britain aimed to provoke armed conflict between Russia and Germany.

(3) The good-neighbourly relations between the Soviet Union and Germany are not based on fortuitous consideration of a transient nature, but on the fundamental State interests of both the U.S.S.R. and Germany.

(4) This truth has been understood long since in the U.S.S.R. and Germany.

Every reader will agree that these four points summarise the article. Facts answered the first point : for there is no peace in Eastern Europe. France and Britain did not need to provoke war between Germany and Russia, because Hitler avowed that the destruction of Bolshevik Russia was Germany's aim. If the good-neighbourly relations between Russia and Germany are based on fundamental State interests of both countries, then Fascism and Bolshevism are identical : and all the outcries against Fascism, and all the attacks on Social Fascism, were so much lying propaganda on the part of the Comintern and its hirelings. If this truth has been understood in the U.S.S.R. and Germany, how do the Izvestia, and the Daily Worker, explain the sensational charges made in the Russian newspapers, and the "Communist" press here, at the time that Zinoviev and Kamerev were brought from prison to face trial before the Collezium of the Soviet Supreme Court in Moscow, with fourteen other prominent Russian Communists.

The capital charges against them were of plotting against Stalin and the Soviet Government. Here is an example of the general tenor of the Soviet newspaper allegations against Germany, establishing the reality of "the good-neighbbourly relations" then existing between the Fascist and Bolshevik States.

"The Gestapo (German Fascist Secret Police) furnishes means to struggle with the Soviet for the leaders of the plot against Stalin."

The Soviet newspapers, in neighbourly tones, referred to

"Bloody Fascist dungeons where heroes of the German proletariat are tortured, and where they (the Gestapo) prepare false passports and poisoned arms."

This was very much like the pot complaining of the kettle being black : but it certainly did not read very neighbourly.

Pravda said :—

"Disguise is useless . . . . It is a question not of an idealogical and political liaison with Fascism, but of the direct and organised work of Trotskyists and Zinovieffists with Fascist police, with Fascist 'diversionists' and Fascists spies."

The readers of Pravda were asked to believe that this charge was true. The Daily Worker said the charge was true. If it were, did it point to fundamental neighbourliness?

STALIN IS HITLER'S VASSAL

TROTSKY'S LAST STATEMENT.

The last public declaration issued by the murdered Leon Trotsky, denounced Molotov's speech applauding the Nazi-Soviet Pact. The statement was issued to the world through the United Press :—

"Molotov's latest speech confirms that the Kremlin continues to be a satelite of Berlin and Rome. The Communist leaders in various countries have calmed their parties with promises that to-morrow if not to-day Moscow will turn towards the 'democracies.' Molotov's speech belies these promises. Five years of 'anti-fascist' Peoples' Fronts are definitely unmasked as charlatanism. Moscow's foreign policy is determined by power politics and not by political principles.

"Molotov, it is true, tried to cover the present Kremlin policy with anti-imperialist phraseology. But its falseness strikes one's eyes. Molotov unmasked England's wish to retain her colonies. But he kept silent about Germany's and Italy's wish to take them. He spoke about the imperialism of Japan and the United States but he didn't find a word of condemnation for Hitler's banditry and Mussolini's jackal politics. Even more, he underlined for the first time that the German-Soviet pact assured free hands to Hitler. This unilateral and thoroughly sham 'fight' against imperialism only reveals that Moscow's politics is not independent but serves the interests of one imperialism against the other.

"An increase in population of 23,000,000 doesn't solve the problem of the security of the USSR. The victory of Hitler-Mussolini over Great Britain would immediately place the move towards the east on the order of the day for German imperialism. It would at once become clear that in following the line of least resistance the Kremlin oligarchy only accumulated difficulties and dangers.

HITLER'S ANTI-BOLSHEVIST PROPAGANDA EXAMINED

In other colums of this issue, we publish :—

(1) Communist Party or Stalinist celebration eulogy of the Nazi-Bolshevik Pact of August, 1939.

(2) Official 'C'ommunist" pre-pact attack on Hitler and Nazism, as constituting the war-menace and reaction of the world.

As shown, at the time of the Moscow trials, every critic of Stalin was accused of being a Fascist and a Trotskyist. Since Stalin shook hands with Hitler's ambassador, only one term of abuse remains. It is a crime to be a Trotskyist. It is neighbourly and comradely to be a Fascist. "Trotskyism" and "Fascism" are no longer twin terms of abuse.

Before these two assassins of human liberty shook hands, the hatred was mutual. Just as the Bolsheviks denounced Hitler, so did Hitler and his propaganda department abuse mercilessly Stalin and Bolshevism.

During 1936 and 1937, in common with other Socialists and Pacifists in Britain, we received—both at our private adress, and also at Bakunin Hall, then situate at Stirling Road, Townhead, Glasgow—from Germany a considerable quantity of propaganda leaflets, printed in English. This consisted mostly of well-printed, large-size leaflets. We kept five of these leaflets. To-day, they make better and wiser propaganda than their authors and printers intended.

The leaflets we kept are numbered :—

1 . . . . No. 312—English.
2 . . . . No. 842—English.
3 . . . . No. 892—English.
4 . . . . No. 922—English.
5 . . . . No. 972—English.

The imprint on 312 was as follows :—

"Free copies of this leaflet and others may be obtained by writing to the 'Fichte Association' Jungfernstieg, Hamburg 36. Please distribute them among your friends. Falken-Verlag, Hamburg. Hermann's Erben, Hamburg."

The imprint is the same on 2, 3, and 4. But the fifth leaflet bears the additional statement, published in big letters at the foot :—

"Published by President Heinrich Kessemeier, 127 Hochallee, Hamburg."

The title, and subject-matter, of each of these leaflets, in the order shown above, are as follows :—

(1) The Treaty of Versailles violated the Preliminary Peace Treaty. Legal malpractice against the German Nation.

This leaflet reproduces President Wilson's famous 14 points in full; makes telling quotations from Lloyd George and Wilson; indicts the Versailles Treaty as being illegal and not binding upon the German nation; and denounces the Young plan.

We make no criticism of this leaflet. It is a concise and sober statement of fact and of protest. We endorse every word as being true. This leaflet consists of nouns and not adjectives, and its general tone can be applauded.

(2) Adolf Hitler offers France 25 years of peace. Main part of the peace speech delivered by the Fuehrer and Chancellor on March 7th, 1936.

This speech denounces the pact signed between the Soviet and France, on May 2, 1935, and ratified on February, 27, 1936. Hitler claimed that this pact was military alliance made by France with the Soviet Union, directed exclusively against Germany, in violation of the Rhine Pact of Locarno.

Hitler then discusses Bolshevism and its menace. We give a special heading to this excerpt from the report because it makes such excellent reading to-day.

Hitler's Denunciation of Bolshevism.

"If my international opponents reproach me to-day that I have refused this co-operation with Russia, I make them the following declaration:—

"I do not and did not reject co-operation with Russia but with Bolshevism, which lays claim to a world rulership.

"The German nation has not only wept but has laughed heartily throughout its life, and I will not see it descend into the gloom of international communism and the dictatorship of hate. I tremble for Europe at the very thought of what would happen to our old and over-populated continent if this Asiatic concept of the world, which is destructive of all our ideals, should be successful in bringing upon us the chaos of the Bolshevic revolution.

"I do not believe that close association with the political doctrine and outlook on life which are destructive of national existence can be helpful to statesmen. Let me now apply this fundamental principle to European politics in general. The moment I do so I find that Europe is divided into two groups.

"The first group consists of autonomous and independent national states and of nations with whom we are linked together in a thousand ways by reason of a common historical experience and a common culture. With these same people we want to remain thus linked for ever, and indeed also with the free and independent nations of other countries outside of Europe.

"The second group is ruled by that intolerant Bolshevic doctrine which aims at international domination and which preaches the annihilation of what are to us the most eternal and most sacred ideals relating to this world and the next. In place of all this, Bolshevism would install a world which is abhorrent to us in its culture and its outlook and its teaching.

"Now there is deep tragedy in the fact that after all our long years of honest striving to establish relations of confidence, sympathy, and closer understanding with the French people, this people has entered into a military alliance with Bolshevist Russia, the first phases of which we can see to-day, but the ultimate results of which may be incalculable, unless Providence again proves more kindly than men deserve.

"It cannot be foreseen whether this Bolshevist philosophy will not be victorious to morrow or the next day in France as well. But should this happen—then it is certain that this new Bolshevic State would be a section of the Bolshevist International, which means that the decision as to aggression or non-aggression would not be made by two different States according to their own independent and objective judgments, but orders would be issued from one headquarter. Should such a development take place these headquarters would not be in Paris but in Moscow."

Let it be remembered that Hitler uttered these words, as Führer and Chancellor, on March 7, 1936; that the translation, in English, was issued officially in a leaflet, circulated through the post, throughout the English-speaking world, from Hitler's own propaganda organisation, in Hamburg. Its hatred of Bolshevism, and its challenge to the Soviet Union, cannot be denied. The defenders of the Soviet say that the Soviet Union is unchanged since 1936. It that is so, how did the Nazi-Soviet Pact come to be signed; and how can the alleged statesmen of Germany and Russia make speeches about "good neighbourliness?"

The italics are Hitler's. They were made to emphasise his opposition to "that intolerant Bolshevic doctrine"!

Defenders of the Soviet-Germany Peace Pact say that French and British statesmen endeavoured to prevent Germany and Russia from being good neighbours. We ask the "Communist" hireling apologists to tell us: Did French or British statesmen dictate Hitler's speech of March 7, 1936? Or did he compose it himself, as a clear statement of Nazi doctrine?

The other three leaflets are so emphatic of Hitler's antagonism to Stalin and to Bolshevism, that we reproduce their text in full, as separate articles, to show the nature of the Nazi world propaganda.

The titles of these leaflets are as follows:—

(3) Bolshevists as World War Mongers (illustrated with a cartoon.)

(4) Who are The Rulers in Russia?

(5) World Enemy No. 1.—Bolshevism. A brief statement of sober facts relating to Bolshevism.

Read these leaflets: and then form your own sincerity of Hitler's present-day protests of friendship for Russia; and of the Communist Party's hireling apologies for the Soviet-Nazi Peace Party! Good Neighbours!!

SOLDIERS' SONS

Albert Mann fought at Mons in 1914, won the D.C.M., and was mentioned in dispatches.

On Tuesday, June 4, he handed his war medals in a parcel to the Clerk at the South-Eastern Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal in London.

His son, 20-year-old Joseph Albert Thomas Mann, of London Road, Wembley, had been removed from the register. The son said that his father had made him promise never to take part in war.

Geoffrey Gordon Close (27), married, foreman van salesman, living in a furnished flat in Rawcliffe Lane, York, told the Yorkshire Tribunal for Conscientious Objectors held in Leeds on Monday, June 17, that his father gave his life in the last war, and he thought that was sufficient contribution from his family for the State.

The Chairman, Judge Stewart, replied that if every man whose father gave his life 20 years ago was exempted from serving, in this country, there might not be sufficient people to protect the country.

Mrs. Wilson, mother of Close, said she had been married a second time. She promised her son's father when he went to the last war, that if the pledge "War to end war" was not kept she would train their son in opposition to war. Mrs. Wilson said that she had done so and it was due to that influence that her son had adopted his present attitude.

After the Tribunal had ordered Close's name to be removed from the register without qualification, Mrs. Wilson exclaimed: "What sort of conscience do you recognise?"

Before the same Tribunal appeared the following day Frederick Hardy South, 39 Nab Lane, Shipley.

In the New Statesman, London, for June 22, his mother, Margery South, described the treatment of this youth by the Tribunal, and recalls the fact that his father was wounded twice in the Great War, as were also two uncles, whilst another three uncles were killed in action.

Mrs. Margery South writes:—

"My son's pacifist record was not disputed. He was a member of the No More War Movement, and automatically became a member of the P.P.U. when the two movements merged. He is an active pacifist, is saturated with facts and figures—has spoken in public, taken part in poster parades, and engages in any pacifist activities that are still possible. . . .

"In the course of a very short and irrelevant cross-examination the Judge asked: 'Do you wish this country to lose the war?' To this my son replied: 'I do not wish either side to be defeated.'

"'That is not answering my question. Do you want this country to win the war?'

"'I do not wish this country to win the war sir,' was the reply.

"In a flash Judge Stewart turned to the Court and said: 'This man has the mind of a traitor.' My son attempted to speak; he wished to point out that the pacifist fears that victory by either side will be the prelude to a vindictive peace policy, but the Judge angrily ordered him to be silent. My son respectfully once more asked to be heard, but the attempt was useless, and, refusing to listen further to the insults of an almost incoherently angry Judge, he left the Court.

"The whole thing was a sheer mockery and was not made better by newspaper report headed 'The mind of a traitor,' and which quoted Judge Stewart as saying, 'Steps will be taken to deal with a man who speaks like a traitor in this Court.' These reports have been a grief to my husband, who knows the utter sincerity of my son, but who, along with five volunteer brothers, fought in the infantry in the last war when three were killed and two wounded—my husband being wounded twice."

In the Yorkshire Observer, for June 14, Mrs. Margery South had to publish a letter protesting against local victimisation, stating:—

". . . in view of certain unpleasantnesses to which we have already been subjected, I should be grateful if you would give equal publicity to the fact that my husband does not share the views held by my son, that he and five brothers were volunteers in the last war, and three of these brothers were killed and two wounded, my husband being wounded twice."

And we have "conchies" from the last war holding high positions in the State, or functioning as Lord Mayors or Lord Provosts, and expecting to receive titles, and to find a place in Burke or Debrett, at an early date. What folly! But what hypocrisy!

TOTALITARIAN DEMOCRATS

Under the above heading, the North Wales Times, Denby, for May 11, published the following powerful article:—

"The attitude of a number of our representatives on the Denbighshire Education Committee towards conscientious objectors who are in the employment of that authority is not likely to stimulate the waning faith of a large number of people in our democratic system of local government.

"Can it be possible that those members of the L.E.A. who are anxious to penalise teachers and others who are genuine conscientious objectors really voice the feeling of the majority of the ratepayers and the parents in this liberty-loving part of Wales? Led by a gentleman who has obviously not yet attuned his mind to the liberal and democratic traditions of the land of his adoption, these elected servants of democracy pleaded for more totalitarianism in local government!

"One can understand the plea for equality of sacrifice in these days of stress and strife, and genuine conscientious objectors would willingly accept the same rates of pay as members of the fighting forces—provided unscrupulous employers did not take advantage of such a scheme in order to secure cheap labour, and that all classes in the country had to make equal sacrifice. The demands of men and women who are in sheltered positions or basking in the fading rays of senile security, that only our young men should make vital sacrifices have a hollow, hypocritical sound.

"But what puzzles every sincere democrat is that members of a progressive public body should prove less tolerant in their attitude towards their employees than our National Government or those who govern the non-provided schools. Do they wish to reverse the whole trend of political evolution, and in the name of Welsh democracy, to deny their servants the personal freedom that, in its widest sense, is the object of all social and public activity? We are fighting despotism: they favour it. Prating of democracy they deny it. Individual judgment and independence, personal freedom to live as one thinks best provided others are not wronged thereby—these things were fought for in the past. Why should we relinquish them now?"

BISHOP OF BRISTOL'S PROTEST

In his Diocesan Gazette for August, Dr. C. S. Woodward, Bishop of Bristol, issues a warning against the danger of adopting Nazi methods in order to defeat Nazi-ism.

Dr. Woodward states:—

"No one can deny that with a view to increasing national efficiency we have submitted to such a measure of totalitarianism, i.e., State control of our lives and actions as a short time ago we should not have believed possible. Much of this has been inevitable and, making virtue of necessity, we have submitted with a good grace. But there are aspects of the situation of which we have little reason to feel proud and which those who believe in our national heritage and ethos ought most carefully to watch.

"It is unnecessary to speak of the blunders of the Ministry of Information or of the way in which the wholesale internment of friendly 'enemy aliens' has been handled . . . .

"But there is another matter—admittedly a very difficult one—about which as members of the Christian Church we are bound to be disturbed. I refer to the attitude which is being adopted towards Pacifists and Conscientious Objectors, and especially towards those whose pacifism is a direct result of their religious convictions. I do not suggest that conscientious objection on other grounds is to be ignored, but that Christian Pacifism must be the special concern of the Christian Church.

"I do not, as you know, share the opinions of the Pacifists . . . . But though I disagree with them, I am none the less unhappy about the way in which Conscientious Objectors are being treated in many quarters.

"The fundamental evil in the Nazi regime is the denial of intellectual freedom. To think differently from the majority, or rather from the small group of men who have seized power in Germany, is a crime to be punished by social ostracism and ultimately by the Concentration Camp.

"We have continually said that we are fighting to preserve the freedom of the individual against this tyranny and, although we are engaging in a life and death struggle, we have deliberately allowed those who have a conscientious objection to taking part in war to stand aside from the conflict. This seems to me to be an expression of our love of freedom of which we shall one day be proud.

"But the virtue of the State's action will be largely discounted if municipal bodies and business firms dismiss conscientious objectors who are in their employment, and if the public in general, by social ostracism or otherwise, make their lives intolerable. This is to deny freedom of conscience by a side-wind while it is officially permitted by the State."

THE HOLLYWOOD BRITONS

In our Christmas 1939 issue, we report the hearing by the South-Eastern Counties' Tribunal, sitting in London, of the appeal of Sidney Desmond Tester, the film actor, for registration as a conscientious objector. Tester was attacked for making that appeal. But nothing was said about the Hollywood Britons. Gracie Fields was then very popular. Since then, J. J. Davidson, M.P. for Maryhill, by insistent questioning, has brought to light the scandal of the money she has withdrawn from Britain. The pose of patriotism is a useful cover for unpatriotic conduct, and also an aid to the accumulation of wealth. We are glad to note that the Gracie Fields' scandal has forced into unwelcome publicity the Hollywood Britons—the patriots who prefer flight and play to fight and pay—not pay from the public, but pay to the war god of misery. Desmond Tester sacrificed his career by remaining in Britain and upholding his principles.

In the Picturegoer, London, for May 11 last, there was published an interview with Michael Balcon, Director of Productions at the A.T.P. Studios, Ealing, on the question of Britons in Hollywood. The interviewer was Hubert Cole.

Describing the interview, Cole said :—

"I went to Ealing this week to see Michael Balcon and help him get something off his chest . . . . I saw Mr. Balcon for something like an hour, and I scarcely spoke a word myself . . . . He talked at high speed, with a sincerity that was almost violent. Now and then he used words that aren't always heard in polite society. Somehow, they did not seem out of place."

As accurately as Cole could condense it, this is what Balcon said :—

"I am surprised and disgusted by the attitude of the British people at present in Hollywood. Between the Munich agreement and the beginning of the war—and even since then—streams of British subjects have been hurrying across the Atlantic. Not only were they actors, but also producers, directors and all kinds of artistes and technicians connected with the film business.

"These people have in the past enjoyed the advantages and the profits of working in Britain. When things become tough here, they immediately desert the country and the British film industry and take cover in Hollywood. With them go an assortment of Central Europeans who have been given refuge in this country, who have in many cases gained the benefit of British naturalisation, but who have no intention of repaying Britain in return. . . . .

"This morning, I pinned up on the studio notice-board the announcement of our first war casualty—a young boy who worked here as a camera assistant had been killed in action. And in my morning paper I read a gossip paragraph about a very highly paid and famous figure in British films, who had been amusing his friends by childish antics on the dance floor of a Hollywood restaurant. It is a revolting and indecent thought that those two events may have been taking place at the same time.

"You will remember there was a great deal of interest in this country when Desmond Tester, who made a name for himself in Tudor Rose, The Drum and other British pictures, refused to serve in the army and was registered as a conscientious objector.

"Now I do not sympathise with Tester's pacifist views—but I have this to point out to our fellow-countrymen in Hollywood: Tester could easily have slipped over to America as they did, put on his white tie and tails, and earned a lot of favourable publicity by attending expensive Hollywood parties and drinking champagne in aid of relief funds for Finland.

"Instead, he chose to remain in this country, appear before the conscientious objectors' tribunal, and draw upon himself a great deal adverse comment which will probably have a very serious effect on his future career. He did the thing the hard way. I respect him for that. There have been many excuses put forward on behalf of the Britons who have run to find a safe and luxurious haven in California. One of the most fantastic is that they have been advised by our ambassadors and consuls in America that their services are not required in this country.

"Well, I am starting work on a picture soon in which John Mills would have been ideally suited for one of the leading roles. John Mills volunteered at the outbreak of war and is now serving in the army.

"This morning, I received a letter from the War Office telling me that they could not release Mills for the three weeks necessary for him to play in the film.

"Am I to believe, then, that our Government officials are seriously telling British actors in Hollywood that they are not needed here? It is inconceivable.

"We have the strange spectacle of Americans—actors such as Robert Montgomery, directors such as Thornton Freland—coming to work in this country, while the Britons flow in a steady stream in the opposite direction.

"If that situation were not so nauseating, it would be ludicrous."

MANCHESTER ANTI-PARLIMENTARIAN C.O.

The Manchester area Tribunal considered an interesting case on Friday, August 23. The applicant was an Anti-parliamentarian and an Atheist.

James Henry Kirven, aged 29, of Higher Lane, Whitefield, a Besses-o'-th'-Barn grocer's warehouseman, told the Tribunal that "The Power of Non-Violence"—a book by Richard B. Gregg, which has had a great deal of influence on the pacifist movement in this country in recent years—had been withdrawn from circulation by Whitefield Public Library.

Judge Burgis: How do you know?

The Applicant (James Henry Kirven, a Besses-o'-th'-Barn grocer's warehouseman) : I've applied for it.

Judge Burgis: Perhaps it's so popular it has become worn out.

Kirven: When I saw it a few weeks ago it was nearly a new book.

Kirven's statement contained the following statement :—

"I am antagonistic to Christianity, and I think religious bodies are pernicious movements. I never vote at all, because I don't think any party is worth a vote as yet."

In reply to the chairman he said he had read books on sociology, and mentioned books by G. Lowes Dickinson.

Questioned by Mr. Clift about his attitude to a personal attack, Kirven said, "There is a system of self-defence known as jiu-jitsu."

You would use jiu-jitsu?—Yes, I am a jiu-jitsuist. It is non-violent.

Kirven's sister gave evidence and said that her brother had had an opportunity of earning £4 15s. splinter-proofing glass, but gave it up when he found it was war work.

After a retirement the tribunal returned to ask Kirven about his attitude to non-combatant and othr kinds of service.

Giving the decision to register Kirven on condition he works on the land, Judge Burgis said that the case had occupied an inordinate length of time—something over an hour,—but the tribunal was satisfied that the time was not wasted.

Kirven's conscience was of the perverted type but it was genuine. Only as the result of considerable expenditure of time had the tribunal been able to probe his views. The applicant was an unusual type of man, and could not consort with any organisation for any purpose. The tribunal had been helped greatly by the evidence of his sister, although she was a person of little education and small powers of expression. The job of which he gave up the opportunity was paid at what was for him almost a princely rate —nearly double his present wage.

A BRAVE SOLDIER

At the annual meeting of the National Union of Conservative Associations, held at Central Hall, Westminster, on Thursday, April 4, Second Lieutenant E. W. Harrison, defended the rights of conscientious objectors.

Before the outbreak of war Lieutenant Harrison was Parliamentary candidate for Houghton-le-Spring, Durham.

Opposing a resolution directed against the conchies, Lieutenant Harrison said :—

"I do not agree with them, but, in the name of all that is sacred and English, they have a right to their consciences—the eternal right of human beings to live in freedom of body and mind and soul.

"I am very unhappy about the spirit that is developing in this country.

"Two years ago, if I had said it was better for 99 shirkers to escape conscription than for one real objector to be forced to fight, everyone in the Conservative Party would have clapped and said, 'Hear, hear.'

"After seven months of war we have developed this wicked, intolerant attitude that we will not face up to the fact that there are people who disapprove of the war, and will not take part in it.

"I maintain that if you are living in England you have a perfect right to disapprove of the war."

For this exhibition of democracy and moral heroism, Mr. Harrison was hissed by the women present at this Tory gathering.

TROTSKYIST C.O.

Frank Maitland, who described himself as an adherent of the Fourth International of the late Leon Trotsky, appeared before the South-East Scotland local tribunal for Conscientious Objectors, at Edinburgh Sheriff Courthouse on Thursday, August 22.

The appellant, who is 21 and resides at 7 Eildon Street, Edinburgh, said he had been a journalist, a clerk, and was at present without occupation, although he was still writing matter for which he received no payment. In his statement to the tribunal Maitland said he thought it was wrong to call upon the working-class to fight for the country when nothing in the country belonged to them.

The statement added :—

"I object to taking part in a war for the preservation of capitalists, and exploiting the working class."

When asked to which political party he belonged, he said—I adhere to the Fourth International of Leon Trotsky.

Dr. Wederburn, a member of the tribunal—Who is the leader of your party now?—It is still Leon Trotsky.

Dr. Wedderburn—But isn't Trotsky——?—Yes, but he is still the leader of the party.

In reply to another question, Maitland said that he entered the Revolutionary movement about 1930. He added :—

"I feel it is my duty to be a rebel and stand all the consequences that follow." (Applause from the public gallery.)

Sheriff Brown—I think you have made your position very clear to us, and we shall just have to grasp our thistle.

When the tribunal returned from considering the case, Sheriff Brown intimated that their decision was that Maitland be removed from the register without qualification and be liable for military service.

Maitland then asked—"Was the decision unanimous, sir?"

Sheriff Brown—It was.

Maitland—Well, I should like to know why the Trade Union representative on the tribunal voted to put a working man into the Army?

Sheriff Brown—You have the right of appeal.

Voice from gallery: Answer the question.

The Sheriff: I will not answer the question.

Voice: "Because you cannot."

Maitland is well known in Edinburgh as a speaker at the Mound from the platform of the Revolutionary Socialist Party.

BOLSHEVIKS DESCRIBE HITLER: 1936!

"HITLER'S NEW WAR MOVE"

By HANS BEHREND

[The following article was published under the heading, "Hitler's New War Move," in the English Edition of the International Press Correspondence, Vol. 16., No. 39, published in August 29, 1936, p. 1049. This issue carried an alleged "Report of Proceedings of the Moscow Trial." This paper was published by R. Bishop, 4a Partan Street, London, W.C.1., and printed by the Marston Printing Co. (T.U.), Nelson Place, Cayton Street, London, E.C., England. In other words, the paper was the official organ of the Stalinist alleged Third International, and of the Communist Party. It represents the "Communists" indictment of Hitler in 1936. The reader is asked to study it in connection with the article headed "Good Neighbours," and the Hitler attack on Bolsheviks, published on other pages of the current Word.—Ed.]

It is only a week since the Olympic torch was put out, and already Hitler has exploded a fresh bombshell over Europe and the world: the period of compulsory military service has been extended to two years. On March 16, 1935, the Treaty of Versailles was broken by the introduction of compulsory military service for one year. Less than eighten months later the strength of the army of the fascist dictatorship is considerably increased by the doubling of this period.

Naturally, as was to be expected, Hitler gives as a justification of this provocatorial step the supposed aggressive intentions of the Red Army, and the existence of the Soviet Union. He invents statements of "Bolshevik rulers," accordto which the Red Army will shortly march forth to attack Europe. Now, after the introduction of two years' conscription the Voelkischer Beobachter boasts, no power will be able to attack the safetv of the German Reich. And these people, who have a hand in every coup d'etat and every putsch, who instigated the murder of Dollfuss and Duca, who are accomplices to the murderers of Barthou and King Alexander, these tsars of the Gestapo, whose agents are preparing to assassinate Stalin and Voroshilov, these gentlemen of Nazi Germany who in their speeches and writings preach the annihilation of France, Czechoslovakia, and the Soviet Union—these people attempt to justify the introduction of two years' military service with the plea of the necessity of defence. Their real motive is obvious. The fascist dictators intend by the immensely increased power of their armies to force the smaller states of Europe still more under the tutelage of Hitler Germany; they want to strengthen the power of alliance of the third Reich, they want to issue a warning to those who would like to break free of the fascist military alliance. The introduction of two years' conscription intensifies the danger of war which the Germany of the third Reich presents to the whole world.

The dictator of Germany betrays himself, however, when he refers as a proof of the necessitv of increasing the period of conscription, in addition to the Soviet Union, to the events in Spain, which "under the curse of the Marxist terror has been turned into a desert." In this case the eyes even of those should be opened, upon whom Hitler's Red scares might otherwise have some effect. The fascist putsch in Spain and its terrible consequences are for the most part the work of Hitler himself. He had undermined the whole country, as the reputable English newspapers Manchester Guardian and News Chronicle now show in startling documents, by a whole system of Nazi espionage and agitation. Before the Spanish people had any inkling of danger, he knew every detail of the plan for revolt which plunged Spain into the horrors of civil war. He gave to the putschists that which is necessary for war: money and weapons. On 31st of July and 7th of August he sent the German steamers "Usaramo" with 28 bombing planes and "Montesarmiento" with 14 aeroplanes and numerous anti-aircraft guns to Lisbon. In the aerodromes of Morocco, Seville and Burgos there is no room for the Junkers and other German aeroplanes, there are so many of them there. Ten German planes daily transport Moroccan soldiers from Africa to the European continent, in order that they may bring western civilisation to the Spanish people. The German officers of the huge fleet which is concentrated in Spanish waters swagger with their "Heil, Hitler," arm-in-arm with the murderers of Bajadoz through the streets of the rebel towns. From the very first day of the Spanish civil war, nay, weeks and months before its outbreak, Hitler violated the principle of neutrality. On the pretext that other powers are not neutral towards Germany, he seeks to justify his new war move.

Hitler and Blomberg's decree of August 24th were prepared for weeks beforehand by an intensive press campaign. In order to shift the responsibility for their step on to the Soviet Union and Bolshevism in general, they simply turn the war of defence and self-preservation of Spanish democracy into a Bolshevik war of aggression for the dictatorship of the proletariat. "It is clear that the Spanish Government is no longer master in its own house," writes Rudolph Kirchner, the spokesman of the Foreign Office, in the Frankfurter Zeitung. That is to say that the Bolshevists are overrunning everything, that in France, too, the Peoples' Front government are losing control over the "forces of anarchy," and that, therefore, Germany is threatened not only in the east, but in the west too.

Thus during the last weeks a raging, tearing, anti-Soviet agitation has broken loose. Since August 15 all newspapers have been publishing daily pictures, pages and articles to prove that the Red Army is about to attack Europe. The whole of the Baltic is supposed to be swarming with Soviet warships, and the official German news agency, from whom also these hair-raising stories come, brings them into direct connection (this is the object of the whole affair) with events in Spain, where "world Bolshevism is engaged in carrying out its aggressive plans on land and sea." The announcers of the wireless stations of Madrid and Barcelona—Soviet Russians! The members of the legendary Revolutionary Committee of San Sebastian—Soviet Russians! The instructors of the government troops—Soviet Russians! On all the battle-fields—the corpses of Soviet Russians! Morning and evening this sort of thing is inflicted on the German public in all seriousness, and the clumsy lies are quickly followed by actions.

The fully justified search undertaken by a Spanish warship, of a German steamer which was carrving benzine for the Spanish rebels, was answered by the government of the Reich not with a note of protest but with an ultimatum, not with a demarche, but with an open threat of war. On August 20th the German charge d'affaires in Madrid had to "make a remonstrance in the most emphatic terms" and state that "the German Government would make the Spanish Government responsible for all the consequences." At the same time the head of the strengthened German fleet in Spanish waters telegraphed to the head of the Spanish Government fleet, that from now on he would meet "crimes of this kind with force.'" Hitler's guns are directed towards Spain, and to-day already his "press-guns' are firing. The Voelkischer Beobachter declares that the situation is "very serious." The Angriff compares the crews of the Spanish warships with mad dogs. The final word is said, as usual, by the Berlin Boersen-Zeitung of the War Ministry of the Reich:—

> "In Spain Bolshevism is raging in its most ghastlv form. Almost hourly news of atrocities is received, which prove that it would be an insult to the beasts of the earth were one to describe the crimes of the Bolsheviks as bestial. The bands of Bolshevik murderers who have plunged the Spanish people into such terrible suffering have now become so arrogant that they have lost all fear of the flag of the Reich."

Two days after the official threats to the Spanish Government, the government of the Reich had the colossal impudence to "complain most sharply" to the government in Madrid "about the injurious and slanderous propaganda on the radio against Germans." It is well known that the German radio as well as the press has become exclusively the echo of the slaughterers of the Spanish people. When these tactics, and the practical help for the Spanish rebels are fittingly exposed, then the wire-pullers and instigators, the accomplices of Franco and Mola have the insolence to protest, and the Völkischer Beobachter comments on the announcement of the note of protest with the unmistakable threat:

> "If Moscow and Madrid are not capable of behaving like civilised and cultured states, this must be made clear to the Bolshevik Jews in another manner."

That was printed on August 22. Two days later Hitler demonstrated what he meant by doing something "in another manner." Exactly two weeks before the beginning of the Party Congress of the Nationalist Socialist Party there is carried out the new act of war preparation. This year too, Ley announces, "exactly as last year the fight against Bolshevism is to be the central task. Every speaker at this year's party congress, too, refers to our single-minded fight against Bolshevism.'"

These trumpet blasts against Bolshevism are to cause the walls of freedom throughout the whole world to tremble and fall. The iron heel of German fascism is to walk everywhere where Hitler is seeking to destroy the rights of peoples and to gain a foothold for himself. To this end every non-fascist regime is denounced as Bolshevik. The non-existent plans of aggression of other states serves as a pretext to divert the German workers from the defence of their rights to a better life in greater freedom, and to make them into victims of the imperialist thirst for power of the upper ten.

THE RED FLAG

REVISED 1940 VERSION

Tune: Either Maryland or The White Cockade

The Moscow flag is far from red;
'Twas once a crimson shade, 'tis said,
But now the German pact is made,
The Bolshies vow the red shall fade.

Chorus.

Then haul the scarlet standard down!
Within the pale let Nazis frown!
Tho" toilers flinch and thinkers fear,
We'll have no Red Flag flying here.

Strange sound; the Frenchman, in a daze;
The Nazi-German, in great amaze;
To Moscow tune: loud "heils" are sung
And Stalin swells the acclaiming tongue.

Red waved above our infant might,
When all around seemed dark as night;
It witnessed many a deed and vow,
So let us change its colour now.

Once, when with Western trade in view,
We twined it with Red, White, and Blue;
We held the scarlet standard back,
And made to hoist the Union Jack.

It suited then, the bureaucrats,
With double chins and white cravats,
In Eden's presence, loud to Sing:
The royal refrain, "God Save the King."

It suits to-day, the strong and base,
Whose thoughts are fixed on pelf and place,
To cower before the Fascists' frown,
And hurl the sacred emblem down.

With heads uncovered, swear we all
With Hitler we will play at ball;
For Stalin's gold gives us much vim,
So we'll forget our parting hymn.

HITLER'S ENGLISH LEAFLET, No. 922.

Who are the Rulers in Russia?

Main Part of a Speech by Alfred Rosenberg at the Nürnberg Party Congress "Honour."

[At the Opening Ceremony of the Party Congress in Nürnberg Alfred Rosenberg held a fundamental speech. The following statements of this speech prove that Soviet Government means nothing but Jewish Government.]

Of the many recollections we have of our times we can recall only one instance where a diplomat has had the courage to frankly call things by their right name. That diplomat was Lord d'Abernon. His recollections bear constant and repeated reference to the fact that in Russia it is the Jews that have forcibly taken over power and are forever busy consolidating their position.

Stalin, the Head of the Third International, is neither a Jew nor a Russian, but comes from Caucasia. His deputy, however, is his Father-in-law, a Jew named Lazarus Mosessohn Kaganowitsch who, by governmental decree, enjoys full rights and privileges, during the Dictator's absence. Kaganowitsch is to all intents ands purposes the supreme ruler, and he has seen to it that all official key positions in the police force, in the red army, the department of the interior, the ministry of foreign trade and in the foreign office have been filled by his Jewish cronies.

The department entrusted with the task of stamping out all traces of Russian nationalism was the Tscheka, that is, an Extraordinary Commission appointed for checking any form of counter-revolution. When, however, it was found that this blood-curdling name was no longer applicable even in Russia, the department was re-named GPU.—the Commisariat for Internal Affairs. At its head was the Jew Jagoda with Jakob Saulssohn Agranow as his deputy.

(Note: The Jew Jagoda—whose real hebraic name is Jehude—and his deputy were transferred to other posts at the end of September. Their successors are Heschoff and Moses Davidson Bärmann. The Publishers.)

The Official Security Service. Principal Administrative Officers.

Head of the Special Department: M. J. Gay . . . a Jew.

Head of the Industrial Dept.: L. G. Mironow . . . a Jew.

Head of the Foreign Dept.: Slutzkij . . . a Jew.

Head of the Transport Dept.: Schanin, Abraham Mosessohn . . . a Jew.

Head of the Anti-Religious Dept.: Joffe, Josaias Leosohn . . . a Jew. (Formerly Editor of an atheistic periodical.)

Head of the Military administration: Bjelskij, Leo Nahumsson . . . a Jew.

The Foreign and Domestic Security Service.

Principal Officer: B. J. Mogilskij . . . a Jew.

Concentration Camps and Deportation. Principal Administrative Officers.

Head of Central Administration: Bährmann, Jakob M. . . . a Jew. .

Deputy: Firin, Samuel Jakobsohn . . . a Jew.

Head of concentration and deportation camps in Soviet-Karelien, and Head of the "White Sea" forced-labour camps for political prisoners: Kogan, Samuel L. . . . a Jew.

Deputy Commissar for Internal Affairs and Chief of the GPU. in Soviet-Ukraine: Katznelsohn, S. B. . . . a Jew.

Head of concentration and deportation camps in Northern Russia: Finkelstein . . . a Jew.

In Charge of forced-labour camp on the Solowezkij Island "Slon": Serpuchowskij . . . a Jew.

Regional leaders in the Moscow district: Rapoport, Abrampolski, Fajwilowitsch, Schkljar, Selikman etc. . . . all Jews.

And that is only a small selection. But it suffices to show that the administration of the entire Soviet Russian internal polity is in the hands of over 98% of Jews.

This Commissariat for Internal Affairs is supported by a Commissariat for Domestic Trade, and according to the official "Iswestija" this consists of a committee of nearly all Jews. A few of their names are given below:

Weizer, Israel Jakobsohn. Peoples' Commissar for Domestic Trade . . . a Jew.

Lewensohn, M. A. Deputy for above . . . a Jew.

Aronstamm, Gregor Nahumsson. Head of State Commercial Survey Dept. . . . a Jew.

Beddeshskij, Samuel B. Head of the State Dept. for School Stationery requirements . . . a Jew.

Weschner, Lazarus Abrahamssohn. Head of the State Dept. for Fancy and Knitted Goods . . . a Jew.

Ganelin, Israel E. Director of the pig-breeding trust for the amalgamated Moscow Restaurants . . . a Jew.

Gittis, Israel Abrahamssohn. Head of the amalgamated Moscow Restaurants . . . a Jew.

Goldmann, David M. Head of the amalgamated Restaurants in the Don district . . . a Jew.

Gordon, Lazarus G. Director of industrial goods for the district of Moscow . . . a Jew.

Gumnitzkij, Tejfel Leossohn. Head of the domestic trade dept. for the district of Kalinin . . . a Jew.

Gurewitsch, Nachman Hirschssohn. Peoples' Commissar for Domestic trade in White Russia . . . a Jew.

Guchmann, Salomon Isaaksohn. Director of the "Mostorg" . . . a Jew.

Davidsohn, Benjamin A. Administrative chief of local auctions . . . a Jew.

Salinskij, Moses Isaakssohn. Peoples' Commissar for Domestic Trade in the Tartar Republic . . . a Jew.

Selenskij, Isaak Abrahamssohn. Chairman of Council of the Central Cooperative Society of the UdSSR. and RSFSR. . . . a Jew.

Süssmann, G. A. Head of Domestic Trade in the Odessa district . . . a Jew.

Kaganowitsch, Leo Nahumssohn. Head of the Kiew Dept. of the "Sojusprodmag" . . . a Jew.

Kremin, Lazarus Isaakssohn. Director of White Russian Foodstuff Supply . . . a Jew.

Nodel, Wolf Abrahamssohn. Editor of "Sowjetskaja Torgowija" . . . a Jew.

Smorgonskij, Efim Mosessohn. Head of the Baku Domestic Trade Agency . . . a Jew.

Chalamejser, H. L. Director in Rostow-on-the-Don of City Industrial Goods Trade . . . a Jew.

Schinkarewskij, Nahum J. Director of State Retail Dept. in Overseas products . . . a Jew.

Epstein, Meier Samuelssohn. Head of the Moscow Domestic Trade Dept. . . . a Jew.

All domestic trade is controlled by a committee with 99% Jews in it. The Soviet newspapers "Sa Industrialisaziju" of April 20, 1935 (No. 92) and "Iswestija" of June 11, 1936 (No. 135) publish the names of this Committee and the respective departments allotted to them and I mention only a few of them below:

Kaganowitsch, Michael Mosessohn. Deputy Peoples' Commissar for the heavy industries. Vice-Chairman of the Advisory Committee and Head of the Central Committee for Aircraft construction . . . a Jew.

Ruchimowitsch, M. L. Deputy Peoples' Commissar for the heavy industries and Vice-Chairman of Committee . . . a Jew.

Gurewitsch, A. D. Head of the Central Administration for the Metallurgical Industry . . . a Jew.

Kagan, J. B. Head of the Central Administration for Coal Industry . . . a Jew.

Israilowitsch, A. J. Head of the Central Administration for Gas Industry . . . a Jew.

Ginsburg, S. S. Head of the Central Administration for Building Trades . . . a Jew.

Galperin, E. J. Head of the Nitrogen Industry . . . a Jew.

Bitker, G. S. Head of the Central Administration for the Rubber Industry . . . a Jew.

Buskin, D. A. Director of the Tscheljabinsker tractor factory . . . a Jew.

Fuschmann, A. M. Head of the Central Administration for Carriage Building . . . a Jew.

Alperowitsch, E. M. Dept. Head for Heavy Industries at the Peoples' Commissariat . . . a Jew.

Fainberg, W. G. Head of the Central Administration for Mining Machinery . . . a Jew.

Kagan, B. D. Head of the "Prodmaschina" Trust . . . a Jew.

Frumkin, M. L. Head of the "Sojuschimplastmass' chemical trust . . . a Jew.

Bierenzweig, M. B. Dept. Head of the Foreign section for heavy industries in the Peoples' Commissariat . . . a Jew.

Israilowitsch, E. J. Head of the Central Administration for agricultural machinery industry . . . a Jew.

Sluzkij, S. B. Head of the Aserbejdshanisch Mineral oil Syndicate . . . a Jew.

Rosenojer, S. L. Head of the mineral oil Trust and Gas works in Grosnyj . . . a Jew.

Falkowitsch, S. J. Head of the "Ordshonikidse" Engineering Works . . . a Jew.

Schejmann, J. B. Director of the Woroschilowgrad locomotive factory . . . a Jew.

Izchaken, Josef Isaakssohn, Director of the Charkow Turbo-Generator Factory . . . a Jew.

Fränkel, A. M. Technical Director of Dnjeproppetrowsker Aluminium Syndicate . . . a Jew.

Slotschewskij, Ilja Jesaiassohn. Works Director of the Makeewsker Metallurgical Works . . . a Jew.

Granberg, Lpihm Isaakssohn. Works Director at the "Dsershinskij" Metallurgical Works . . . a Jew.

Rawikowitsch, Elim Mosessohn. Works Manager of the Tula Arsenal . . . a Jew.

In the armaments industry the percentage of Jews in key positions also ranges between 95 and 98%, and the same applies to the Commissariat for Food.

Belenkij, Markus Natanssohn. Deputy Peoples' Commissar for Food . . . a Jew.

Dukor, Hirsch Josefssohn. Head of the Finance Dept. . . . a Jew.

Schatschan, Abrahamssohn. Head of the Planning Dept. . . . a Jew.

Strikowskij, Leo Saulssohn. Head of the Central Administration for Meat Trade . . . a Jew.

Gieber, B. W. Head of the Central Administration for Butter trade . . . a Jew.

Bronstein, G. A. Head of the Central Administration for Milk Supply . . . a Jew.

Margoiln, G. S. Head of the Central Administration for Margarine Supply . . . a Jew.

Glinskij, Abraham Lazarussohn. Alcohol and Spirit Industry . . . a Jew.

Sawodnik, J. S. Head of the Central Administration for Macaroni Industry . . . a Jew.

Kissin, Abraham Ananjassohn. Head of the Central Administration Beer Yeast Industry . . . a Jew.

Simin, Miron Isaakssohn. Official representative of the Food Commissariat for the Leningrad district . . . a Jew.

Nikolajewskij, Leo Salomonssohn. Official representative of the Food Commissariat for the Ukraine . . . a Jew.

Breitmann, Alexander Salomonssohn. Head of the Ukraine Tinned Food Trust . . . a Jew.

According to the official "Iswestija" of May 8, 1936, the Commissariat for Foreign Trade appointed an Advisory Committee. This Committee was composed of 34 Jews.

Generally speaking, Jews, by reason of their racial singularity, are seldom to be found in the ranks of an army. Hence there are not many officers or soldiers in the Red Army. The Soviet Government has, however, seen to it that Russian national instincts in the Red Army are very sharply watched over by Jewish spies. For this purpose, the so-called political administration of Red workers and farmers' army was formed—which is nothing less than a purely Jewish instrument. All military leaders have a Jewish spy attached to their staff who, at a moment's notice, is ready to hand over any officer to the murderous Jewish GPU. At the head of this political branch of the Red Army is the Jew Jankel Gamarnik who hails from Kiew. On February 7, 1936, the Jew Rosonowski was appointed to the position of Attorney-General for the Soviet Union with a similar function in the Red Army.

It goes without saying of course, that nearly all Bolshevik Ambassadors are also Jews. But here and there one had to conveniently make exceptions to suit conditions in the one or other country. Without mentioning names, we are nevertheless in a position to state that Soviet Russian foreign representatives total 7 Russians, 3 Armenians and 16 Jews.

At the head of this foreign department there is the well-known Foreign Commissar the Jew Litwinow, whose real name is Walach Finkelstein. This is the self-same gentleman who a few years ago was deported from London on account of some shady work. One of the triumphs of world Jewry was when this deported Jew was called to London in 1936 in order to assist in formulating a verdict on Germany's so-called violation of Treaties consequent upon the re-occupation of the Rhineland zone after the announcement of the French-Soviet military alliance.

The fate of over 160 million Russians and others of the Soviet Union lies in the hands of the Jews. The Bolshevik goal is the creation of Jewish world dominance along present-day Soviet Russian lines. Europe and Western civilization are nowadays once again the topics of conversation. But a bitter life and death struggle against this civilization has been announced by Moscow.

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

The eleventh Duke of Bedford died at his home, Woburn Abbey, on August 27. He was aged 82. The twelfth Duke of Bedford is well known as the Marquess of Tavistock, because of his peace activities. In view of the attacks made upon him in certain papers, it is only just to point out that the Duke of Bedford has been opposed to war for the past 20 years. His peace activities, therefore, did not arise from any sympathy with Fascism, but from his horror at the barbarism of war. Actually, he holds Christian pacifist ideas. His ancestor, at the time of the war on revolutionary France, adopted a similar attitude and supported Bishop Watson's opposition to war in the House of Lords.

PHILIP BOYLE

Philip Boyle was released from Barlinnie Prison on September 19, and returned to Maryhill Barracks. All military charges have been dropped against him, pending the hearing of his case by the Appellate Tribunal in Edinburgh.

EDITOR'S PERSONAL APPEAL

This was an appeal for £166 13s. 3d. to cover losses on The Word prior to Christmas, 1939, and for the Free Speech case in Hyde Park. The total acknowledged up to August was £76 17s. 7d. This left £89 15s. 8d. to come. Since then we have received £6 7s. 3d. This leaves £83 8s. 5d. to come. We ask comrades to rally this amount at once.

During the past year, losses on the paper and pamphlets have been very heavy. Our work can continue only if every comrade does his bit. If you cannot send a donation, why not take a dozen or so copies at trade rates? Sell them to your friends or at your branch.

SOCIALIST GOSSIP

Pioneers of Anti-Parliamentarism, once it is widely circulated, will arouse many diverse memories in different places. The essays on William Morris will appeal to many Socialist survivors in Hammersmith. In Glasgow it will be impossible to think of Morris without recalling Shaw Maxwell, who counted Morris, Kropotkin, and Eleanor Marx Aveling among his intimates.

Glasgow Art Galleries are a standing monument to Shaw Maxwell's work on the Town Council and they have been hurled at Anti-Parliamentarians as a concrete argument in defence of "Municipal Socialism." We have thrown back the slums which Municipal Socialism has left to the cares of complacent Sheriff-court hunting factors.

Shaw Maxwell was President, for a time, of the famous Democratic Club. He founded the Seaman's Gazette and the People's Paper. The latter was edited for a time by T. Marlowe, who progressed (sic) to the Daily Mail. Marlowe married a daughter of the famous Morrison Davidson, who played a part in the history of Reynold's Newspaper. Davidson is mentioned in Dogmas Discarded, in connection with Saladin and the Agnostic Journal. He introduced us to many studies, including the activity of Winstanley The Digger.

When Shaw Maxwell was elected first National Secretary of the I.L.P., Bernard Shaw wrote of him:—

"Shaw Maxwell will make a good, but not a brilliant, secretary. He has too much Maxwell and too little Shaw about him for that!

Another person whose career is depicted in Pioneers is Malatesta, who died in June 22, 1932. "Mad Malatesta" was the name they used to apply to him, because he renounced a fortune and status as a Count of Naples to lead a workers' revolt. Mad again, because when power could have been had, he refused it, and so died in poverty and persecution. Mussolini—who paid unwanted tribute to Malatesta on his return to Italy from exile—smashed Malatesta's organisation and destroyed his newspaper, Umanita Nuova.

A Reynolds' correspondent recalled interviewing Malatesta, once in exile in Soho, and again when the Anarchist was in power and might have become supreme, in Milan. On each occasion Malatesta went out of his way to convince the correspondent that he was a "harmless pacifist." Which was hardly true.

"What of the future of Anarchism?" the correspondent asked him in 1920, when Malatesta was Northern Italy's "Man of Iron."

"We may have a successful revolt—or we may be heading for the scaffold," he replied. As regards himself, neither prophecy came true.

When the Reynolds' correspondent went to Milan to interview Malatesta in 1920, there was an hotel strike in the city, and the "Royal Guard" — forerunners of the Fascisti — were "protecting" all the staffless hotels and cafes. Tourists could not procure food, and were warned to pass on to Venice or Turin.

"Hungry?" Malatesta asked with a twinkle in his eye. "Yes, very!" the correspondent answered. "Then come with me," said the Anarchist leader. He took the capitalist journalist to the "Anarchists' Kitchen"—a spacious cellar in which all the striking chefs were "keeping their hand in" for the benefit of the proletariat.

Reynolds' correspondent remained in Milan throughout the dispute. He confessed years later that it was the gastronomical thrill of his life.

In 1919, Malatesta, whom Trotsky classed with the Anti-Parliamentary cretins, uttered one very good prophecy for a man who was forced to blunder thrugh life—according to the so-called scientific Socialists, Leninists, Trotskyists, and Stalinists—without the beaconlight of Marxism to light his path. He wrote words of simple wisdom that meant nothing to Trotsky at the time but ought to have been pondered by him later. Avowed Malatesta when Trotsky was at the top of the Soviet heap:—

"Lenin, Trotsky and their companions are certainly sincere revolutionists—as they understand the revolution, and they will not betray it, but they prepare governmental methods that will serve those that will come, who will profit from the revolution and kill it. They will be the first victims of their own method, and with them I fear will fall the revolution. And history will repeat itself, mutatis mutandis: it was the dictatorship of Robespierre that brought Robespierre to the guillotine and prepared the way for Napoleon."

David Nicoll is mentioned in Dogmas Discarded (Part II.) and also in Pioneers. His name will recall to many the story of the Commonweal, and his indictment of H. B. Samuels, who was afterwards connected with the National Secular Society, as an alleged police-agent, who was the cause of driving William Morris out of the Socialist League.

Concerning the matter published in The Commonweal, after he had given up the editorship, Morris wrote:—

"Kelmscott House, Upper Hall, Hammersmith,
"July 12th, 1890.

"My Dear Nicoll,—I have been looking at this week's Commonweal, and I must say I think you are going too far—at any rate, further than I can allow you. You really must put the curb on Samuels' blatant folly, or you will force me to withdraw all support. I never bargained for this sort of thing when I gave up editorship.

"I look upon you as a sensible and friendly fellow, and I am sure you will take it in a friendly spirit as it is meant; for I feel it is only fair to give you warning of any dissatisfaction I may have.

"Please understand that this is meant to be quite private; and do your best not to drive me off. For I assure you it would be the greatest grief to me if I had to dissociate myself from men who have been my friends for so long and whom I believe to be at bottom thoroughly good fellows.

"I shall be at Kelmscott, Lechdale, till next Friday, and will send you the new batch of News from Nowhere so that it shall reach you on Friday morning at the latest.—Yours fraternally,

"William Morris."

"I send the proofs on to Blundell."

The study in Pioneers of Daniel De Leon is simple and sympathetic. A much more critical and destructive essay might have been written from the Anti-Parliamentary viewpoint. It is no argument against De Leon's worth, but it does tell against the Marxist Grandfather Knowalls, to note that De Leon made no impression on Engels. When Lucien Sanial and De Leon visited Engels in England, Engels wrote to a friend in the United States very simply: "They did not impress me."

De Leon is supposed to have been, in his own person, the enemy of all reformist compromise. But the famous I.W.W. split at Chicago, when the Direct Actionists captured the organisation and De Leon formed the political clause, Detroit section, occurred because of De Leon's personal reformism. It is supposed generally that the split occurred because some delegates rejected the "action on the political and industrial planes" clause. This rejection did not precede but followed the withdrawal of De Leon.

The credentials committee of the I.W.W. convention refused to sit De Leon because he was a member of, and a delegate from, a craft local (the clerical workers) and had refused consistently to transfer to an industrial union local. De Leon explained that this was not just a question of expediency—preference for representing a numerically stronger local—but of principle, i.e., that, according to De Leon, the organisation of industrial unions should commence with the organisation of craft locals. De Leon's attitude turned many of his supporters against him. Tom Powers, a delegate from New England, said: "No one but De Leon himself could convince me that De Leon does not understand industrial unionism—but he has done it."

WALTER STRICKLAND'S WANDERINGS

(Concluded from page 20.)

Strickland subscribed as handsomely as his funds permitted to the striker's cause—at that time he was living on a small allowance from his father and he pledged a part of it to raise more money for the strikers. He also wrote a further bitterly sarcastic poem entitled "An Ode in Praise of Lead." The introductory explanation to this poem says: "Showing its enormous superiority to bread as a staple article of food of the common people, and its proper application for that purpose." The theme of this poem may be judged from the following two verses:

"Mob starving, desperate, fudge!
That howl for bread, sirs!
Brave soldiers never budge,
But give 'em lead, sirs!

"Lead's the best panacea
For poor men's ills;
And bullets the least dear
Most drastic pills."

In 1913 a London evening paper, recalling Strickland's comments on the Milan strike, referred to him as tending to fish in troubled waters, getting into trouble with most civilised governments. Strickland wrote from Cordova, Spain, on February 25 of that year questioning the right of governments that believed in war and firing on strikers to be deemed civilised, and added: "I am at a loss to understand your metaphor. To the best of my poor ability I have stood up for freedom, fair-play, justice and good sense, but nothing else."

At the time of the Milan strike Strickland had returned to Italy after two years travel through the Slav countries, excepting Russia. At the time of the attempted assassination of King Humbert in 1897, Strickland was staying at a small inn at Pecs or Funfkirchen, in Hungary, "when a Wendish road contractor from Carniola turned up, a man of about sixty, with a complication of lung diseases and religion." Strickland had the misfortune to be obliged to sleep, or rather not sleep, in the same room, which was little better than a cell, with this strange Slav religionist. The Wend rejoiced at the attempt on Humbert's life and declared it was the result of the activity of Garibaldi and the war on the Pope. "There, see!" he exclaimed, "your precious house of Savoy relied upon revolution and infidelity to drive out our Holy Roman Emperor, and now he is menaced by the minister he himself raised. It serves him right and is a judgment from God."

Strickland felt obliged to defend the house of Savoy in this matter, only to reach Italy and find in the condition of the miners and the workers generally some excuse for the protests of the Anarchists.

WORLD TRAVELS BEGAN.

In 1900 Strickland commenced his world travels. He went to Australasia and the following year entered on the first of his two distinct tropical tours. From Sydney, New South Wales, in the middle of October, 1901, he went to Wellington, New Zealand, and arrived on December 6 of that year. Everywhere he wrote lengthy letters, made notes on local conditions or composed sarcastic poems describing the conditions of people. More and more he departed from his ideas of British Imperialism and his faith in the white man's outlook. He traversed the East Coast of Australia and visited Thursday Island, which owes its name to the fact that Captain Cook discovered it on a Thursday. From there he travelled in a Dutch ship to Soerbaya which he reached in November, 1903. He returned to Naples from Ceylon on April 14, 1904.

After a few months' stay in Europe, where he wrote a number of essays in defence of Free-thought and of Socialism, and prepared a satirical play on dictatorship, with Czarist Russia as the background, Sir Walter travelled by the North German Lloyd line to Port Said and reached Ceylon on December 19 of that year. He spent some months in Ceylon and then reached Singapore. From there he travelled to Soerbaya, and from the latter place he went by steamer to Timor Koupang at the end of June, 1905. His stay in these places lasted two and a half months, during which time he interested himself in the native conditions.

AN INCIDENT IN SUMBA.

His stay in Sumba caused him to write a really marvellous book describing the native conditions on that island. Unfortunately his objection to a certain incident he witnessed made him describe an occurrence in which an English official played a not very dignified part whilst on a visit to Australia. Actually Sir Walter traced the political history of the official in question and linked up the happening in Sumba with the behaviour of the man in Australia.

His censure was severe and there can be no doubt that the incident was a disgraceful one. There was no actual necessity to record it and it was indeed open to the criticism of being obscene. Sir Walter took the view that it had happened, that it should be noted, and that it should be condemned. The British authorities took the view that it was indecent and that the book containing it must be destroyed.

Strickland produced an edition of 10,000 copies many years later. The exact date of publication was 1927. He sent this work to me in Glasgow and it was siezed by the Customs and destroyed. The account to which objection was taken occupied a single page. The book itself was nearly 600 pages. It seems absurd that a valuable book of travel should be completely destroyed because of one page that could have been deleted. There may have been some fault on the part of the author, but complete destruction without the opportunity of preserving a copy, argues, to my mind, irresponsible vandalism on the part of those in authority.

Strickland proceeded from Sumba to Batavia at the end of September, 1905. During his stay in the Dutch East Indies he made a study of spiders and wrote several essays on the faculty of a certain spider to change the colour of its eyes when in danger. He was proud of the fact that he was of Dutch extraction, and that he was descended directly, on his mother's side, from the Benticks who came over to England with William of Orange in 1688.

This fact gives a Dutch bias to all his writings on colonial questions. This bias found a place in the book he wrote entitled "Pagans and Christians," or "The Black Spot in the East." This consisted of an open letter to Lady Arthur Somerset and was written in 1905, during a period of two years that the writer spent almost exclusively with Asiatics and Eurasians, in Ceylon, the Straits Settlement and Southern India. Sneering at the Anglo-Saxon domination of native races, but admitting that it was far superior to German domination, Strickland took for his motto the following refrain:

"The Lords of Asia bowed the head
In haughty, proud disdain;
They let the ribald hosts go by,
Then plunged in thought again."

He addressed himself to the English people in the terms of a sentence from Byron's "Don Juan"—"Believe me, you are not a virtuous nation." He adopted Bishop Heber's hymn:

"What though the spicy breezes
Blow soft o'er Ceylon's isle,
Where all the prospect pleases,
And only man is vile."

By man Strickland meant of course the English tea planter of Ceylon. He made great play of the popular song of the English tea-planters when dealing with the history of the Tamil:

"Take up the white man's burden!
Now things are at a flush;
Crimp all your neighbour's coolies
To meet the glorious rush;
Keep the black devils at it,
Like a swarm of busy bees;
While you rake in the guineas
For your high-scented teas!

A CRITIC OF COLONISATION.

In essence Strickland's conclusion was, as a result of his travels, that the Anglo-Saxon was an excellent coloniser, devoid mostly of personal brutality, but ruthless in his exploitation and with no sense of justice towards native races as races. At first he was inclined to rank the Dutch Imperialists higher but subsequently placed them in the same category. The German he condemned as being stupid and inefficient as a coloniser and personally given to a love of individual brutality. Towards the end of his life, having settled in the Dutch East Indies, he developed a great understanding of what he termed the terror and struggle for freedom in Indonesia. He pointed out that the Imperial importance which Holland enjoyed as a State was due chiefly to its possession of the Indoesian colonies which were sixty-four times as big as the Mother Country and had at the time he wrote seven times the inhabitants.

Dutch rule in India was possible only by monstrous economic exploitation and brutal political suppression. The agricultural concerns or plantations made profits of from 30 to 50 per cent. And the Dutch stay-at-home Imperialist shared hundreds of millions of florins every year from the exploitation of native workers who received no more than fifty Dutch cents per day. In the Dutch Indies strikes, meetings and associations were suppressed, the Press was under a severe censorship. At first Strickland would not face the extent to which the moral interests of the people had been neglected, in addition to their material interests. His latter views, however, were that in the course of 300 years, under the cultural influence of the Dutch colonial rulers, illiteracy had increased from 50 to 90 per cent.

It is not necessary to deal with the rebellions in Sumatra and Java which were violently suppressed. Maxim guns were fired upon unarmed crowds and so many prisoners were arrested that the Dutch Minister for the Colonies had to confess that the courts were overburdened with work and could not administer individual justice. Hundreds of Indoesians were banished to the marshy uninhabited islands of Obendigul of New Guinea, to die of fever.

Early in 1906 Strickland proceeded to Singapore and from there visited Penang, Rangoon, and the Andamans, where he enquired into the penal conditions. He published an excellent monograph on these conditions and made a bold protest in defence of the Indian political prisoners. This work is far too long in detail to quote in the present memoir. Also the fierceness of the writer's protest does not permit of easy summary in an article such as the present. His studies in the Andamans brought him to December 1905. Requested to leave the island, he returned to Rangoon, and on March 28, 1907, we find him at Singapore where he stayed some months. His next visit was to Ceylon. He remained there to February, 1908, and plunged into a study of Buddhism and the local economic conditions. He wrote several essays and poems on Buddhism, contrasting it against Christianity, and concluding that Buddhism was a nobler and more dignified religious system. He next visited Travancore and stayed there nine months. He was accused of too much sympathy with the natives and with Indian nationalism. In October he returned to Ceylon and after a brief stay took the steamer to Naples. From here he returned to England on the death of his father and assumed the title.

ATTACKS ON BLOOD SPORTS.

His father, Sir Charles William Strickland, the eighth baronet, was ninety-one years old when he died. He celebrated his ninetieth birthday on the hunting field—a fact that his son recalled with horror in after years, when he published essay after essay attacking the blood sports. Sir Charles Strickland left estate of a gross value of £332,313 with net personality of £14,112. He left his son roughly about 21,000 acres of land to administer in Yorkshire. This event marks an important stage in Sir Walter Strickland's life. Down to this time he was partly dependent upon his father's bounty and was restricted in his movements. He was now able to sell all the estate of which he had control, to arrange for an annual income from the trustees from the balance in which his rights had been compromised and to return to the Continent.

SOLD HILDENLEY ESTATE.

He spent about three weeks in Yorkshire in order to attend the 8th Baronet's funeral and then decided to sell the Hildenley estate—the only one which being strictly entailed by his grandfather, came into his possession—remove every scrap of property to the Continent and for the future to have as little as possible to do with England and its people. Prior to 1890, as he recalled at this time, he had resided a good deal in London and considered London and Cambridge to be two of the least dreary and objectionable places in England.

In 1912 he endeavoured to obtain a passport in order to visit China. There is some confusion as to what exactly occurred at this time. Sir Walter held a passport, but some discussion arose between the Foreign Office, the British Consul at Marseilles and himself as to the validity of this passport. In any case he wished it to be extended to China and this request was refused. The British Government declared that he was in too close an association with exiled Chinese Republicans. This refusal and the fact that his writings had been suppressed in India by the Bombay Presidency led to his disappearance. He termed this sudden unexpected vanishing his "temporary eclipse." During this period he proceeded to Spain and from there went to the United States, Mexico, Japan and China. He subsequently returned to Europe and after a further tour of the world settled at Buitenzorg some time in 1933.

JOHN MACLEAN

Socialist Opinion, the monthly Bulletin of the Southampton I.L.P., in its issue for April 1940, published a review of the John MacLean pamphlet from the pen of our I.L.P. comrade, Albert McCarthy. He writes in part:—

"To those socialists who, watching the treacherous antics of the present leaders of the Labour Party, feel despondent of ever attaining the objects which they desire, a new pamphlet which I have just received will come as a tonic. . . .

"John Maclean is not well known outside of Scotland. His untimely death in 1923 robbed the Socialist Movement of one of its greatest men. A man intellectually the superior of all the present bombastic Labour Fakirs and Communist Party hacks.

"Maclean entered the Socialist Movement at an early age. Not until the last War however, did he become well known. To quote the pamphlet 'he unfurled the Red Flag, rather than kept it flying.' His life, from 1916 onwards is a tale of tremendous courage and Socialist integrity. He was in, and out, of jail from then until the end of his life. Nevertheless, it was not possible to imprison his spirit, and one feels sorrow, not for Maclean, but for the society which could possess the stupidity to imagine that they could stop a man of Maclean's mental vision from carrying on the duty of preaching the emancipation of the working-class.

"At the end of the pamphlet there is a word for word account of Maclean's historic speech from the dock in Edinburgh in 1918. . . .

"In 1923, worn out by his tremendous efforts, John Maclean passed away. . . .

"There is no doubt that Guy Aldred has done a tremendous service by producing this pamphlet. In some ways these two men are not unlike one another. Both are greatly underestimated in the working-class cause. They have occupied isolated positions. I feel that their efforts will one day be rewarded, and they will rank with all other heroes of the Class Struggle.

"I should certainly advise all socialists who retain any vestige of independent thought to send for this pamphlet and note its contents very thoroughly."

HITLER'S ENGLISH LEAFLET, No. 972.

World Enemy No. I—Bolshevism

A brief statement of sober facts relating to Bolshevism.

The swearing-in of soldiers for the defence of their country is a custom common to all countries. Soviet Russia, however, is the exception. In that country, every Soviet soldier has to swear an oath as follows:

"Before the working classes of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics and the whole world I swear that I will spare neither effort nor my own life in my endeavour to advance the cause of socialism and the brotherhood of all nations."

These words clearly show that the Russian army possesses an international function when compared with that work which is allotted to the armies of other nations. By means of their army the Soviet rulers are desirous of forcing their political world revolutionary creed on the nations of the world.

Bolshevism Unmasked.

The London "Times" reported on January 10, 1936: "The exclusive Comintern. The pretence of the Soviet Government that the Comintern is a body completely beyond the range of its influence and authority is a masterpiece either of make-belief or audacity . . ."

How Youth is poisoned by Bolshevism.

"La Plata" reported in September 1936: "When the police visited the school run by the Jew Isaac Schlos they found 35 children being taught in Yiddish by an Argentine lady teacher although this teacher only held the Argentine teachers certificate. The class room maps all emphasized the importance and the power of the Soviet Republics in various territories. The school books furnished proof that the children were being taught the manufacture of gunpowder and other explosives. Various pamphlets were also discovered which gave instruction in the use of firearms. The Jewish director of the school had decamped at a convenient moment."

Lecture Courses for Indian Students in Moscow.

In April 1937, Mr. R. A. Butler, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, India Office, reported in the House of Commons that free tuition was available for Indian students at Moscow universities provided that these students returned to India as bolshevik recruiters and agitated against Great Britain.

Moscow Agitation Unmasked.

In September 1936 the Belgian newspaper "Nation Belge" came into possession of the rules of conduct issued by Moscow to the Belgian Communist party to assist them in their struggle. Moscow declared that the Belgian Communist party had completely understood that instead of it being a case of a purely commercial strike the main aim was the creation of a "confused and gloomy state of affairs" which would assist in establishing in Belgium that system known as "Front Populaire."

In an article entitled "Mendacious Justice" ("Uj Magyarsag," March 1937), Dr. Franz Rajniss, the Hungarian member of parliament, sharply criticises Soviet Russia and Jewry. Both were striving with all their might to oppose a peaceful settlement and understanding between the great nations in Western Europe.

Three months before the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War, the important Spanish newspaper "A B C" declared: If the Powers in Western Europe were not blind they would not hesitate to sign the pact of non-aggression suggested by Germany, a pact which guarantees the peace of Europe for a period of 25 years. But it was obvious that the "pacifists" in Geneva preferred to throw themselves into the arms of Stalin and set the world ablaze rather than be willing to stifle their hatred of Hitler and fascism.

Moscow's Instructions to Vienna Communists.

The Vienna paper "Der Heimatschützer" reported in September 1936: "Secret instructions have been issued by Moscow to their agents in Austria to the effect that demands incapable of being met should be made in industrial circles particularly for the lower middle class, the small farmers, and small traders, so that in this way a state of general dissatisfaction and unrest is brought about . . ."

In October 1936, eleven Soviet agents including one woman were arrested in Vienna. They all frankly admitted to the police that they were in the service of the Soviet Union. All of them were in possession of forged passports of various countries. The passports had all been issued by one central bureau.

Red Acts of Sabotage in the British Navy.

Among the reported acts of sabotage in the British navy, the following were quoted by the responsible minister in the House of Commons in January 1937:

Sand and brass filings were thrown into the engines of a man-of-war whilst in dry dock.

A steel nut was found in the ventilation engine engine and rigging ropes were cut on the fleet tender "Oleander" in Devonport.

Foreign substances were discovered in the engines of the submarine "Oberon." A bolt had been removed from a firing cable on the battle ship "Royal Oak." The damage was only discovered with great difficulty.

A short-circuit took place on the cruiser "Cumberland" due to a needle having been driven into a power cable.

Threats of Armed Force.

At a large public meeting of communists in Prague, Deputy Sverma declared that it was the object and aim of communism to fight German fascism and that this had to be done in two ways. Firstly by means of illegal revolutionary preparation for class-warfare in Germany and secondly, the question of making arrangements for the work of fighting German fascism by means of armed force in the event of war.

Russia Finances French Communists.

On March 22, 1937, Deputy Doriot, the Chairman of the French Peoples' Party stated to French Press representatives that he could prove by means of 150 witnesses that the French communist party had received about 250 million francs from Moscow since 1920.

France in the Service of Moscow.

Jacques Bardoux, the French author, issued a brochure in April 1937 in which he quoted the following words of M. Litwinow, the Russian Foreign Commissar, addressed to a radical-socialist senator:

"If a Cabinet assumed power with the intention of coming to an agreement with Germany, then we would at once allow a radical strike and a revolution to break out."

Bolshevik Agitation in the U.S.A.

During the sham court proceedings in April 1937 in Mexico City, Trotsky declared that the whole of the bolshevik propaganda of the communist party in the United States was directed by the GPU. from Moscow. Every individual agent regularly receives his instructions from the Moscow GPU. central bureau.

Bolshevik Agitators in Poland.

According to a report dated April 24, 1937 from Warsaw, the police authorities there arrested a Jewess who was acting as courier between Moscow and the various offices of the communist party in Warsaw. The police were also able to locate and remove the whole of the staff entrusted with the work of organizing the communist May Day celebrations. These officials had also been furnished with full powers of action by Moscow.

Bolshevik Conspiracies in Argentina.

In April 1936 the police in Argentina were able to track down an extensive bolshevik conspiracy against the state. Twenty communist leaders were arrested and a search among their household effects revealed large quantities of bombs, hand grenades, revolvers and ammunition.

The house of the Jew Dr. Bunge was searched in Buenos Aires during the course of a party that was being given to raise funds for the Red cause. A list was found containing the names of those who were to be held as hostages the moment the revolution broke out. Eighty per cent. of those arrested were Jews.

Moscow's Hand in Spain.

The Paris "Matin" made the following revelation on March 23, 1936: At a special session of the Comintern on February 27, 1936, it was decided to send two delegates to Spain, one of whom was Bela Khun, formerly President of the Hungarian Republic. A sum of one million pesetos was voted to cover initial expenses and the preliminary work of stirring-up revolutionary disorders. Among the instructions issued to Spanish communists were the following:

Immediate expropriation of large estates, state acquisition of all banks, mines, factories and railways.

The formation of a revolutionary native government in Morocco with instructions to bring about a similar status in the French North African possessions.

The organisation of terror and the creation of Red guards. Total destruction by fire of all churches and monasteries throughout Spain.

The arrest of all bourgeois journalists. The formation of a Red army and a campaign against "fascist" Portugal.

The System of Hostage Lists.

Shortly after Adolf Hitler acquired power in Germany several lists of hostages were found, notably in Andreasberg and Clausthal in the Harz district. The one list contained the names of 70 and the other 120 hostages. Both lists bore the following instruction:

"Arrest immediately and shoot on the Market Square in the presence of all citizens. Anyone absent at these executions must be fetched by force."

Early in 1937, "Echo de Paris," the organ of the French General Staff, revealed how the French communist party had been busy organising the revolution in Spain since April 1936. Of the 30 sets of instructions given to the Spanish Red forces the following are quoted:

One and all, from private to officers of high rank, must be classified in one of the following categories: (a) Enemy, (b) Neutral, (c) friendly disposed, (d) Supporter. In the event of a rising, those under heading "Enemy" must be shot at once and hostile politicians and capitalists taken into protective custody. Capitalists must be made to furnish balance sheets. The greatest radius of action for individual detachments must be assured so as to guarantee independent action unhampered by any feeling of sentiment.

The eight existing offices of the Tscheka in Madrid are authorized to carry out executions without any preliminary trial. Jewish emigres from Germany are attached to these offices as assessors. It has been estimated that more than 50,000 people have been murdered in Madrid between July 18 and October 1936.

The Murder of Eleven Bishops and 16,750 Priests.

The following report was published by the "Osservatore Romano" in February 1937: The evidence received by the Pope proves that in Spain no less than 11 bishops and 16,750 priests have been murdered by the Bolsheviks.

Bolsheviks Sell Spanish Gold and Art Treasures.

A report issued on December 18, 1936 states: The vaults of the National Bank were forcibly broken open by the Bolsheviks with the aid of oxy-acetylene apparatus. Eight detachments were employed for a fortnight in the work of plunder. Gold and silver were robbed from all households. The loot had to be bundled together in order to make room for more in the transport vans.

The "Nationale Dagblatt" in Holland reported in its issue dated November 17, 1936: A great number of the jewels robbed by the Spanish bolshevik government from monasteries, museums and private owners and sent abroad—chiefly to Soviet Russia—has now been sold in Antwerp, Paris and London.

Bolshevik Child-Stealing in Spain.

According to "Arriba Espana" another 4000 children were to be forcibly abducted and sent to Soviet Russia early in 1937. In a public statement, the bolshevik General Miagas declared inter alia: "I shall take strong measures against those parents who attempt to prevent us from removing their children into "safe-keeping." The children are the property of the State whose legitimate representatives are the Committees of Defence and they therefore are the best able to judge what has to be done with these children."

In October 1936, the Central Council of the Soviet Anti-God Society declared: "Three thousand Spanish children are to be converted in suitable educational establishments into pioneers and propagandists of the anti-God movement. Largo Caballero is appointed an honorary member of the society"

Increase in Anti-God Propaganda.

In a further appeal issued by the above-named society it is stated: "We want to reduce all churches throughout the world into a single mighty sea of flame."

The Coming Carnage in France.

In its issue dated July 23, 1936, the Jewish Paris newspaper "Haint" wrote: "The Spanish communists have permitted their enemies to make a counter-revolution. Against this, all enemies in Soviet Russia are mercilessly executed, that is to say, they are no longer able to take counter measures. The French Jew will take the Soviet Republic as an example.

Theistic Church, opposed to my views, loyally stood by me personally; the late Sir Walter Strickland wrote me from France, seeking friendship on my release from prison and offering employment; but George Lansbury, pledging my friend, Rose Witcop, to secrecy, demanded regular reports of her situation, and contributed to the domestic struggle.

George Lansbury, during my 12 months' imprisonment, made a secret contribution to home of just over £100. He gave this to Rose Witcop on condition that it was not acknowledged. He actually did good by stealth and blushed to have it known.

Later, when he was in the Labour Cabinet, and I criticised him severely, he wrote me privately, saying he was sorry I felt like that towards him, but I was right to attack him if I felt he had betrayed his principles.

I was opposed to the Great War and was imprisoned as a conscientious objector. Rose Witcop was Russian born and the Anarchists with whom I associated, and she more than I, were all foreign. I strayed into a strange fold. I experienced four court martials, and her situation was sad. George Lansbury, immediately I was arrested, wrote to her and said I was loyal to the principles for which he stood.

He was not too flush at this period. Nevertheless, he defended me consistently in the columns of the Herald—the Labour daily turned weekly during the war emergency—and subscribed a total of £150 towards the home defence. He wrote me one or two charming letters.

In 1921, the case of The Red Commune, published not by me, but by a Glasgow Group, occurred. I was arrested and duly served 16 months' imprisonment in Glasgow.

During this period George Lansbury again showed his solidarity. Lansbury immediately inquired of Rose Witcop how we were placed. I was not too tight but it was not possible to manage without some domestic assistance. Anyway, he gave her £50 towards things, as he "knew what a propagandist's life is like, when he is genuine."

LANSBURY MEMORIES

GEORGE LANSBURY.

*The following tribute to George Lansbury from our pen appeared in the Islington Gazette for May 31, 1940. The wording was changed very slightly but definitely in two places by the Editor of our contemporary.—Ed.

I was very much touched at reading the report in the Islington Gazette of the City Road Memorial Service to George Lansbury. Although my intimacy was intermittent, and our main paths in the Labour movement diverged, I have known George Lansbury very well for over thirty years. I knew him in the old S.D.F. days, and in to me, the important year 1909, when in the old Socialist Annual he outlined an almost utopian scheme for dealing with unemployment, almost every phase of which has become law since. Old Socialists will remember the Socialist Annual, edited by Theodore Rothstein, and published by the now historic Twentieth Century Press on Clerkenwell Green. How well I know this site!

I read the report of the memorial address delivered by the Rev. G. C. Langdon, M.A., the Vicar of St. Matthew's Church, with interest. His tribute and concept were very true. To describe George Lansbury as "the greatest man of his day" may seem to be carrying tribute very far, yet it does emphasise the truth. George Lansbury, his errors notwithstanding, was a very great man, inspired by the Christian ethic, who yearned to transform the world, as one day it will be transformed, into a great human brotherhood. He wished the earth to be fair, and all her people to be one. Perhaps, indeed, the Vicar is right. Perhaps George Lansbury was the greatest man of his day.

My first real contact with George Lansbury was made in 1909. I believed, from an early age, in free speech and free Press. In 1909, certain Indian papers were suppressed and Indian Nationalists resorted to assassination. I did not believe either in nationalism or assassination. But I did believe in the free Press.

I published the Indian Socialogist in defence of the free Press. At the Old Bailey an attempt was made to claim that I believed in assassination, but Mr. Justice Coleridge overruled that suggestion. My defence made clear that I did not believe in violence.

George Lansbury wrote to me—all the Labour movement otherwise turned against me—and asked me to confirm my anti-violence views. I took the first opportunity of doing so and he wrote, commending my attitude, and asking me to pledge my loyalty to pacifism.

During this period, Charles Voysey, of the

WHOM SHALL WE HONOUR?

Naval Rating Fiscal or "Socialist" Lord Provost

J. FINDLAY LANGMUIR, B.L., Glasgow Procurator Fiscal, 1931.

On June 6 it was announced in the press that Mr. James Findlay Langmuir, B.L., had given up his job as Procurator-Fiscal at Glasgow Central Police Court to join the Navy. He left Glasgow that night to start his training as a rating.

Mr. Langmuir started his career in the office of the Town Clerk. He qualified as a solicitor in 1924, and two years later became Assistant Fiscal under Mr. James Miller. On Mr. Miller's death in 1928 he was appointed Procurator-Fiscal.

In addition to being Police Procurator-Fiscal, Mr. Langmuir was Procurator-Fiscal of the Dean of Guild Court. Through his hands, in normal or peace times, passed over 600 cases a month in the Court of the Stipendiary Magistrate, or Central Police alone. He also directed the cases in the district police courts. There were also a large number of petitions for linings in the Dean of Guild Court.

Whatever the merit of the Dean of Guild petitions, many of which related to actual social administration and possible public usefulness as things are, the police court cases condemned the capitalist system. Whoever has sat in the Central Police Court will know how many of these cases express the hopeless misery of the system and its derelicts. Human beings reduced to utter failure and total deformity. A problem not to be solved under the system, and with which police court administration is compelled to tinker. Findlay Langmuir did his best to bring relief in many cases, and spared no pains to attempt salvage. Often he put aside all ideas of punishment and police-court procedure and addressed himself to solving an individual social problem. In many instances he achieved success.

A Queen's Park School boy, Findlay Langmuir went straight into the Corporation by competitive examination, and began in the Town Clerk's Office under Sir John Lindsay. There he was encouraged to qualify as a law-agent, which he did, and proceeded to the University for a second qualification.

The illness of the then Police Fiscal led to him taking up the duties, and when the position became vacant he continued in the office.

For several years Mr. Langmuir played for Queen's Park Football Club, and has served since on the board of management. He was well-known to the sporting public in Glasgow as a football player.

We all know that the economic struggle dictates Court decrees. The class struggle governs the Small Debt Court and stalks in almost nude misery through the corridors of the County Buildings. Within this economic struggle there exists, or there exists not, the ordinary, not too unfortunate for the moment citizen's respect for the Law. That respect is based on the sense of security or the worthiness of respect he finds in its administration. Law and Order, within even Capitalism, depend on laws being administered truthfully and impartially. Laws are foundation stones of commonweal. They embody history and tradition, and cannot be crumbled by despotism, tyranny, or bureaucratic maladministration. That is why, finally, the totalitarian state must go and democracy be reconstituted throughout the world. It must pass from law and politics to economics, but it must continue and must apply economically, legally, socially, and politically. In the system of criminal administration operating in Scotland, much social welfare within the system depends upon the character of the man who occupies the office of Fiscal.

Socialists in Glasgow were brought into contact with the Stipendiary Magistrate, Mr. George Smith, and at first, with Mr. Miller as Fiscal, and afterwards, in 1931, with Mr. Langmuir. Both Magistrate and Fiscal discharged their respective tasks with great responsibility and respect for the law. As a result of the cases tried the bye-law relating to Free Speech was altered, to secure Free Speech. Magistrate, Fiscal, and police assisted the struggle. But the "Socialist" majority at George Square had no use for Free Speech, and the bye-law remains, meantime, a dead-letter to the eternal disgrace of the parliamentary Socialists and Canerists.

It is interesting to contrast the treatment of the Glasgow Police Fiscal, who joined up from patriotism and because he felt he must do his bit, with the publicity accorded to the Glasgow Lord Provost. This ex-Socialist's portrait is to be found in the local newspapers every day. With considerable breach of true dignity and etiquette he permitted himself to receive the St. Mungo Prize. From the standpoint of human worth, and dignity of office, an unpardonable offence. He is photographed on every occasion as a great patriot. He never says a word in defence of conscience, and unites himself complacently with folk who slander the "conchies" to-day. If all the things said about "conchies" were true, then, as a "conchie" of 1916-1918, he merits no regard. This fact is slurred over by an official conspiracy of silence. He urges battle, but never says a word about the soldiers' condition or rates of pay. For example, why should a soldier's wife or children suffer because he commits some passing military "crime"? Why not just the soldier? If a Socialist can be a Lord Provost, and if he feels the present war is different from all previous wars, why not take a Labour view of the soldier's right, and express it boldly?

So far as we know, Dollan does not do this. He utters nothing but the platitudes of office that lead to further advancement and recognition under a system Socialism condemns.

Whilst the Lord Provost was being photographed the Glasgow Fiscal returned to Glasgow on a 48 hours leave of absence. He was not photographed, so far as we know. No attention was paid to him. He was only a naval rating—a man who did his duty as he saw it. Mr. Langmuir does not claim to be a Socialist. He has not studied Socialism. He is an ordinary citizen, with an ordinary orthodox outlook. But he possesses what many "Socialist" Councillors, Provosts, and Mayors lack, a sense of worth and decency. He joined quietly—slipped away to serve "the country," as he puts it, in a position of danger and discomfort. He went, as a brave man should go, modestly and without any fuss—thereby setting an example to Lord Provosts. Why does not Dollan slip away quietly and join the colours in some post of danger?

On June 29 Mr. Langmuir returned to Glasgow on 48 hours leave. No fuss was made. He was not photographed. He visited the police court; interviewed the Stipendiary Magistrate, who gave up his legal practice and joined up in the 1914-1918 war because he thought he was doing his duty; and returned to his naval duties. Mr. Langmuir feels he must pull his weight in defence of democracy. We honour him, not merely for facing danger, but for his practical democratic approach and sense of equality.

The working class movement has no reason to respect Glasgow's alleged "Socialist" Lord Provost, the conchie of 1917, who demanded that the entire Labour Movement save him from conscription; the over-age conchie who breathes conscription to-day and is parading always in his robes of office and posing for the cameras. But Glasgow citizens can turn from the Labour Lord Provost to pay a tribute of respect to the naval rating, Findlay Langmuir, Glasgow's Police Procurator-Fiscal. He sees his duty and goes out to discharge it, putting aside every thought of comfort and well-being.

We honour the genuine conscientious objector. And we honour also the brave and conscientious soldier or sailor, much as we are opposed to war. We pay tribute to Findlay Langmuir.

sea and air forces. And with the help resultant from systematic internal disruptive work in other countries, Jewish World Dictatorship would then be an accomplished fact.

In that quarter lies the peril that threatens the nations of the world. This danger can only be overcome if the whole of civilization joins in one formidable anti-communist front. As long as these Jewish Bolshevist enemies of the world are not made to realize that their undermining and destructive efforts will be shattered against the common front of all civilized nations, they will continue their plans for wholesale destruction. Everywhere where governments are not on their guard, this Bolshevist terror will incite people to fight against each other, they will instigate strikes and civil wars, establish Front Populaire governments, and the hour will finally strike when Soviet hordes will be let loose to complete the work of devastation and destruction.

HITLER'S ENGLISH LEAFLET, No. 892.

Bolshevists as World War Mongers

At the close of the Great War, when the nations after years of dreadful suffering and exhausted by terrible sacrifices called for a stable and lasting peace, there raged in Russia a civil war the true extent of which only became known more than a decade later.

After power had been taken out of the hands of the collapsing Czarist régime by a kind of Front Populaire with Kerenski at its head, Lenin and Trotzki whipped the Russian people into a fresh intoxicated state of murderous lust. And thus Russia became one huge slaughter house extending from the Arctic Ocean across the Siberian Tundras to the Far East. This civil war cost Russia approximately three million lives, that is to say, far more than she had just sacrificed on the battle fields. In marxistic Bolshevism as schemed out by the Jew Marx, there appeared a line of thought to which the concepts of honour and liberty, duty and the realization of ideals were entirely foreign. The establishment of the Communist International now resulted in the poison of sedition being transfused into all countries so that Moscow's ideas of a world revolution took definite shape with the object of plunging nations once again in a welter of blood and tears. This is substantially confirmed by the following statements:—

"Our stay in Moscow will only be a temporary one; we hope that it will be as short as possible and that we shall be able to transfer the General Staff of the Proletariat—the International Executive Committee—to one of those countries in which other flags are still flying." Lenin.

"Under Lenin's banner our proletarian movement will conquer the whole world. The Red Army is the Army of World Revolution." Stalin in 1935/1936.

Placing its trust in the fourteen points announced by Wilson, the German nation laid down its arms only to be betrayed by the terrible dictates of Versailles and thrown into a state of dire misery. The resultant distress was so great that in 1932 the number of suicides committed in Germany was equal to the strength of an army corps. During that period Bolshevism was rampant in Germany and carried out its dastardly work in accordance with orders from Lenin who, having regard to Germany's political situation in the heart of Europe had said:—

"A victorious proletarian revolution in Germany could easily with one single stroke smash the whole international economic structure and thus safeguard the way for the success of international socialism."

Adolf Hitler, a former front line fighter, recognized this threatening danger. He had fought since 1919 for the purpose of sparing Germany the appalling misery which Russia had been subjected to. It was through his accession to power that the Germans were given

Social Justice on a National Basis.

Economic distress was overcome and Germany was saved from Bolshevism. And more than that. Germany became a mighty bulwark against Jewish World Revolution. Notwithstanding one of the principles of National Socialism in reference to non-interference in the domestic affairs of other nations, agents from Moscow set their traps around Germany and attempt to hunt her down and destroy her by means of diplomatic ruses. And throughout the world they are fanning the fires of world revolution by instigating rebellions, strikes and riots. The Soviet Jews know full well that they need a world revolution in order to save their own skins.

From the very beginning the Bolshevists devoted their energy to the building up of their Red Army in order to check the desperate revolt of the starving and tortured Russian people. After civil war had systematically annihilated the educated classes, foreign engineers and mechanics were looked for and found, and given high wages and special food in return for their assistance in forging the technical weapons of Bolshevism.

Thus the Red Army was created as a weapon for suppressing not only the slightest discontented move of the desperate Russian people by means of machine guns, bombs and poison gas, but a weapon was created that already threatens the whole of civilization.

In former times the peace strength of the Russian Army was stated to be 562,000 men.

At the beginning of 1935, Tuchatschewski, the Deputy Commissar for War, announced that the Red Army had already attained a strength of 940,000.

Tuchatschewski declared further that the total strength of the standing army was 1.3 million excluding reserves, early in 1936.

In 1936, the Council of Peoples Commissaries passed a resolution whereby the age limit of military recruits was lowered from twenty-one to nineteen years. By this arrangemnet the standing army has been increased by fifty per cent. and now totals 2 millions.

I bring you the blessing of the bolshevistic world revolution.

This cartoon is reproducted with wording from Hitler's original leaflet, No. 892.

The trained reserves total

11—12 million men.

And it is not the number of troops alone that has been increased (especially on the Western frontier)—but the whole of Russian armaments have been expanded and many new airports have been built.

As an example we may quote that the second Five Years Plan makes provision for an additional construction of 8000 war planes and 20,000 aeroplane engines in addition to the vast armament programme already embodied in the new Plan.

At the Seventh Soviet Congress, on January 31, 1935, Tuchatschewski stated with regard to a special force that exists in addition to the Red Army:—

"Here (i.e. in Ossoaviachim) millions of workers and peasants are trained for entry into the ranks of the army. Their training is such that in the event of war they will be able to participate with full military knowledge. This preparatory training is of the greatest possible importance. The Ossoaviachim and the Red Army work hand in hand in the work of preparation for war."

And are we and the world at large to believe that these huge war preparations are merely to serve as defensive measures for protecting Soviet frontiers? At least this is what Soviet "diplomats" are told to broadcast throughout the world and what the Jew Litwinow (whose real name is Wallach-Finkelstein) tells the League of Nations.

Everywhere during these last years fires that have been kindled by Moscow have blazed up in order to destroy that which every nation cherishes, namely, domestic happiness and integrity. (See Fichtebund Pamphlet No. 791, "Bolshevism unmasked.") The Brazilian Government, for example, took vigorous measures in 1936 to suppress a rebellion that had been planned on a large scale. This rebellion was engineered by foreign Jews and had already brought about mutinies in various army units. In Spain, the bolshevist wirepullers, acting according to old custom, partly succeeded in seizing power by cloaking themselves under the name of Front Populaire. On the very day that they came into power they began their campaign of murder which surpassed even the bolshevist atrocities of the Russian civil war. During the first weeks of this Spanish Civil War tens of thousands of peaceful citizens were ruthlessly murdered in cold blood. Among them were clergymen, scientists, artists and sportsmen of international fame. As examples we list a few names. The Nobel prize winner for literature, M. Benavente—the well-known journalist and President of the Madrid Press Association, M. Alfonso Santa Maria—and many others. We were horror-struck at the news that the Bolshevist beast had drowned hundreds of innocent and defenceless victims or poured petrol over them and burnt them alive. Crucifications and other brutal tortures were also carried out. And all the while we were listening in to fresh instructions issued by radio from headquarters in Moscow.

The blazing fires and wanton acts of destruction and riots throughout the world speak for themselves. And yet the civilized world is irresolute in meeting the situation brought about by the undermining activity of Soviet agents, who never fail to take advantage of parliamentary freedom. Those who have not yet recognized the true aims of the Soviet Governmnet will do well to grasp the frank revelations of M. Gusjew, an important Soviet functionary. In a number of military pamphlets he has told what has induced the Soviet rulers to make their preparations and has made it clear how world revolution can best be advanced.

"Matters can be accelerated best by giving military assistance to a revolution begun in one of the Western countries. Secondly, by entering into war if one of the new Western socialist Republics be forced to fight against the holders of international economic power. Finally—and such a case is quite probable, we may have to asume the offensive in order to accelerate the revolution in the West."

If these statements are taken in conjunction with the fact that the Soviets have taken the offensive in the Spanish civil war, and if furthermore the gigantic armaments of Moscow are taken into consideration, then the ultimate object of Moscow terrorist rule becomes plainly evident and assumes a ghastly clarity. The dangers lurking in the Pacts and Agreements which Soviet Russia has concluded with France, Czecho-Slovakia and Rumania are also very apparent. A predominance of communist elements in these countries would certainly result in a fresh European war and with it the commencement of a world revolution. The Red Army consists mainly of non-communist peasants and does not seem reliable enough for a prolonged war against a regular modern army. Therefore, the Bolshevists hope to gain a-quick and decisive decision by a sudden combined operation of their land,

UNITED SOCIALIST MOVEMENT'S UNHEEDED APPEAL

WHY DID NOT THE "SOCIALIST" LORD PROVOST ACT IN 1936

In the August Word we told the story of the mimeographed Regeneracion leaflets issued by the United Socialist Movement in 1936. We reproduced No. 10, which contained our open letter to the late Campbell Black, the famous British airman, who served the Fascist cause against the workers of Spain. We now reproduce issues 4 and 6 of these leaflets. Each leaflet is reproduced in full, the text being exactly as originally issued. These leaflets tell their own story.

SPAIN, THE WORKERS, AND NEUTRALITY.

An Open Letter to Lord Provost Stewart.

145 Queen Street, Glasgow, C.1.,
Friday, August 8, 1936.

My Lord Provost,

By the time this letter has been duplicated and circulated, one does not know what the news will be from Spain. The principle stated will stand, however, in the end, for the word must survive empires, and the emancipation of the workers of the world from the thraldom of property must become a reality. I address myself to you because you typify the hopelessness of parliamentary Socialism and Reformism at a time of crisis and I want the workers of Glasgow to face facts. The cause of Spain is the cause of democracy and labour throughout the world, and you adopt a lofty attitude of humourous inaction. Imitating a famous judge, you plead ignorance. You have no official knowledge of Spain. But do you possess any knowledge, official or otherwise? Do you not owe your position to ignorance, your own ignorance, and that of the working-class? But ignorance, my Lord Provost, is no excuse in a Court of Law and it is no plea at the bar of history. One day you will be judged: finally. Only the ghost of your memory will be affected, it is true. And that ghost will have no consciousness. Still, there are folks who have delicate minds, and they do not like to leave mean little ghosts behind them. They would not bargain character for reputation. As Jesus put it, losing their own souls, yet profiting nothing. You have lost your soul and you know nothing of Spain. Once upon a time a man had a toothache and knew nothing of the execution of the Son of Man. He cursed the procession and the victim-in-chief as it moved towards the gallows.

My Lord, you are a parliamentarian and have therefore a fascist mind and false soul. Spain is a friendly nation, living under a government, elected, after years of suppression and fascist torture, by democratic vote. France, with its Popular Front Government, urged neutrality between a constitutional government and a fascist counter-revolutionary rebellion! Italy and Germany, having armed General Franco and his fascist cohorts, accept neutrality, qualified! Soviet Russia, except for stupid little demonstrations, adopts the same role. The British Government also adopts an Isolationist policy. And you, owing your elevation to the workers, but enjoying your status by grace of the ruling-class, fall into line. There shall be no Lord Provost Fund for Spain! A fund is taking sides! It is helping beleaguered, constitutional government, against a fascist conspiracy from within and from without. Franco has been armed! Italy and Germany have sent him aeroplanes and guns. His troops have been conveyed across the straits from Morocco. Britain, her warships idle, permitting this adventure. Such neutrality! And you are all for this neutrality, which is really the aiding and abetting of fascism. No wonder you expect this system to continue fifty years with a Labour administration at George Square! No wonder you boast to the city business men that the Labour "bossing" has made no radical difference to civic affairs in Glasgow! Was it intended to do so?

Your parliamentarism is a conspiracy against the workers of Britain as well as those of Spain. Your fund would have been futile as a fund, considering that the fascists were well and freely equipped with arms and planes by Italy and Germany, and financed by Juan March, the Spanish millionaire, whose tobacco monopoly was confiscated by the Spanish Government. This man never forgave the Republic for exposing and prosecuting him for fraud and when the Azana Government was overthrown in 1933, he returned to Spain and was a party to the infamous tortures imposed by the fascist government upon Spanish workers. Against the finance of this individual your fund would have been as futile as the paltry collections that the Soviet Republic in these days of its decline considers to be the proletarian method of assisting Spain. Your fund would have been as futile as your gesture is eloquent. It is a gesture of treachery, typical of the parliamentary debacle we have suffered under in Britain since the end of the war.

The Powers, meaning of course the diplomatic representatives of the ruling-class, have agreed that we must not help Spain. And your wee thimble-rattling "Socialist" parliamentary soul sighs "Yes, yes." You must obey the master's voice—the master being not the genius of freedom but the interests of the stock exchange. The Italian Government having supplied camouflaged military planes to General Franco insists that no private individual in any other country shall help the Spanish Government. We must send no money. We must not speak, whilst democracy is strangled and men, women and children tortured. From being the dominator of Italy, Mussolini has become the dictator of Britain. To all which you, as the Socialist Sir Galahad of George Square, knowing the price that you must pay for your coming knighthood, assent.

This time, my Lord Provost, the treachery of parliamentarism has gone too far. The workers of Britain will and must help Spain. Unless the tide of fascism is rolled back from Madrid, unless the workers of Britain take their stand by their heroic comrades in Barcelona, all liberty, constitutional and otherwise, will be destroyed in Britain. Let the government of Great Britain enter in to what negotiations it likes with Rome and Berlin, let Stanley Baldwin declare that we must not speak on behalf of Spain, speak we will, let the consequences be what they may. We will speak and we will act in support of Spain. We will recruit armies if necessary to support the Spanish Government. We will raise funds, if so be they help. We will set up Councils of Action. We will call for workshop action to spike and suppress the fascist press. We will silence the Northcliffe press for ever. Only let the government require it, only let the government demand that we shall not speak, and the voices that will be raised on the side of the Spanish workers in their struggle will be a mighty prelude to civil war in Britain. Let the government adopt this suggestion of Rome and we can promise that William Morris's words about the rolling of the thunder will turn to reality. The workers of Britain at this crisis have one cause and one aspiration: complete loyalty through all possible action to the Spanish Government and workers who support it.

I call upon the workers of Glasgow to despise you and your party. I call upon the workers to form Councils of Action in every district and every work. I call for immediate solidarity and unity of every political and industrial fraction and faction of the working-class movement. I ask for immediate workshop action. I call for a movement towards industrial strike action, towards a General Strike or towards a regulated strike, according to the needs of the Spanish struggle. I announce that I am prepared to recruit and to be recruited in the Spanish workers' cause. If the government attempts to silence our speech on behalf of Spain I am prepared to do my best to oppose the government by action and not through parliament. I am prepared to take my stand by civil war.

The shoddy of your parliamentarism, my Lord Provost, is obvious. It shows through your robes of office. Spain has exposed your meanness all too thoroughly.

I have the honour to be in the cause of Socialism, Democracy, and the Spanish workers and Government, my Lord Provost,

Your avowed enemy,

BRITISH NEUTRALITY HUMBUG.

THE RAPE OF SPAIN.

In this issue, we reproduce two News-Items that throw some light on the Fascist conspiracy for the overthrow, by international plotting, of the properly constituted and duly and freely elected Government of Spain, and the workers and peasants who are defending their rights and liberties so heroically.

Campbell Black is well-known as a British airman. His career is unique. Served in the war in R.N.A.S. and R.A.F. Piloted the present king when Prince of Wales on a big-game hunt in Africa. Flown 13 times between London and Nairobi, and in 1929 covered the 5,000 miles in eight days. Three times awarded the Mansefield Robinson Trophy by the Aero Club of East Africa for the most meritorious flight. Once linked four East African capitals—Entebbe, Kisumu, Mombasa, and Dar-es-Salaam, a distance of over 1,600 miles—in a day. In 1931 rescued the German ace, Ernst Udet, when the latter was stranded on an islet on the Upper Nile. In October, 1934, with C. W. A. Scott, won the Mildenhall-Melbourne Air Race, setting up the record of 2 days 4 hours 34 minutes for the 10,000 miles trip from England to Australia. For this feat he and Scott were awarded the Britannia Trophy, the Royal Aero Club gold medal and the silver medal of the Royal Aeronautical Society. Last year made two attempts to break the London to Cape Town record.

On July 28 last, the Campbell Black Aviation Co. was requested to provide a plane for "a week's commercial charter" and pick up a passenger in Paris. Black sensed a trip out of the ordinary and booked it to himself. Next day he reported in a Puss Moth at Le Bouget.

"Campbell Black?" quietly asked a short, stout, smiling little man.

"Yes," was the reply.

"Well, I am your passenger—the Marchese Rivas de Lingares."

The Marchese briefly explained that he wanted to go to Spain—first to Burgos, northern headquarters of the rebel army, then right down the country to Lisbon. Also he wanted to fly back to Burgos.

Campbell Black told the story of this flight and his services to the "rebel cause," i.e. Fascism, in the News of the World for August 9 last.

The Daily Express, for Tuesday, August 11, 1936, features the story of John Owen Cathcart Jones, the British Air Pilot, who, with his American Beechcraft airplane and his two Spanish Monarchist passengers, was held up by the authorities at Marienbad Airport, Vienna. An excited and angry official at Marienbad Airport gave the Daily Express correspondent the information by telephone.

"Cathcart Jones fooled us completely," he said. "His airplane has been kept locked in a hangar ever since his arrival. He told us he wanted to take it out to overhaul the engines. He was permitted to do so. He climbed into the cockpit. Before we realised what had happened his engines started up with a roar, he took off, and vanished in the distance."

Cathcart Jones's passengers had gone on to Berlin. It is considered probable that he has flown to join them.

In the same issue, Cathcart Jones told his own story. He arrived at Cannes on August 1, when he met Don Victor Urrutia, "Air Minister" to the Spanish rebel forces. He asked Jones if it were possible to fly him to the rebel headquarters at Burgos, where he had to discuss plans with General Mola for the purchase of equipment and armaments in various European countries. Within ten minutes of meeting Urrutia, Jones sold him the only long-range high-speed aircraft in Europe—an American Beechcraft which had been brought over in the German Zeppelin Hindenburg by an American flier. A telephone call was put through from Cannes to Croydon and the deal was settled. It was arranged that Urrutia and Jones should fly in an American Stinson airplane to an airport in France not close enough to the Spanish frontier to arouse suspicion. There they were to meet the American in his Beechcraft, transfer the two airplanes and fly on to Burgos. The American was to go where he liked. Urrutia then said to Jones: "Fly me over the Red lines to the home of my mother and sister. I want to see if they are still alive. Then take me to Burgos. There we will speak with General Mola. From there I want you to fly me non-stop to Rome. I want to see the Italian Air Minister and buy ten fighting airplanes from the Italian Government."

Note, both these British airmen, for money, for pure commercialism, openly confessed that they have traded in what is the murder of Spanish workers and peasants. The supine British Government takes no action, but it assists in closing the international port of Tangier to Spanish Government ships! And Great Britain is neutral! In any event even neutrality would be wrong for it would mean that both sides were recognised as belligerents, with the rights of that status. The correct policy is not neutrality but non-intervention. This means recognising the established government and not recognising, much less assisting, the fascist rebels.

But the government not only recognises but covertly assists the Spanish reactionaries. It is the duty of the entire working-class to demand that this policy cease and on the contrary to see that material aid is given to the Spanish people and their democratic government and their magnificent workers' militia to crush the militarist revolt. If the Labour Party was worthy of its salt and if it believes that Parliament matters it should insist on the recall of Parliament within 48 hours and, if necessary, general strike action for the overthrow of the present government.

Campbell Black, who sold his machine, just as Cathcart Jones sold his machines, represents the spirit of British commercial banditism. This is an insight into the character of the patriots, of those types who would bully and conscript the working-class in the event of war. For pure gain they are assisting Fascism to win. And if the Fascist conspiracy succeeds, it means not only the growth of Fascism in France, not merely the rise of Fascism in Britain, but also a Fascist war on the British Empire. If Fascism wins Italy will secure Spanish Morocco and Germany the Canary Islands. This is the price of the airplanes and ammunition the Fascists have been and are receiving from Italy and Germany. Whilst the Soviet News Bulletin, in the name of the Soviet Government declares that the Fascist report that a Soviet ship has assisted the Spanish workers is the Fascist way of "bringing discredit on the Soviet Union." Why should not the Soviet Union pursue the normal custom of supplying armaments to the de facto government of Spain, if that government requires it. The Spanish Government has not asked for and the Spanish Government ought never to have needed to have asked for them. Soviet Russia, which assisted in arming Fascist Germany, is afraid to arm the workers of Spain. Why?

THE RAPE OF SPAIN MUST CEASE.

THERE MUST BE NO WORLD WAR.

RATHER LET THE DEFENCE OF DEMOCRACY MEAN WORLD REVOLUTION.

AUSTRALIA AND CONSCIENCE

The Church Standard, Sydney, Australia, in its issue for Wednesday, May 8, published a statement on the position of conscientious objectors in the Commonwealth, prepared by the Department of Information.

We make the following excerpt:—

"Conscientious objection to military service is not regarded in Australia or any other part of the British Empire as a crime against the State, as it is in Germany . . .

"In Australia, the law relating to conscientious objectors deals with two contingencies—exemption from service in time of war of certain specified classes of people, and, secondly, exemption from training under the national compulsory plan.

"Exemption was provided originally for persons who satisfied a prescribed authority that their conscientious beliefs did not allow them to bear arms. This was modified to apply, simply, to 'persons whose conscientious beliefs do not allow them to bear arms,' thus taking away from the prescribed authority discretion in the matter.

"Last year, a new interpretation of 'conscientious belief' was embodied in the legislation. Earlier, 'conscientious belief' was, more or less, identical with 'religious belief.' If a man believed that war was opposed to his religious belief, he could claim exemption; now the field of conscientious objection has been widened.

"The existing interpretation is:—

'Conscientious belief shall include all conscientious beliefs whether the ground thereof is or is not of a religious character, and whether the beliefs are or are not part of the doctrines of any religion.'

"Legal authorities hold that this means that a man may hold a valid conscientious objection to bear arms on political or economic, as well as religious, grounds.

"As overseas service is voluntary, these provisions of the Act apply only when a call is made under the national compulsory plan. The objector must then report to his military area officer, who, if he be satisfied that his objection is valid under the Act, may issue a certificate of exemption.

"There is this qualification, however: Exemption does not cover freedom from non-combatant service, such as may be rendered in the Army Medical Service. So the area officer may exempt the objector from the actual bearing of arms, but may allot him to a non-fighting branch of the forces.

"There are conscientious objectors who do not accept even non-combatant service, however. If the area officer refuses to issue a certificate of exemption, the objector may, within seven days, apply to a magistrate. Three days before the hearing of the claim the Clerk of the Court must notify the area officer, and if it is decided to oppose the application, any military officer may appear as a party to the hearing.

"The peculiar features of the law, a legal authority commented recently, are the widening of the grounds of conscientious objection from religious belief to 'practically anything,' and the right of the objector to appeal to a civil court.

"Cases have occurred in which men have refused to take the oath on their allotment to non-combatant service, but this is an offence under the Act and the penalty may be six months' imprisonment.

"Conscientious objectors who disregard the law may be penalised under several clauses. For instance, a person who is required to serve and absents himself is deemed to be a deserter, and is liable to punishment.

"Any person who fails to attend for medical examination or enlistment may be fined £50, or imprisoned for six months, or may suffer both penalties.

"It is an offence to counsel or aid any person to fail to enlist or to avoid enlistment, or to counsel any person who has enlisted not to perform any duty under the Act."

Commenting on the Act, editorially, our Australian contemporary, in the same issue, says:—

"A man who refuses to bear arms may be a coward or a 'crank,' but he may also be a brave and noble citizen. Our law recognizes that compulsion in this matter is contrary to high principles for which we, as a nation, stand, but it is perhaps doubtful whether the decision as to whether a man's objection is founded on sincere conviction should be left in the hands of magistrates, much of whose work is concerned with the facts of petty crimes.

"It is strange that the law should show some liberality towards the man who, for conscience sake, will not fight, but none towards the one who will not take the oath (or make the alternative solemn affirmation) to obey orders.

"This second refusal is made into a crime, though it should be obvious that an oath taken under compulsion can have no binding force on the conscience of the taker. This particular provision is very nearly absurd—and it is unnecessary because, by other parts of the statute, an order issued by duly appointed authorities is to be obeyed on pain of punishment. Neither difficulty is new—as witness Article XXXVII, which indicates discussions about serving in the wars; and XXXIX, discussions about swearing."

PHILIP BOYLE'S CASE

Philip Boyle, described on the Tribunal papers and in the press as a private in the Highland Light Infantry, appeared in military custody before the Scottish Conscientious Objectors' Appellate Tribunal in Edinburgh on Friday, October 4, at 2.15 p.m., when he applied for registration as a conscientious objector.

Lord Elphinstone, who presided, intimated that, in accordance with the usual practice, the Appellate Tribunal would consider the case and forward their recommendation to the Secretary of State for War.

Boyle was refused registration by the Glasgow local Tribunal, and that decision was upheld by the Appellate Tribunal. He was then compulsorily taken into the Army, and subsequently court-martialled for refusing to carry out orders.

In a written statement submitted at the court-martial Boyle said that he would serve any sentence without dismay, and that he would renew his protest when he had completed his sentence.

Questions were raised in the House of Commons about Boyle's case, and answered by Mr. Anthony Eden.

IN CIVILIAN CLOTHES.

Boyle, dressed in civilian clothes, appeared before the Appellate Tribunal accompanied by an officer and a lance-corporal.

Lord Elphinstone, addressing Boyle, said—"You make a point in your statement that you are a Catholic. I suppose you will agree that there are thousands of Catholics in the Army. Do you base your objections on religious grounds?

Boyle—I base them on moral rather than religious grounds.

TWICE COURT-MARTIALLED.

Mr. Gordon Stott, advocate, who appeared for Boyle, said that the appellant was conscripted on May 7, and on May 10 he refused to don military uniform. He was court-martialled, and received a sentence of detention or military imprisonment. While he was serving that sentence he refused to sign an official receipt for his belongings, and accordingly was kept on a diet of bread and water for two days.

On his release he was returned to the military barracks at Maryhill. He disobeyed another military order and received a second court-martial. His military clothes were taken from him and he was allowed to resume his civilian clothes. He wore these clothes at his second court-martial and was sentenced to imprisonment on the civil side of the prison, with hard labour.

Mr. Stott argued that Boyle had proved his conscientious scruples in a far more rigorous manner than most men who came before that Tribunal. Since he had returned from prison the military authorities had allowed him to wear civilian dress and to go about the barracks as he pleased, provided he did not make a nuisance of himself. That showed that the authorities had come to the conclusion that he had proved his case.

Except for a slight technical error, which we have corrected, the above report follows closely that which appeared in the Glasgow Herald.

The Scottish Daily Express, in its issue for Saturday, October 5, reports the case under the heading: "Private C.O. Appeals—in Civvies." The report contained the following interesting passages:—

'Philip Boyle, a Glasgow Civil Service student, now a most unwilling private of the H.L.I., said last May: 'Nobody will make me a soldier.'

"The Army took away his brown suit, but he refused to 'sign it in.' They used force to uniform him. He was court-martialled. He did 'solitary.' Then he did the regulation 90 days' detention, and yesterday he appealed to the outside world.

"Still stubborn and unbroken, this 21-year-old man was led in by an officer and lance-corporal to the C.O. Appeal Court in Edinburgh wearing his own brown suit.

Mr. Gordon Stott, advocate, pointed to the dress and said, 'It shows that in the eyes of the military authorities he had proved his case.'

'Boyle was now allowed to go about barracks and on leave and was no longer forced into khaki.

'The chairman asked Boyle if he would be a non-combatant. The reply was an emphatic 'No.'

'Would he do farm work?—'Nothing I am compelled to do.'

'Boyle seemed to be going the limit, added Mr. Stott. 'I have seen his cell and I think that any one who is prepared to put up with such conditions is a very strong objector.' '

The italics are in the Daily Express report.

The Daily Record, Glasgow, published a report under the heading :—

"C.O. NOW TREATED VERY WELL BY MILITARY."

The report opened with the following paragraph set in capitals throughout :—

"TWENTY-ONE YEAR OLD GLASGOW 'CONCHIE' PHILIP BOYLE, TWICE COURT-MARTIALLED AND IMPRISONED FOR REFUSING TO OBEY ORDERS, IS NOW ALLOWED TO GO FREELY ABOUT THE BARRACKS AND TO HIS HOME IN THE EVENINGS."

On October 15, Mr. Campbell Stephen was advised by the Minister of Labour that Boyle had been granted conditional exemption, the condition being that he works on land drainage, forestry or agriculture.

CATHOLIC CONCHIES

The Catholic Hierarchy, seconded by the Catholic Press, maintain that a Catholic cannot be a conscientious objector. It is asserted that a conscientious objector disobeys the lawful authority of the State.

We will put aside the question whether the authority of the State is lawful always and inevitably. We will ignore the stories of Catholics who have been martyred for denying the authority of the State. We will not discuss the question of allegiance to God and to Caesar, a point on which Christian theologians argue as badly as state politicians. We will content ourself with two comments of fact :—

(1) To register as a conscientious objector is not to disobey the State, as the State makes statutory provision for such objection.

(2) To ask the objector to accept the State's decision, if that decision is against him, is an error in ethics and in logic.

The State decides that its war is just. The State can come to no other conclusion. Therefore, its decision is without legal ethic. If the conscientious objector is opposed genuinely to war, whatever its nature, he must oppose the State's decision that he shall fight. If he believes the war to be unjust, he cannot permit the State to put the question, "Is this war just?" and say : "Yes, it is." It is not the conscientious objector who is not genuine in this instance but the State. To submit to the State's decision is to espouse the old barbarous cry : "My country, right or wrong."

The State is quite right to endeavour to discover whether the conscientious objector is genuine, or otherwise. It has no right to say its view of its own war is right. It has the right to say that, refusal to help that war, based on genuine disbelief in the war, is rebellion. If it is rebellion, it is the healthy and desirable rebellion of conscience. This fact the priests of the Catholic Church will not admit.

The Catholic Herald, London, for July 5, 1940, under the heading, "Here's the Answer," dealt with the question of Catholicism and conscience. It published a letter, asking the following three questions :—

(1) Has a priest any right or authority to say that a Catholic cannot be a conscientious objector?

(2) Is not the statement in direct conflict with the teaching of the Church on the supremacy of conscience?

(3) What is the position of a Catholic who happens to be a conscientious objector?

The Catholic Herald replied by saying that the priest had the right to express his own opinion; and that he could find direct support for his contention in the Joint Statement of the English and Welsh Hierarchy, issued on September 15, 1939.

This statement :—

"urged upon all the Faithful the duty of loyal obedience . . . and of willing co-operation in every form of national service."

The authors explained :—

"We have a profound conviction of the justice of our cause. Our nation in this conflict stands for freedom and for the liberty of the individual and the State."

The paper added that statements of like tone had been made by His Eminence, Cardinal Hinsley, and other Catholic leaders. It commented that these were strong authorities.

Passing to question 2, the Catholic Herald declared that the priest's statement was certainly not in conflict with Catholic teaching. It explained :—

"It is not true to say, without qualification, that Conscience is supreme."

To support this doubtful assertion—and to our mind, it is worse than doubtful—our contemporary plunged into a hysteria of unmeaning metaphysic. It said :—

"Man is guided by a double norm of right action, comprising an objective and remote standard—the Laws of God and of the Church, and a subjective and proximate standard conscience . . . Man is obliged to have a rightly formed conscience, that is, he is bound to take pains to make his conscience conformable (as far as he can) to the law of God and of the Church . . . It follows therefore that conscience must be formed under the guidance of right reason, which must work out problems as far as it can by itself, and at the same time accept the guidance of legitimate authority when it commands in matters that are within its competence. From this it will be seen that conscience is supreme in the sense that proximately man is bound to obey it; but it is not supreme in the sense that a man may disregard the objective standard, namely, the laws of God and of the Church, or neglect to find out what that standard is."

This a mass of specious reasoning. The author is trying to say that conscience does not exist but is afraid to write honestly. There is no such thing as a "proximate standard conscience." Conscience is absolute : and the laws of God are the laws of conscience. There is no such thing as "a rightly formed conscience," precisely because there is no such thing as "a wrongly formed conscience." We are not bound to make conscience conformable to the Church. On the contrary, the Church, and man's allegiance to the Church, must conform to conscience.

The author is muddled in his advice because he confounds conscience with reason and right conclusion. Reason and conscience, understanding and conscience, ought to exist side by side. Reason enlightens the understanding and application of conscience and defines its employment. Reason does not affect the voice of conscience : for its voice is imperative, and it says but one thing : "Do that which you feel or sense is right. Abstain from doing that which you feel or sense, which you know, is wrong." And know, in this sense, is a felt knowledge and not just a reasoned knowledge.

Answering the third question, our contemporary adds to its balderdash as follows :—

"He must obey his conscience as long as it dictates to him a course of conscientious objection . . . It should be noted that mere doubt or uncertainty is no sufficient basis for conscientious objection; conscience may only act on a certain conviction."

This is the repetition of felt error. The writer is whistling to keep his courage up, because he knows he is lying, and wants to put a good face on his fraud. Doubt is sufficient to warrant conscientious objection to war, which, after all, means wholesale killing or murder. Conscience must act on the certain conviction that no man is justified in participating in any war that he is not convinced is right beyond all shadow of doubt. Uncertainty means that participation is wrong.

The writer denies this true definition of the basis of conscientious objection to war, because his view is fixed, that a Catholic cannot be a conscientious objector. It is enough that the enemies of Catholicism should deny conscience to a Catholic. We hardly expect such arguments from Catholic apologists.

How this attitude of the Church influences the Tribunals will be seen if we glance at a few cases at random.

Harry Claus, painter and decorator, Oswald Street, Blackburn, who is a Roman Catholic, told the Manchester Tribunal on Tuesday, April 30, that his priest had promised to give evidence for him but had since come to his house and said that he had consulted with the dean, and he was forbidden to do it. He was to tell him that it was a just war.

Hugh Dugan, Whiteside, Bathgate, was granted non-combatant service by both the local and the appellate Tribunal. He stated that he was a student at the Edinburgh University and complained that, following his appearance before the local Tribunal, he received letters enclosing white feathers.

William A. Munden, a Manchester bus conductor, also a Roman Catholic, was registered for non-combatant service by the Manchester Tribunal, on Thursday, July 18.

Munden stated that the present war fulfilled all the Catholic conditions of a just war except that everything possible should have been done to settle the dispute by other means. But he did not agree with a statement, quoted by the chairman, Judge Burgis, in which Cardinal Hinsley spoke of Germany wishing to de-Christianise Europe.

"I don't think that can be the case," he said. "The most Catholic country in Europe has just come in on the side of Germany."

At the Leeds Tribunal, when the Court reached the 1,100th application, Judge Stewart told Tom Slater, of 6 Lower Clay Pits, Pellon, Halifax, that he was only the fourth Roman Catholic who had appeared for exemption. The decision was non-combatant service.

At Reading Tribunal, Michael Madden, 62 Norrey's Avenue, Oxford, a Roman Catholic, applied on religious grounds, and was granted exemption on condition that he did agricultural work.

On the same day, before the same Tribunal, Patrick Scanlon, a male nurse, who appealed also on religious grounds as a Roman Catholic, was granted non-combatant service.

In our opinion, Madden's exemption was due to the fact that he had suffered victimisation for his pacifist views. But we are aware of Scanlon's sincerity. In his case, the Tribunal advanced the view that a Catholic cannot be a conscientious objector.

Before the same Tribunal, sitting at Reading, on a more recent occasion appeared Charles Jeffrey James Wiggins, of 37 Northumberland Road, Slough, a milling operator, employed by the Intertype Co., of Slough.

Applicant based his objection entirely on religious grounds, but pointed out that his were not the general views of his church, which was the Roman Catholic Church.

Have you talked the matter over with your priest?—No, because I know the attitude of the church towards the present conflict. Mine is my own personal attitude.

Does your priest know what your views are?—No, I am afraid he does not.

Does your objection also go to non-combatant service?—Yes, because I consider it is very nearly as big a part in the war as the war itself.

The Tribunal were not satisfied that there was any genuine conscientious objection in this case.

In the Scanlon case, the Tribunal held that a Catholic could not be a conscientious objector. During the first week in September, the same Tribunal, under the same chairmanship, came to an opposite decision, when sitting at All Soul's College, Oxford. This was in the case of Robert Lawrence Drummond Hay, Old Town House, Woodstock, a librarian at Queen's College, Oxford. Hay based his objections on religious grounds and stated that he was a Roman Catholic. Hay said that he was not prepared to do non-combatant service, but was willing to continue his A.R.P. work or do agricultural work.

Hay was granted full exemption on condition that he did full time agricultural, horticultural or forestry work.

Conditional exemption may be unsatisfactory, but it is a recognition of the fact that a Catholic can be a conscientious objector.

A PEOPLE'S WAR

by Rev. F. H. Amphlett Micklewright, M.A.

[Mr. Micklewright is a well-known clergyman of the Church of England, resident in West London.]

It is being widely acclaimed that the present war is a People's War. Mr. Priestley has made the appeal over the wireless that it should be viewed in this light. It is a sign of the intransigent nature of the "Colonel Blimps" that even such a cautious demand for reform has caused offence in some quarters. The Archbishop of York has demanded a new social and economic order as a result of the war. A good many politicians have been led to make use of the battle-cry and to suggest that, if the people as a whole, back up the war effort, a people's peace is the inevitable result. Orthodox labour has fallen for the bait. Ernest Bevin, Thomas Johnson, and the rest, are busy leading their followers into the government version of a People's war!

In one sense of the term it is perfectly true that this is a People's war. It is the same social class which are forced to bear the main brunt of its effects. Working-class areas are so congested that they are the more likely to be the victims of German bombs than anywhere else. The tragedy of East London was caused very largely by the overcrowding of homes which a decent social system would have eradicated long ago. Instead, the East Londoners have been left to be bombed together with the ordinary people of other districts. Their only personal guard has been a wholly inadequate shelter provision. It is certainly a People's war which leaves the people without the deep shelters which are the only proper protection and which takes no effective measures against the plague epidemics which must surely be the accompaniment this winter of the conditions of the present shelter-accommodation.

Again, it is certainly a People's war which puts the main weight of financial exaction upon the people! It is all very well to use high sounding phrases about equality of sacrifice. These things are relative to income, and it is the small income which is hit hardest by the present taxation. It is also a People's war which robs the people of their civil liberties, which conscripts the lives of certain age-groups, and which seeks to extend the same measure of compulsion and of dictatorship to the expression of opinion. In the light of all that has happened in the past year, high sounding words about "freedom" and "democracy" sound rather like a joke in bad taste! It is idle to pretend that it is not the ordinary working people who are bearing the weight of the war. It is likewise idle to talk of democracy so long as a capitalist order of society is allowed to introduce considerations of income and of finance as determining a man's individual worth, or to impose inequality by means of inheritance and private monopoly. The fact that there is a door of democratic opportunity by means of scholarships and the like is often exploited by the capitalist press. Actually, as Professor Tawney points out in his illuminating work, "Equality," such opportunities are extremely few in number and can only apply to an infinitesimal proportion of the working-classes.

Yet, the phrase, "a People's war," is extremely dangerous. It is one of the best adapted for the deluding of the unthinking into a belief that any sort of social betterment is to be expected from a war whose causes are so largely intertwined with the financial interests of private monopoly. The last war saw exactly the same bait used in order to secure the allegiance of the workers to the war-effort. Even the phrase, "a People's war,' is not new. Lord Ponsonby has shown how the horror stories are not only devoid of truth but work to a model. So too do political slogans. Not a few of the slogans of the moment reflect the "land fit for heroes" theme. Read "Hitler" for the "Kaiser" and many of the propagandist phrases of the last war may still be made to do duty! The People's war as the gateway to a People's utopia was an idea much exploited in the last war. For example, on September 14th, 1914, a meeting was held at the London Opera House to popularize the war. Among remarks made by the principal speaker was a definite promise:—

". . . it is one of the scandals of our social system that, whilst we are the richest nation in the world, there is all this grim poverty and distress . . . when you have got rid of this naval competition and military menace . . . you have that money over for the relief of the unemployed; you have that money over for profitable and legitimate industry, and the encouragement of productive work throughout the length and breadth of the land.

And, ladies and gentlemen, that is why I say this war is a People's war."

The extent to which these promises were redeemed was worthy of the government which employed such a propagandist. The remarks were made by Mr. Horatio Bottomley! There is no reason to think that the phrase employed by the late apostle of war is now resurrected with any greater sincerity than the sense in which it was used by its original author!

The complete insincerity and chaos implied by the People's war idea should be a warning against its adoption by anybody who is politically educated at all. A vast medley of interests has gone to the making of the present war. They are well illustrated in Simon Laxey's investigation, "Tory M.P.," which provides practical illustration of the extent to which the practical interests of the governing classes are bound up with high finance and private monopoly. It is idle to pretend that the interests of the persons there named can have any point of contact with the interests of the workers. The class-war is a very potent reality. The Fifth Column detentions have shown the extent to which persons of the English conservative classes and of the aristocratic, naval, and military orders have involved themselves with Fascism in order to discipline the working-classes.

It is true that this class have quarrelled with Hitler over certain details, but it is futile to imagine that they can fight a sincere war against the things for which he stands. Their relationship to Nazi Germany has always been purely opportunist. It is only a few years ago that Lord Rothermere was filling his papers with praise of the Nazis, Hitler included. In 1934, his paper, The Sunday Dispatch, backed up Mosley and his gang of Blackshirt thugs. The story of the Anglo-German Fellowship has already appeared in The Word. It is true that members of this class now vie with each other in silly abuse of Hitler. They did exactly the same (and told the same stories) when they had fallen out with the Kaiser, whose dictatorial rule they had united in praising up till 1914. But the fact remains that the war which they are anxious to paint as "a People's war" is essentially one waged in the interests of capitalist finance and private monopoly, dictated by the vested interests of the ruling classes. A few daubs of democratic colouring can never succeed in repaintng such a picture. It leaves a far clearer impression of a quarrel between two groups, the one associated with the monopoly interests of industrial capitalism, the other with the state control of the Nazis and Fascists.

The whole issue goes to prove how far the government propaganda concerning a People's war can either be trusted or expected to produce results. Just as did the orations of Horatio Bottomley during the last war, it will doubtless gain the support of a few persons. But, the nature of the present political and international crisis shows clearly enough that these things cannot be brought about in successive stages of time. It is merely wishful thinking to imagine that the defeat of Hitler is going to be followed by a thoroughgoing social and economic reform. A new social order must be sought out here and now. The real defeat of Fascism and Nazi-ism has to be secured in this land as well as abroad. It can only be brought about by the workers of the world realizing a community of interest and striving together against the social order which capitalism has imposed in every country and which finds in Fascism its last stage. The defeat of Hitler by Churchill is completely irrelevant to the real People's struggle which is bound up with the capitalist crisis.

It all serves to prove that there is only one People's war. It is the constant fight against the ruling classes for better conditions. An examination of the present social system shows it as shot through and through by inherent contradiction simply because it is unnatural and illogical. Its seizure of the land for private ownership is a deprivation from the people of their natural rights as may be seen in the story of the enclosure of the English common land or in the treatment of the Scottish crofters. The use of capital by private monopoly is clearly illogical. Government should be by the many and in the interests of the many. The result of such a social system is bound to be poverty and unemployment. Fruit is left to rot on the trees, fish is thrown back into the sea, cotton is left to waste, at the same time as starvation is tolerated, rather than challenge private capital and private profit. During the inter-war years, the permanent army of some two million unemployed existed side by side with the emergence of 1,024 new millionaires. This fact was a necessary accompaniment of the present social system. In other words, capitalism and private monopoly is bound to cause unemployment and starvation just as it is bound to cause war. If goods cannot pass tariff walls, armies will do so. One of the potent causes of the present war was the Ottawa Agreement of 1932, which sought to strangle German trade in the interests of private monopoly.

The resurrection of the phrase, "a People's war," together with the popular cry for a new social and economic order, is a decisive moment to make clear that there must be such a war fought upon the only lines which can be effective. Let there be negotiation followed by the people taking control. Let liberty be restored to the many, both in civil liberties and in the economic realm. Let the foreign policy of the land be aimed at promoting a spirit of internationalism among the workers of the world. Hitler will cease to be a menace for his power will have gone. A real People's war will be far on the way to abolishing the evils under which the people suffer. Only let the people realize that their true foe is not merely one supremely diabolical man. They were told this story concerning Napoleon, it was repeated about the Kaiser, and now it is repeated again of Hitler. One man cannot cause a gigantic war and war-guilt is an international thing shared by the statesmen of every country. This popular propaganda simply confuses the true and vital issues. The people must come to realize their true foes and seek to eradicate them as a cancer from the midst of the social order.

CABALLERO & COMPANYS

We have been compelled to hold over a special article on Luis Companys, sometime President of Catalonia, from the pen of Ethel Macdonald. Companys was arrested by the Vichy Government in unoccupied France and handed to Germany, who passed him on to Franco. He died, a martyr to Liberty and a victim of the invaded right of political asylum by criminal Fascism, before a firing squad in a Madrid prison yard.

We now learn that Francisco Caballero, Prime Minister of the last Republican Government in Spain, has been arrested in unoccupied France at the instance of the Vichy Government.

Caballero was a plasterer and secretary of the Socialist General Union of Labour. After 1934 he led the left wing of the Socialists. In recognition of his leadership in the defence of Madrid against Franco in 1937, he was made Premier.

Caballero will face a Fascist firing squad. His death will inspire struggle and revolution, until, at last, reaction and war are overthrown for all time. His blood will choke his Fascist executioners.

UNITED SOCIALIST MOVEMENT

Many comrades who read The Word, and the pamphlets issued by the Strickland and Bakunin Press, may wish to join the U.S.M. Those living in Glasgow, but unable to attend the meetings held at Bakunin Hall, could become members at large by paying 1s. 0d. per year. Comrades living in other cities could do the same, until they were able to form a local group. At the present moment, Bakunin Hall is £50 in debt and gifts would be welcome. Address all communications to Secretary, U.S.M., Bakunin Hall, 29 Castle Street, Glasgow, C.4.

LIVERPOOL OBJECTORS

Brutal Treatment Alleged

[This account was prepared for publication before questions were raised in the House of Commons on Tuesday, October 22. Mr. E. Thurtle was most anxious to assume that the facts were not true, and Sir W. Smithers considered such questions only propaganda for the enemy. Quite rightly, Sir E. Grigg said the matter was sub judice. That abuses should be challenged is not enemy propaganda, but the very opposite. It is a defence of Freedom and an assertion of faith in democratic standards and traditions. Secrecy is tyranny.—Ed.]

A statement concerning the treatment of conscientious objectors at Liverpool has been sent to us by Mr. H. W. Eden, J.P., of 53 Eastlake Street, Liverpool 8, on behalf of the Merseyside Conscientious Objectors' Advisory Bureau. The status of the persons who assure us that the statement is correct in its details warrant attention to their complaint. We ask Labour Members of Parliament and the Cabinet to enquire into Mr. H. W. Eden's allegations. They are as follows :—

CHADWICK (Leeds).—On Friday, September 20, he was brought out with several other men under detention, including Norman Williams, mainly for exercises. Walking up and down he was put into line with others and made to walk in step. The soldiers behind kicked him when he would not do it. He was brought out and told to run up and down on his own, but he would not do it. He was taken round a corner of a building and when he reappeared his nose was bleeding. He was taken into a cell below the Commanding Officer's room.

On Monday at 12 o'clock he was brought before the C.O., who is Lieutenant-Colonel Greenwood. He was too weak to stand up, and was supported by soldiers. Williams, who was there also, heard the Colonel say that Chadwick was to be taken to hospital. He is there now.

NORMAN WILLIAMS (Sheffield) states :—"I came on Thursday night and they took me down into a cell. I was told I could sleep there and would have bread and water until I decided to do something. They reasoned with me, and gave me a palliasse and I was taken to the detention room. Friday—They took me into the Q.M. Store, and told me to take off my boots. I was marched into a little room and given choice of dressing in uniform or being dressed. I half dressed myself and they told the officer that I had been forcibly dressed."

JOHN RADFORD (London). — John Radford arrived on Thursday, September 12, at 7 o'clock, according to calling-up papers. Refused to sign form giving personal particulars. Put in Guard Room over-night. Friday—Went before Colonel at mid-day, and asked to be tried by court-martial; without being charged was put on solitary confinement and bread and water. Was given one blanket and no palliasse. Was there until Monday. Had normal meals for a week. Before the Colonel on Saturday. No charge or sentence was made. Put in Guard Room and charged on Wednesday. Thursday—Roused by Military Police in the night and told he had been given two half hour stretches of fatigue duty. Friday—Turned out at 2 o'clock to scrub out wash basins, and at 4 o'clock to scrub out the Guard Room during the night.

Other C.O.s in the Guard Room were treated similarly.

Saturday night—Left in peace apparently on account of Sunday. Sunday—When asked to work refused. Radford and others were dragged down to the Guard Room and subsequently left alone for the rest of the day on bread and water.

Monday—By this time Peter Thornton had arrived from Glasgow. There were now three "conchies" (Thornton, Worth and Radford). The sergeant ordered them to work. They refused and were all beaten up more or less, and dragged down to the butcher's shop and ordered to scrub it out. They refused and were all beaten again. They were then taken back to the Guard Room, being struck on the head at every pace. In the afternoon they were split up and put in solitary confinement with bread and water. None of the cells had any light—they were blackened out. Worth's cell was 4 ft. by 10 ft. with a stone floor. There was one blanket each. They were roused three times during the night.

Tuesday—In the morning they went into the Gym., and had a bath in the afternoon. At night Gibbs came from Glasgow. At mid-night, at 2 a.m. and 4 a.m. they were paraded round the playground, Gibbs in bare feet and underclothes (or night shirt), the rest in shirt sleeves.

Wednesday — Heads shaved. Forster and Radcliffe agreed to join.

Thursday—Gibbs and Worth agreed to join (physical weakness had lowered their resistance).

During this period, probably on the Monday, they were taken out to drill with a party of men with rifles who continually butted them in the back and stomach with the rifles, and kicked them on the legs and struck them on the face as they marched. This lasted either twenty minutes or an hour, they could not remember clearly. None of them ever had a chance of asking for a court-martial. (When Worth was tried he said he wanted to be tried by court-martial, but was told to shut up, etc., and hustled out of the room).

ALBERT FOSTER (Newcastle) says :—

"After serving three days in Newcastle I was taken down to Dingle on Saturday night at about 12 o'clock and was put straight away into the Guard Room with a number of other fellows.

"Sunday — Treated very well — normal food. Three men, including Sergeant Cullen, took me up to the Q.M. Stores for uniform which I refused to have. They forced it on me, and asked me to sign a paper to acknowledge receipt of clothes, but I refused to sign. Taken to solitary cell, and they ripped off my coat and jacket, so I agreed to do the rest for them, and put the uniform on against my will.

"Monday—I was taken before the C.O. and as soon as I was bundled into the room, I shouted that I had been forcibly dressed, and said I would take the uniform off then and there. The C.O. (Greenwood) said "Take this man away." He was taken down to the cell and, because of his impudence to the S.M., the sergeant set about him and left him with aching jaws. He had one blanket, and after that he was fed upon one slice of bread and water for each meal.

"Tuesday (?) — The colonel himself came down and advised me that he had had a telegram to say that my mother had died, and that the only condition on which he would allow me to go home was to go back in uniform. I refused, naturally, as I understood that this would make me a qualified soldier, but he said he would give me five minutes to make up my mind. On the whole he was very decent and tried to show me a bit of kindness, as he had found that the other methods did not go very far in getting me into the army. I eventually consented to go back home in uniform on the condition that I would resort to my former position on my return. That night he had me taken down to the station in his own car under escort, and I was home until the Thursday afternoon, when I was brought back and placed in solitary confinement again, and a palliasse and another blanket were in the room.

"Friday—I was taken to the reception office and gave particulars for the attestation form, but refused to sign it, and was later charged in the C.O.'s office for disobeying orders, and was sentenced to 14 days detention. In the afternoon I was taken to the Guard Room and placed with three others and asked to work. Upon my refusal I was again given a severe beating up by the same sergeant. From that day until the Wednesday I was in solitary confinement with one blanket and my overcoat, and fed on bread and water for the best part of the time. I was told that I could take exercises but refused to take it in uniform. I was taken out for physical training with others and the party of men with rifles who continually hit us in the back and stomach and kicked us and struck us on the face. Another time five of us were out together on our own and given orders to drill. I walked out of the group and looked over the railings. Fortunately Sergeant Cullen was engaged in other duties and I did not get what I expected, but was placed back in the cell again.

"Wednesday—Three men came down to cut my hair and I felt so weak and depressed that I did not have enough strength to resist at all. The barber tried very hard to leave a little on the top but the sergeant got his own way eventually and I was shaved very clean. The sergeant came down again and asked if I had changed my mind, but I asked him to come back in the afternoon because my spirits were so low that I just did not know exactly what I was doing. He said he would but actually came back in about five minutes and told me I should gain great advantage by signing my papers at that time. I went up to the reception office and, after about five minutes hesitation, put my name to the form. I was taken before the C.O. again and he was advised of my change of attitude. I was then returned to the cell not knowing why, because I understood that my sentence would be finished. The colonel came down himself that night and ordered the police sergeant to take me upstairs to the Guard Room, where I spent the night, with a blanket and palliasse for a change.

Thursday—Drafted to Liverpool College and took up my duties as a soldier

One day Sergeant Cullen got me to put on boxing gloves with him in the gymn. and I just did not want him to think me afraid, so I had a go with the gloves but came off second best.

(When speaking with Foster when he first came in, Cullen made a slip of the tongue, and he found out that he was a certain Cullen, a boxer, and also a member of the Communist Party of Great Britain. Not wanting to lose his job as a sergeant of the police, Cullen asked Foster to keep quiet about it).

Worth and Radford said they were all forbidden to write or receive letters, although some had homes in London, which was being bombed.

GIBBS (Cardiff) states :—"Arrived Tuesday, September 24, from Barlinnie Prison, Glasgow, after doing two months. I had been sentenced in Glasgow to one year's imprisonment commuted to three months for refusing to don the uniform at Gt. Yarmouth. I was placed in the Guard Room but no charge. Arrived with escort on time. About midnight I was roused and taken out in my underclothing and with bare feet and marched round the yard, being beaten and kicked as we went along. I was taken back to the Guard Room, my palliasse and blankets taken away and left to sleep with one blanket on the cold stone floor. I was again roused at 2 a.m. and 4 a.m., marched round with others and then left until 6 a.m. the following morning. I was taken to a solitary cell in darkness where I was given bread and water and one blanket.

"Next morning I was taken before the C.O., where I refused to be a soldier. I was shouted and bawled at and generally abused, then hustled out of the room and taken back to my cell. They informed me that my appeal was not going through and that, if I held out, I would be given just 91 days' detention until I broke up. He said he would bring me up on a charge the following morning but when I was taken before him I was not charged but hustled back to my cell.

"I was still in the canvas clothing which I wore in Barlinnie Prison, although I had been informed that I would be allowed to wear civilian clothes."

Continually throughout this period the objectors made complaints, both as to their general treatment and particularly to the beating up, but nothing at all was done. We were told it was the order of the C.O.

When Cook, Bunday and Gibbs were up they were told they definitely would not be forced into uniform, and that Gibbs would appear for the appeal in civilian clothes. The C.O. told Cook when he arrived that there would be no appeal, and that nothing could be done as the military were in charge of the country.

The Newcastle F.C.O. has issued an excellent letter and leaflet on the Liverpool C.O.'s, signed by the Chairman, John Morley, of Rosslyn, Highfield Road, Westerhope, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

THE CHURCH AND CONSCIENCE

For several months we have been noting the reactions of the church to the question of war, and its inevitable expression of opposition, conscientious objection to the business of man being organised to kill his fellow man. In this article, we publish some items from our scrap book.

A curate, whose pacifist views "caused dissension in the parish," announced his resignation on March 5, 1940.

He was the Rev. J. Q. C. Hind, curate of St. Mary's, Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk, and is a son of the Bishop of Fukien, China.

"I am sorry to have caused this trouble," he said in a farewell message to the parishioners.

The vicar, the Rev. A. C. Pelly, said :—

"I think his sentiments do him credit, and I am sincerely sorry he should find it necessary to resign. It is grievous to think that the parish has not been able to tolerate, but rejects a man of sincere convictions leading to a Christian life, from whose opinions they differ."

In an appeal to his parishioners to "stick together," the vicar declared : "I am not pleading for pacifism, but for ordinary Christian fellowship."

Perhaps the vicar's regret explained why so many clerics are not merely pro-war, but aggressively militaristic. They are afraid to defend conscience or pacifism in war-time, but breathe peace in peace time. It is strange they can uphold national war, yet attack the working class, but never the capitalist class, in time of strike and industrial riot. It is not bravery or patriotism that moves such clerical imposters, but convention. They are afraid to swim against the tide.

In May, the Rev. J. G. Byrnell, vicar of St. James Church, Selby, inserted an advertisement in the Yorkshire Evening Press, stating that conscientious objectors need not apply for the post of organist at the church.

Interviewed by a Press reporter, Mr. Byrnell said that the church had been without an organist since Easter and he was having great difficulty in filling the vacancy, although there was no real shortage of organists. Of eight applicants for the position five were conscientious objectors.

The reporter said : "Surely they are entitled to respect for their views?"

Vicar Byrnell replied :—

"While the sons and husbands of members of my congregation are risking their lives for the country men eligible for military service will not find a soft billet in my parish."

The vicar concluded :—

"I would sooner put a handle on the organ than have a conscientious objector on the staff of the church."

The Rev. F. Ferguson, rector of St. Paul's, Carlton, Nottingham, in the June issue of his parish magazine, wrote :—

"It makes one sick to read the drivelling nonsense talked by conscientious objectors, and talked in the name of religion. These men invariably quote the Scripture ; then let them remember what the Scriptures say about a group of people who refused to stand by their country in its hour of need."

And what do the Scriptures say? Besides, is obedience to the Government always an expression of standing by the country? Do the Germans who obey Hitler and his gang practise standing by their country or their government? The "conchie" may utter cant phrases. But so do conventional militarist sky-pilots. We doubt the sincerity of many Bible-quoting "conchies" and we doubt the sincerity equally of militarist parsons and persecuting politicians.

"To surrender to Hitlerism would be to betray truth, to trample down justice, to sell Christ anew for the price of our physical safety. Hitler and Mussolini have not hesitated to say that they deem the Christian Church to be the greatest barrier to their dream of world conquest, consequently they would willingly destroy the Church. In Germany those Christians who have clung to New Testament Christianity are being tortured body and soul. If Jesus Christ were back in the flesh He would be publicly flogged in the streets of Germany as he was once flogged in the court of Pilate, for it is a crime in Germany to be born of a Jewish mother. . . .

Did the Rev. F. Ferguson support the Spanish workers when they were struggling against Hitler and Mussolini? Is not Mussolini supported by very church-going statesmen who are governing Britain? Maybe, Jesus would be flogged in the streets of Berlin. But if Jesus lived in Britain, and objected to war, the Rev. F. Ferguson would jail and persecute him also.

We do not object to the Rev. F. Ferguson being patriotic. We object to him dragging in Jesus and the Church. He also speaks, not godliness, but merely national patriotism—conventionalism.

The Rev. R. F. Hurst, Vicar of Cleveleys, is another fire-eating cleric. In his June magazine he demanded the dismissal of all conscientious objectors. He said :—

"If conscientious objectors have a right to exercise their moral judgment so have the ratepayers generally. Their moral judgment rebels against keeping someone in safety when their own menfolk are having to risk life and limb."

He related a query put to him :—

"A ratepayer said to me a few days ago, 'Is it right that my two lads should be in the Army and that I should also, through the rates, help to pay the wage of someone the same age and keep him in a soft job?' I believe it to be absolutely unfair."

He condemned C.O.'s, in a long passage, urging that they ought to starve. His main argument was in the sentence : "They leave other men to do the fighting for them."

Of course, they do nothing of the kind. They simply say, fighting ought not to take place, and they will not take part in it. As a matter of fact, the ratepayers, who bleat so much now, paid no heed when Socialists warned them against Hitlerism, and how finance was building it up. These same ratepayers went their way, in scorn and indifference, helping the world drift into the hell of war : and now they cry, that for their criminal folly, for their toryisms, respectabilities, mental laziness, and past moral cowardice, others must pay. We never expected the Church to think. But we might be forgiven for expecting it to show some moral understanding. The world is in hell because the orthodox and the conventional cowardly left the Spanish workers to fight for them, and the Socialists to think for them. They are paying to-day for their football coupons' ramp.

Another cleric who could not last the distance, a hysterical creature devoid of a background of intellectual conviction, is the Rev. Perry Mitchinson, 25-year-old curate of St. Philip's Church, Sheffield, a former pacifist, member of the National Council of the Peace Pledge Union, chairman of the Sheffield branch of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and clerical secretary of the Sheffield Anglican Pacifist Fellowship. He told the Sheffield Telegraph readers, on June 18, that he thought that ninety per cent. of conscientious objectors are funks and cowards.

His denunciation of C.O.'s was given big headlines. Here is a gem from his denunciation :—

"To take ration cards, eat rationed foods, pay taxes and rates, which all help the war, and then to refuse to fight, is sheer funk, and cowardice. Ninety per cent. of the conscientious objectors are 'yellow.' They should be rounded up and put in jail. The best thing they could do would be to find themselves a desert island and stay there."

And here is his personal apology :—

"If I were not in Holy Orders, I would volunteer for service."

This man hides behind God. His statement is an implied lie. Men in holy orders are exempt from conscription. There is nothing in any Act of Parliament to prevent them from volunteering for active service. Let this 25-year-old ex-pacifist, and bellowing hero, the Rev. Perry Mitchinson, join the colours. If he does not do so, he should be boycotted by every decent citizen.

The Rev. C. T. Cribb, Vicar of Oldbury, shares the views of the Rev. Perry Mitchinson. In the West Bromwich Weekly News, he expressed his objection to those who believe that Jesus took the world as it was — a world of violent political and racial feelings—and tried, by non-violent teaching and example, to change it. But the Rev. C. T. Cribb served during the last war. At the outbreak of war he left University College, Durham, where he was studying for his degree, to join the Forces. He rose to the rank of captain and adjutant of the 4th Brigade, R.F.A. He served in France, India, Mesopotamia and Palestine, and was wounded and mentioned in despatches—Mr. Cribb did not hide behind his vestments.

The Rev. Donald A. Shute, Curate-in-charge, was outspoken in his parish magazine for May in an attack on the Peace Pledge Union and its activities.

The Rev. T. Wilson, Vicar of St. Peter's, Belsize Square, Hampstead, writing in his parish magazine, for May, denounced pacifism as dangerous nonsense. He defined Hitler's appetite for power as "insatiable."

Rev. J. A. Carter, "old sweat" of the Great War, and now Vicar of Hillington, Leamington, stated in his July letter to his parishioners, that the bishops should withdraw the licences of the 400 Church of England clergy who belong to P.P.U.

Mr. Carter served throughout the great war. He joined up in 1914 as a "ranker" in the Dragoon Guards, and was demobilised in 1920, with the rank of lieutenant.

Denouncing conscientious objectors, and the clergy who defend them, the Rev. J. A. Carter asked how these clergy could reconcile their oaths of allegiance to the King to their teaching and influencing the youth of their parishes in their refusal to serve in the armed Forces?

When the war is over, says the Rev. T. Chadwick, Vicar of Darlaston, Staffs, in his July parish magazine, all conscientious objectors should be deported to "some distant land." He praises the action of local authorities in sacking objectors. Many objectors, however, still hold jobs with local authorities, complains the vicar. He adds :—

"We are fighting for conscience; the right to live in a free world. The cowardly objectors ought at once to lose their vote and their positions, be given a soldier's wage, formed into an Objectors' Company, and made to work on the land."

The Rev. W. R. Jellie, in the St. Paul's Argyle Street Parish Magazine, for May, says :—

"There has been a good deal of correspondence in the local Press lately about conscientious objectors. St. John Ambulance for instance have refused to admit them as members and in other parts of the country they have suffered a good deal of abuse and persecution. I do hope that all Churchmen will take very good care not to join in this outcry and to keep clear of actions which are not only contrary to all British traditions but in every way out of tune with the Christian spirit.

"Personally I am far from being a C.O. . . . When we are all knit together in the great effort of the war it is most annoying to find people who will not join us, but at the same time there are many who have a sincere and deep-rooted conscientious objection to taking part in any form of military service and while that objection remains it would be a sin for them to do so. . . .

"We would do well to remember that as a people we have entered this war for freedom of thought, freedom of conscience and speech and are fighting against persecution and the spirit that would destroy every one who will not conform to type. As Christians we have taught the sanctity of the conscience and the duty of every man and woman to follow its teaching and, should we join in this outcry, we would be but poor Christians and do our country a great disservice."

The Chief Rabbi, Dr. J. H. Hertz, in a statement issued on June 6, 1940, regarding Jewish conscientious objectors, says :—

"I have again been asked what is the Jewish religious position in regard to those who claim exemption from military service on conscientious grounds. My answer is : There is no basis for such a claim in Judaism, which ranks defence of country among the supreme duties. None should have a clearer understanding of this than his Majesty's Jewish subjects, in a war against heathen forces that have made the annihilation of the Jew one of the main aims of their infamous policy, and at an hour when the sacred heritage of man is in mortal danger at the hands of these same heathen forces."

The pacifist vicar of St. Lawrence's Church, Mansfield, the Rev. T. A. Rockley, was asked by the Church Council to explain his views in the parish magazine for June. Mr. Rockley offered to resign the living, but the council passed a unanimous vote of confidence in him.

Mr. Rockley denied that pacifism was preached from his pulpit. Since the war he has purposely refrained from expressing his views in church. But he believes war is contrary to the teaching of Jesus Christ.

He adds:—

"Let me make it quite clear that the majority—the vast majority—of the people of St. Lawrence's do not share my views in this matter. They are in good company of both Archbishops and most of the Bishops and clergy and congregations throughout the land."

Whilst it is supposed to be right for ministers of military age to preach militarism and war, whilst skulking in the pulpit, hiding behind their cloth of superstition, creed, and greed, it is wrong for a minister, who is opposed to war, to bear witness to his views!

The President of the Methodist Conference, the Rev. Richard Pyke, told a large congregation in the Wentworth Street Church, Peterborough, on Monday, May 27, that though he respected the genuine conscientious objector and would stand by him, he would not make a hero of him. His hero was a man who went out and knew he might never return. He thought it was wrong for a man who held pacifist and conscientious objector views to take advantage of a pulpit to give personal point of view to 99 people out of a hundred who deplored those views, and who had boys dying at the front.

Mr. Pyke spoke of two Methodists who had been reported to him by the chairman of a meeting for not rising for the National Anthem.

He thought that conscientious objectors should not take advantage of the pulpits for their views, at a time like this.

After reading two letters sent by ministers of religion in the town and Miss B. H. Roberts, secretary of the Bury branch of the League of Nations Union, drawing attention to the Council's attitude towards Corporation employees who are conscientious objectors, Councillor S. Lord, at Bury Town Council meeting on Tuesday, July 9, called for the removal of the Rev. A. Booth, of Brunswick Methodist Church, and Miss Roberts from the local Ministry of Information Committee.

One of the letters was from the Bury Methodist Council, signed by the Rev. A. Booth and the Rev. Bernard Barker. The other letter was signed by the Rev. H. Allmark, St. John's; the Rev. H. Lonsdale, New Road Congregational Church; the Rev. J. W. Maw, Bank Street Unitarians; the Rev. A. E. Mobbs, Chesham Unitarians; and Miss Roberts. Both letters were forwarded to the Ministry of Information.

The Methodist Synod of the Bolton and Rochdale districts, meeting at Chorley on May 18, passed a resolution "regarding with deep concern the tendency in civic and other spheres to victimise conscientious objectors.

Two ministers who inserted an advertisement in a Kirkcaldy newspaper offering advice and information to conscientious objectors were condemned by Kirkcaldy Presbytery.

The Rev. John Williamson, Kirkcaldy, drew the Presbytery's attention to the advertisement, which read:—

"National Service Armed Forces Act. Any men who have registered as conscientious objectors and who desire advice or information may have the same by applying to the Rev. John Anderson, Innerleven Manse, Methil, or the Rev. Robert Murray, the Manse of St. Michaels, Buckhaven."

The Rev. Hugh Menzies, Dysart, expressed the opinion that it was really a matter for the police, and the Presbytery should take no notice of it.

The Rev. A. Renshaw Mackay, Kirkcaldy, moved that the Presbytery disapprove of the activities of the two ministers in encouraging young men to evade their military services and dissociates itself from such action.

On a vote this was carried by 26 votes to 25.

(To be concluded)

CUNNINGHAM REID

In the August Word we dealt with the scandal of evacuation and exit permits for M.P.'s. One person indicted was Captain A. S. Cunningham-Reid, Marylebone's 44-year old M.P.

A special meeting was held of the St. Marylebone Conservative and Constitutional Union behind locked doors at Portman Rooms, Baker Street, London, on Saturday, October 26. The meeting lasted nearly two and a half hours, and Cunningham-Reid repeated his refusal to resign three times.

Strict privacy was enforced at the meeting. Officers of the union were on guard at the doors to make sure that no one who was not a member got inside.

Everyone had to produce an official letter of invitation. Some who were not members tried to get in, but were turned away.

One woman who pleaded that she was a voter produced her national identity card, but this was of no avail. A large proportion of those present were women.

A resolution was moved declaring that Marylebone had not been properly represented by its M.P. and calling upon him to resign.

Captain Cunningham-Reid said:

"I have no intention to-day, if the vote is carried against me of resigning."

Mr. W. W. Wakefield, M.P. for Swindon, then addressed the meeting. He said:

"I have been a very regular attendant at the House, and I can count on the fingers of both hands the number of times I have seen Captain Cunningham-Reid in the House.

"When he goes to the divisions he goes at a time when he knows there are going to be a dozen divisions on the same night. It is an old trick of certain members.

"Members of all parties have the utmost contempt for your member."

After a local Alderman had asked him to be less personal in his remarks, Mr. Wakefield continued:

"If I have over-stated the case, I will unreservedly withdraw the statement, but I insist that the constituency would be better represented by a Socialist than by Captain Cunningham-Reid.

"When I was in America recently people were saying to me: 'What is Cunningham-Reid doing in America? Why isn't he in Britain doing his job of work, or looking after his constituency?'"

"Tens of thousands of people there are anxious to take our people in, and it was not necessary for Captain Cunningham-Reid to go across the Atlantic in connection with the scheme of evacuation.

"So fas as I know the only two people he has evacuated are his own two children.

"I hope the meeting will ask him to resign, and I hope he will have the decency to do it."

Captain Cunningham-Reid replied. He declared that the remarks of Mr. Wakefield were "vitrolic insults" beneath contempt. He described the opposition as "a few soured members and ex-members of the Marylebone political organisation" and denounced the "disgraceful manner in which" they "had conducted themselves recently." They had insulted kind and generous citizens who had offered to take British evacuee children. They had hampered his efforts to get the children of Marylebone to safety.

Cunningham-Reid referred to the remarks made by Mrs. Mavis Tate, M.P. for Frome, in the House of Commons, concerning his visit to America. These observations, culled from Hansard, were reported in our August issue. Cunningham-Reid said she was "not only irresponsible, but untruthful" in what she said in the Commons. Mrs. Cromwell, an old American friend of his, had made Marylebone an offer through him that had been universally recognised as the war's most generous individual contribution. She was prepared to provide in the U.S.A. a home for 500 children for an indefinite period. Mrs. Cromwell was unable to make all these detailed arrangements and asked him to do it for her. He had been trying to get hundreds of Marylebone children to safety in the United States, and yet he was asked to resign.

Previous to this speech, replying to Mr. Wakefield, a letter was read from Mr. Cunningham-Reid, defending his position. In this letter to members, he asked them, as a union, to support resolutions conveying to the American people their thanks for the offer of sanctuary for the children.

When the motion asking for the resignation was put the chairman said it was carried by a substantial majority on a show of hands.

Captain Cunningham-Reid then asked for a ballot.

A resolution calling on him to resign was carried by 83 votes to 24, and there were cries of "resign."

A resolution approving Sir John Fitzgerald as prospective candidate was also passed.

Captain Cunningham-Reid declared that in view of his declaration that he would not resign the resolution adopting Sir John became futile.

We approve entirely of the censure passed on Cunningham-Reid and we hope that he will meet with the moral, social and political boycott his conduct merits. But we are opposed to all or any M.P.'s and public characters visiting the United States at the present times on lecture tours, away from the centre of danger. This applies to alleged Socialist as well as to Tory M.P.'s, and even to literary characters, who are said to be over-age. The present war menaces the lives of civilians, and it is the duty of every British citizen, pacifist or militarist, to remain in the danger zone until the conflict is ended. Whatever attitude we adopt, the place to adopt it is in Britain. We are opposed to all exit permits, unless some special purpose or cause can be shown.

ON CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

As stated in our August issue, the question of conscientious objectors has been discussed in "Letters to the Editor" in papers published in every part of the English-speaking world. To the excerpts then published, we add a further selection.

Education, London, for August 23, publishes the following interesting letter from that stalwart Anti-Militarist Unitarian Minister, the Rev. Richard Lee, M.A.:—

Sir,—The dismissal of Conscientious Objectors by Councils all over the country is a sad reflection on the intelligence of the elected representatives who are responsible for this victimization.

Such dismissal means—

(1) That the Councillors usurp the position of the Tribunals appointed by the Government and defy the law of the land.

(2) That the spirit of Hitlerism, which assumes that the state has the only conscience to be recognised, has invaded the minds of these Councillors.

(3) That there is class distinction in persecuting defenceless teachers. No one suggested that the late George Lansbury or Lord Ponsonby or Bishop Barnes should be deposed from their positions. The two Archbishops have, indeed, admitted recently that conscientious objectors inside the Church are exercising a holy vocation.

I do not think the man with a genuine conscience needs any pity. One can only pity those who use their authority to drive men out of their profession.

Yours, etc.,
RICHARD LEE,
Chairman, Coventry Education Committee.

August 18, 1940.

The effect of Richard Lee's stand is referred to in the following letter, published in the Midland Daily Telegraph, Coventry, for July 3:—

Sir,—I should like to be among the first to publicly congratulate Coventry City Council upon its sensibly broad-minded decision to retain "C.O.'s."

I should like to anticipate possible critics of my defence of the conscientious objector by stating that I am not a "C.O." I do, however, like to feel that I am still a democrat!—Yours faithfully,

H. LAKIN.

66 Tennyson Road, Coventry.
July 2.

The Richmond Herald, Surrey, during August, published a correspondence on the subject of conscientious objection. Bernard Jolivard, writing from Barnes, wanted conscientious objectors compelled, despite the conscience clauses, to fight for "Liberty and Freedom." A Mr. Hurdle answered him by pointing out that a Pacifist "usually tries to do his bit in peace time as well as in war-time." To that—in the Richmond Herald for August 31—J. E. Thompson, Junr. of 48 Newell Road, Barnes, added, "the Pacifist not only tries, but does his bit."

Bernard Jolivard published his final words on the subject in the Richmond Herald, for September 7:—

"In peace there's nothing so becomes a man as modest stillness and humility; but when the blast of war blows in our ears, then imitate the action of the tiger."

A cheerful motto. But Mr. Jolivard forgot that even the tiger does not destroy its own species.

The Yorkshire Gazette, for July 5, published a long letter from Desmond Neill, Clerk to Preparative Meeting, Society of Friends, York, expressing deep concern at the decision of the York City Council to dismiss conscientious objectors. The York Society of Friends described the decision as "a retrograde step."

A similar view was taken by the Archbishop of York, in his York Diocesan Leaflet, issued on August 16. He described as "utterly deplorable and in the deepest sense unpatriotic" the action of such public bodies as have "lately passed resolutions terminating the employment of any persons working for them who have pleaded conscientious objection to military service."

A feeble attempt to reply to this protest by the Archbishop was made in a letter, signed "J.A.M.," published in The Scotsman, Edinburgh, for August 21.

Writing from Polmood, the author of this almost anonymous letter says:—

"The State recognises the liberty of an individual to be an agnostic or an atheist, but should the Archbishop of York terminate the services of one of his household servants, whom he might find to be an agnostic or an atheist, would it be fair for a public body to stigmatise this action as "utterly deplorable and in the deepest sense unpatriotic"?

The Manchester Guardian has published some interesting letters on the C.O. question. In the issue for June 28, G. A. Sutherland wrote from Dalton Hall, Victoria Park, Manchester, 14, attacking the Stockport Town Council for victimising C.O's. He claimed that C.O's. are protected by the National Service (Armed Forces) Prevention of Evasion Regulations, 1939.

H. M. Bunbury, writing from Dudley Lodge, Prestwick, in reply to Mr. Sutherland, in the Manchester Guardian, for July 2, pointed out that the termination of a contract of employment of a conscientious objector was not a punishable offence under the National Service (Armed Forces) (Prevention of Evasion) Regulations, 1939 (S.R.O. 1099 of 1939).

Section 5 of those regulations reads:—

"These regulations shall only apply to a case where the employment has been terminated before the date upon which the person employed was called up for service under the Act—i.e., the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939."

This means that regulations only apply to persons who are liable to be called up for service. It is thus necessary to ascertain what the "services" are for which a person can be "called up." These are to be found in subsection 5 of section 14 of the Act and are:—

"Called up under the Military Training Act, 1939; called out under the Reserve and Auxiliary Forces Act, 1939; called up under this Act; called into actual service, ordered to join the Royal Navy, ordered to serve in the Royal Marine forces, called out on permanent service, embodied or called out for service, under the permanent enactments relating to his Majesty's reserve or auxiliary forces."

None of these services are "duties or obligations" which can be imposed on a conscientious objector by a tribunal under the provisions of section 5, subsection 6 of the Act. Moreover, it is expressly enacted in subsection 10 of section 5 of the Act that "a person shall not be liable under this Act to be called up for service so long as he is registered in the register of conscientious objectors."

It is thus clear that a registered conscientious objector is not liable for any of the services covered by the Act. He cannot receive a calling-up notice and therefore, by the terms of section 5 of S.R.O. 1099, the regulations do not apply to him and he is not protected by them. The contract of employment of a conscientious objector must, of course, be determined in accordance with the terms of the contract; otherwise he will be entitled to the common law remedy for wrongful dismissal.

The provisions of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1940, must not be overlooked. This Act confers an overriding authority on the Minister of Labour to order the disposition of any person for defence purposes, including an order that such person shall remain at his post.

In the Guardian, for September 10, D. Bowman, of 12 Clifton Avenue, Fallowfield, Manchester, protested against the decision of the Manchester City Council to dismiss conscientious objector employees. He concluded his protest with these wise words of rebuke:—

"Men who hold fast to tried convictions are not to be summarily dismissed from serving the community because their convictions are those of a minority; it is neither a democratic nor an economic proposition. To dismiss trained men in these times means inefficiency and waste."

The Birmingham Gazette, for July 1, published a letter from the Rev. Herbert G. Wood, President of the Birmingham Free Church Ministers' Fraternal, protesting against the Birmingham City Council "penalising men for convictions honestly held." Mr. Wood describes the attack on conscientious objectors as "undiscriminating and unjust," and avers that "it overrides the findings of the Tribunals."

To the same effect, but from a somewhat different angle, is the letter published in the Burton Daily Mail, for June 18:—

Sir,—The decision of our Town Council to dismiss all conscientious objectors at present employed by the Corporation was no doubt arrived at after the responsible committee had studied the matter in all its aspects, but the fact remains that the State has decreed that if a man satisfies a tribunal that he is a conscientious objector, then he shall be exempt from military service.

After reading your report of the debate upon this subject, I am prompted to ask the quetion, "What right has Councillor Walters to pass judgment on the conscientious objector? Did he serve in the last war to end war? Is he serving in this war for freedom?' If not, his statement that in present circumstances we cannot afford to employ men who will do nothing to defend homes, wives and children against an enemy desirous of annihilating the human race, is sheer cant and humbug.

As one who saw service in France during the last war, I hold no brief for the C.O., but these men have, at least, the courage of their convictions.

If the C.O. is to be criticised, let the fighting man do it; he is the only one with the right to do so.—Yours, etc.,

D. HAYWOOD.

The following letter appeared in Time and Tide, London, for May 18:—

Sir,—In the matter of Conscientious Objectors I think we need a further distinction between those who will not fight because they do not believe in war, or in this war; and those who want the war to be won but whose nervous constitution is such that they cannot take an active part in it. These latter should not rightly come into the category of conscientious objection at all, but there is no other category for them so they sometimes take refuge in this one because it is against the English tradition to plead "nervously unfit." Such people, if sent to fight, would ultimately fill the ranks of mental hospitals and become burdens to themselves and to the State. Why not, therefore, use them productively as they are willing to be used, by recognizing their existence and their equal rights to a case with physical unfits and conscientious objectors?— I am, etc.,

The Newcastle Daily Journal, August 28, published the following letter:—

Sir,—Having heard and read a great deal about the Conscientious Objectors and having a little time at my disposal, I called in at the tribunal at Newcastle last week to hear and see for myself how these individuals were dealt with. I may say, as one who loves freedom of thought and expression, I was not enamoured in the least.

The law was framed to grant exemption to those who had a conscientious objection to military service of any sort, but, the surprising thing to me was not one obtained that exemption, although they seemed to merit it.

There were some fine intellectual young men who seemed very earnest and sincere in their beliefs and convictions, but the members of the tribunal seemed to think it their duty to prevent exemption instead of granting it.

The composition of the tribunal is not all that could be desired either. I came away with the opinion that perhaps the inclusion of two ministers, i.e. men with a knowledge of the scriptures, would have kept out that narrow spirit which should not be present.

We should keep in mind, as all the leaders of our nation have told us, that we are fighting to retain liberty. Let us then not withhold it from our fellowman in free England.

E. GODDARD.

The Evesham Journal and Four Shires Advertiser published a leading article in its issue for May 1, headed "AN ABUSE OF LIBERTY," attacking conscientious objectors. Mr. H. N. Horne, of 15 Hatherley Gardens, London, replied in the following issue.

From his lengthy and vigorous letter of protest, we make these excerpts:—

"It is strange to read your statement, in the name of Liberty, that "the State has an absolute moral right to compel the services of the individual in times of national danger." It is for resisting the claim that the State has final and absolute rights in the realm of religion and morals that Martin Niemöller is in a concentration camp to-day.

"If we are concerned to vindicate freedom and to build Peace, those men who are determined to maintain freedom of conscience at all costs to themselves and are more concerned with peace than with victory, are playing a vital part in that vindication."

From the Shields Gazette, for May 29, 1940:—

C.O.'s EXPLANATION.

Sir,—With your kind permission, I would like to bring to the notice of your readers the following points.

As a conscientious objector, I have recently been accused of taking up an anti-British attitude. Taking the bare statement as published by your paper re "Not proud of being English," this is quite a reasonable accusation, but, to get to a true perspective, it is necessary to gain a little more information.

In my case, as presented to Judge Richardson, I explained that I had freed myself from the emotions of racial pride and racial hatred because I believed that they were two of the emotions which led countries to war. I considered that loving one's own country and hating other countries, being blinded by patriotism, etc., were all emotions calculated to lead us to the slaughtering of our fellowmen.

To bolster up our pride it was often necessary to read of our country's many achievements or, secondly, to hear disparaging comments about other countries. Such an atmosphere was not conducive to peace, hence my desire to eliminate it. To get an unprejudiced viewpoint it was surely a sign of honesty to try and eliminate racial hatred. To try and love the whole of the people of the world, whether they be black or white, red or yellow, was I think, a pro-British attitude.

In the light of such statements, the comments, "He's ashamed he is British," "He hates the British," are unjust, and I ask, in all fairness, that Judge Richardson confirm my statement that I eliminated these emotions because I believed that they led to War.

The Ottawa Citizen, July 8, published a Canadian view:—

Editor, Citizen,—To single out two or three eminent pacifists, and hold them up to the public eye as having changed their minds in an effort to prove it is right to wage war, seems to me quite beside the point. Having done that in your editorial yesterday (24th inst.), how would you like to write something about the 39,000 conscientious objectors in the British Isles who have not "bowed before the logic of events," as you said that others have done?

Quoting Miss Macphail as an example does not prove anything either. Was hers a political pacifism or a spiritual pacifism?

I think that you, Mr. Editor, will agree with me when I say that spiritual convictions do not "bow before the logic of events." But you would not print it as your political opinion.

Now that conscription of "mind" has come to Canada by law, readers of your back page will be looking for your broad-minded opinions and a fair deal for conscientious objectors and I for one sincerely hope we shall not be disappointed.

Ottawa, June 18, 1940.

Unity, Chicago, Ill., U.S.A., for April 15, published a letter from which we quote in part:—

Toward the end of 1939, the first issue of The Conscientious Objector appeared. It was published because it was felt that something more than pacifist pamphlets was needed in the anti-war movement, in view of the day-to-day changes in the European situation and the growing domestic agitation for war. To-day the paper is established as an organ of the War Resisters League (National), the New York section of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and the Peace and Service Committee of the New York Monthly Meeting of Friends (Quakers). Other groups support it by acting as distributing centres.

The aim of the paper is to show the sham and futility of war, to strive for the removal of the causes of war, and to inform and support those who are opposed to all wars.

We have received letters from all parts of the country, from professors and students, workmen and housewives, religious organisations and non-sectarian groups, all congratulating the paper for the good job it is doing in gathering and reporting news of interest to those who are opposed to war. . . .

LANSBURY'S WILL

The will of the late Mr. George Lansbury, M.P., was proved, on Friday, August 30, at the comparatively small sum, considering his activity and opportunities, of £1695.

He directed that his remains should be cremated and the ashes thrown into the sea somewhere off Land's End. His explanation was typical of the man and defined his dreams. Lansbury stated:—

"I desire this, because, although I love England very dearly and consider this lovely island the best spot in the world, I am a convinced internationalist and like to feel I am just a tiny part of universal life which will one day break down all divisions of creed and speech and economic barriers and make mankind one great eternal unit both in life and death."

LONDON COMMENTARY

By Annesley Aldred

For some months now I have been intending to bring up-to-date my comments on activity in London. Now that I find myself able to do so, it would probably be more appropriate, in a grimly humorous way, to call it "Coal-hole commentary." For with Total War in full force, with every member of the working-class in the front line, and with the East End of London already a shambles, the first question asked when a new flat is sought is "what is the cellar like?"

London has always seemed to me to resemble a rabbit warren—for one can travel from one's home to one's work for years without ever seeing more than a few hundred yards, at most, of the town. Now the resemblance is even more exact, for even one's eating and sleeping is done underground.

In point of fact the situation is full of paradoxes, for one cannot but deplore the wholesale bombing of the working-class districts of the East End, yet those are the very slums which should have been demolished years ago; one cannot help feeling that the ordinary organisational activities are trivial and unimportant, and yet at the same time one feels that this is the proof, if proof were needed, that our pacifist and socialist ideals are right, and serves to strengthen our beliefs and to stress the importance of the need for ensuring that this shall never happen again; and finally amidst the noise and turmoil caused by falling bombs and exploding anti-aircraft shells one can find opportunity for that "quiet contemplation" which is necessary if one is to keep things in their proper perspective.

It is, however, the ability to accept the opportunity that is the priceless asset, for otherwise in the long dark hours of the night it is easy to to be overcome by despondency and despair—and we have no time for either if all that we have to do is to be accomplished.

The immediate concern seems to be to weigh up the reactions of the "bombees" not from the military machine viewpoint of "morale," but from the anti-militarist viewpoint of the possibility of preventing this war-horror from recurring.

Let us consider firstly the pacifists themselves. On the whole my impression is that, in so far as this is precisely what we have foretold, this phase of the war does not really affect our outlook. But there are certain elements who, although previously quite uncompromising, feel that from the humanitarian viewpoint they should undertake such work as ambulance driving or stretcher bearing. What to do at this hour is, momentarily, a difficult problem and, so long as it involves no serious compromise, a matter of comparatively small ultimate importance. But the main point is that there does exist a determination to continue the struggle against war—which, in most cases, is combined with an understanding of the causes of war.

But what of those who, however grudgingly, are giving support to the war. For at least the first six months of the war the vast majority of these people were indifferent and apathetic. They had no enthusiasm at all for the war and, for the most part, agreed that war, in the abstract sense, was terrible. But their standard excuse was "what else could we do?"

But this attitude is no longer tenable and those who thought thus are split into, roughly, three sections. (a) Those who know only an intense hatred of everything German and who only know that they want revenge and want to completely crush Germany. To these people that is the only important thing, and if you pin them down they will tell you that German militarism is inherent in all Germans and that to crush Germany will, and is the only way to, stop war. (b) Those who realise to the full the horrors of war and in general understand its cause but feel that the only thing to be done at the moment is to crush Hitler and Fascism and then try to rebuild society in such a way as to prevent a recurrence in another 20 years. (c) Those who realise the futility of war and who realise, too late, that they have everything to lose and nothing to gain. Many of these have made no deep study of the question, and have no great understanding, but they sense, instinctively, that it is not the workers who want war, but it is the workers who pay for it.

What the relative strength of these groups is is a difficult question to answer. But it is certain that the last group is a very large minority which, if it can be aligned with the existent socialist-pacifist objectors, and strengthened by these members of the Labour and Trade Union movements, who are realising, belatedly, that once again they have been sold out by place-hunting leaders (and who will, certainly, be potential opponents of any future war-mongering efforts) will form the virile vanguard of a workers' movement which will sweep the decaying capitalist system, and the symbol of that decay—Fascism—to its final end; and will establish the beginnings of the new social order in which war will be no more because it will be unnecessary.

COLD FACTS

Some months ago we made a personal appeal for £166 13s. 3d. to cover losses on The Word prior to Christmas, 1939, and for the Free Speech case in Hyde Park. The total acknowledged up to last month was £83 4s. 10d. Since then we have received £2 7s. 2d. This makes £85 12s. received and leaves a sum of £81 1s. 3d. to come. We ask comrades to rally this amount this month.

We make a further appeal. The Word is the best paper produced in the Labour, Socialist, Pacifist, and Radical or Liberal Movements. Despite the cost of paper, it maintains its size and quality. It carries no paid advertisements. But there is a boycott placed upon it in every section of the so-called "advance" movement. We ask for the removal of this boycott. We appeal to every reader to make a new reader and to handle hustle orders. Persuade your friend to become an annual subscriber. The monthly loss on the paper is very heavy and we cannot carry the burden ourself any longer. Every reader must help.

Apart from The Word, the Strickland Press has issued nine pamphlets in "The Word" Library, first series, and two in the second series. These are large pamphlets and cover a range of study. Each one is produced at a loss. In the Strickland Classics we have published six pamphlets, including our latest, the "life" of Thomas Paine by Richard Carlile. Will comrades not help to circulate these splendid 2d. pamphlets. Paine should be a best seller.

Since December 1939, the loss on this printed propaganda has been £1,890 10s. It should be the duty of every comrade in a spirit of fair play, to end this loss at once. We shall publish full acknowledgements of donations received. This is a direct appeal to your solidarity. He who responds immediately doubles the value of his gift. Please help.

Send your donation to the editor at: Strickland Press, 104 George Street, Glasgow, C.1.

Comrades who are unable to send money could help our work by donations of Socialist and Freethought books. Send all parcels to The Strickland Press, 104 George Street, Glasgow, C.1. Such gifts would be welcomed.

TO YOU!

A cross at this paragraph means that your subscription has expired. Or we may have been sending you the paper free, feeling that you were interested. This paper is produced at a loss and we have had to reduce the amount printed each month to preserve the size and quality of the paper. If you like the paper and cannot afford to pay, we will send it still meantime. But we would like a word from you anyway. The annual subscription, owing to postal changes, is now 3s. 0d. Send to The Word, 104 George Street, Glasgow, C.1.

FINDLAY LANGMUIR

Do you recognise Procurator Fiscal Langmuir? The "Sunday Mail" photographer snapped this ordinary seaman of the British Navy in Glasgow, on Sunday, July 27. If Mr. Langmuir had been a "Socialist" and ex-conchie, he would have been wearing the robes of Lord Provost instead of a seaman's uniform.

Our essay on Findlay Langmuir, published in the October Word, contrasting the conduct and record of the non-Socialist Glasgow Police Procurator Fiscal against that of Glasgow's "Socialist" Lord Provost, brought us shoals of letters. Very few were critical. Most correspondents appreciated the contrast and emphasised their agreement. It was realised that every citizen, who expresses courage and integrity of living is contributing to the evolution of a new social order of peace, liberty, and commonweal. A large number of letters expressed gratitude to Findlay Langmuir for services rendered to the person writing. Folk who have never been in a jam cannot appreciate exactly what such services mean. Only those who do foolish things, or suffer, can value sympathy and understanding. Often a police official can render more social service than a recognised public philanthropist.

The letters received told how, in many cases, when he might have prosecuted, Findlay Langmuir enquired into the conditions that caused the offence, and so helped the offender out of his trouble, and even helped him to obtain a suitable job. Instead of aggravating sorrow by addition, the procurator fiscal tendered aid and wisdom.

It would be a breach of faith to publish such letters or to detail the facts they relate. We summarise the record because we honour and respect all bravery and every expression of human sympathy. Our regard for social service takes no account of social, legal, or political status. It is irrespective of race, creed, or position. This is true democracy and makes for progress. In these columns, we are prepared to pay tribute to conscientious objectors and to soldiers alike; to Catholics, Protestants, and Atheists; to Britons and Germans, wherever their conduct advances human understanding and well-being. We have one aim: to liquidate our criminal anti-social society in a higher and happier social order.

One letter received was different from the others. It was dated October 3. The writer was, and is, a prominent public official in Glasgow. The letter was non-political. Its writer, also, has, to our knowledge, rendered considerable service to anxious and troubled citizens of Glasgow: soldiers' wives, widows, etc. All manner of poor folk needing advice and assistance. He has assisted smiles to take the place of tears on many weary faces. Such service has been given readily and spontaneously. For this we honour the writer, although we are unable to give his name or position. We quote his letter:—

"Glasgow, October 3, 1940.

"Your article in The Word interests me very much. For a man who has succeeded and perhaps tasted all the good things of life, to start again at nearly 40 years of age, in the lower deck, just for an ideal—to serve his country, shows his sterling worth; but that is typical of Jimmy Langmuir, who I am honoured to know. Courtesy therefore demands that at least I can write and say thank you!"

We endorse this tribute: and we recalled its terms the other day when we saw a group of alleged "Socialist" leaders, including the Lord Provost and Neil Maclean, M.P., photographed flirting with militarism. This was not because they believe in a war for freedom, but from servitude to the conventionalism of the day. Their aim is not to serve on the "lower deck," and to start all over again, but to exploit the idealism of the people in order that they might keep as far from the "lower deck" as possible, without rendering any service at all.

(Concluded from Column 3)

although he will speak in the chamber in due course, and probably with more radical understanding than the rationalist Labour peer, Lord Snell. He aims to address the common people with his pen. His challenges to them are direct and simple: "Why Not Think?" and "Where there is no vision, the people perish."

What the Duke of Bedford must come to realise, as he contacts the common people more completely, is that, if the workers think, and if they develop vision, they must turn to Socialism and the social revolution it involves. Capitalism has given us a surfeit of bloodshed and destruction. Only social revolution can bring peace and construction. Society needs radical economic change.

It has been announced in the press that among the first to respond to the appeal for country houses to be equipped as nursery centres for babies who have been bombed out of their own homes was the Duke of Bedford. He has given his house near Rickmansworth, Buckinghamshire, for this purpose.

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

In our next issue we shall publish an essay by the Duke of Bedford, addressed to all Socialists, entitled: An Examination of Some Criticisms of The Capitalist State." With this essay, we expect to begin the publication of several articles from this writer's pen, all submitted to and for Left Wing criticism. The Duke of Bedford will contribute these articles, knowing quite well the character of this journal, and the principles for which it stands, because he is a pacifist and not a fascist, and because he is concerned with problems of social reconstruction that must arise out of the war.

The Bedford family is a family of wealthy landowners, dating back to the time of the Tudors and the seizure of the monasteries. The family is also the Russell family and includes Bertrand Earl Russell, with whom the Labour and Freethought movements flirted during the last war. Earl Russell is descended from Lord John Russell, born in 1792, first Earl Russell, and third son of the then Duke of Bedford.

Lord William Russell—son of the 5th Earl of Bedford, who was created the first Duke of Bedford—was executed in company with that famous Republican and tyrannicide, Algernon Sidney, for high treason. The fourth Duke of Bedford adopted the same attitude towards war, at a time of crisis, as the present, twelth Duke of Bedford. At that time Britain was at war with revolutionary France and not reactionary Germany. British statesmen said exactly the same things about revolutionary France as is said to-day about reactionary Germany.

In the House of Lords, on January 25, 1795, the Duke of Bedford moved the following resolution concerning Britain's relations with France:

> "That no form of government, which may prevail in France, should preclude a negotiation with that country, or prevent a peace whenever it could be made consistently with the honour, interest, and security of this nation."

Only one bishop supported this mild and reasonable resolution — the celebrated Dr. Watson, Bishop of Llandaff. From then on, notwithstanding his replies to Gibbon and Paine, the bishop was suspected of sedition, blasphemy, and infidelity. His successor knew better than to associate himself with the political attitudes of the Bedfords; and when, on October 8, 1831, the fifth Duke of Bedford voted with the House of Lords minority in support of the Reform Bill, the then Bishop of Llandaff voted with the reactionary majority.

The Duke of Bedford does not expect much from addressing himself to the House of Lords,

HAMMERSMITH C.O.'s SUICIDE

A verdict of suicide was recorded at Hammersmith on Saturday, September 21, by Dr. Broadbridge, the coroner, on David Hubert Edward Hurst Hill, aged 20, a junior clerk, employed by the Hammersmith Borough Council.

Hill was one of the most active members of the P.P.U. Group associated with Oaklands Church, although not a member of the church. He instituted the Hyde Park P.P.U. Stand, that was afterwards taken over by the P.P.U. Forward Movement. He was active in the Hammersmith Youth Parliament and was one of the two secretaries of that organisation.

In June, he was given exemption from military service by the Bloomsbury Tribunal on condition he remained in his occupation as junior clerk in Hammersmith Borough Health Department.

Mrs. Eva Ockenden, Hill's landlady, of Aycliffe Road, W.12, said he had been a lodger at her house since the end of March. She understood that he suffered from nerves. On September 19 he was going out to post a letter, but as there was an air raid warning she asked him to go to a shelter. He declined, saying he would return home. When she returned home at six o'clock the following morning she found him on the floor of the scullery. There was a smell of gas.

Witness said he was lying full length by the gas stove, which had all six taps full on.

Dr. Keith Simpson, pathologist, said the cause of death was coal gas poisoning.

Albert Henry Hill, a watchmaker, of Salisbury, identified his son, whom he last saw alive at Portsmouth last December.

P.s. 38F said he was called to the address at Aycliffe Road on the morning of September 20 and found the boy on the scullery floor. The gas had been turned off; the oven door was open. A doctor who was called in said life was extinct. Witness did not find any letters from deceased. No special preparations had been made and there were so suspicious circumstances.

Mr. Alan Mackay, Superintendent of the Mortuaries at Hammersmith and Bloemfontein Road, said he first met the deceased two days before his death when he was sent to him to do some clerical duties. Hill did not make any complaint, did his work well and they got on well together.

Councillor Mrs. Elizabeth Cox of the Hammersmith Public Health Department, living at Curwen Road, W.12, said she had known the deceased since March, 1939. She last saw him at 6 p.m. on September 19, and he then seemed to be worried about deaths which had happened owing to air raids. She thought it was wrong for Hill to have been put on mortuary work.

Dr. Broadbridge (to witness): We are not here to listen to people air their grievances but to hear evidence.

The coroner said a possible cause of death might be the effect of air raids. Hill was nervy but had never threatened to take his life. The evidence of Mrs. Cox was a disgraceful exhibition of her own opinion. The verdict would be death from asphyxia from coal gas poisoning, and that Hill had taken his life when the balance of his mind was disturbed.

On October 4, the West London Observer published two letters of protest. One was signed by J. Chaloner Wood, F.I.B.R., of 20 Rivercourt Road, London, W.6, and read, in part, as follows:

"It is difficult to feel any confidence in the A.R.P. organisation of Hammersmith when one learns from the inquest on David Hill that a junior clerk was ordered to do whole-time duty at the Mortuary.

Hill's age and temperament were well-known to the Council, also the fact that a legally constituted Tribunal had decided, in accordance with the law of the land, that Hill should be exempted from military service and should continue in his job as a junior clerk to the Health Department.

"The duty which Hill was ordered to perform at the Mortuary would distress the most hardened man of mature age.

"The Borough Council must make the fullest investigation of the whole organisation of the Health Services, and, if necessary, re-organise the department."

The second letter was signed "A Clergyman of The Church of England." It defended Councillor Mrs. Cox and proceeded to protest against the ill-treatment Hill had received, on account of his conscientious opinions. The letter continued:

"He was appointed to work at the Mortuary upon the instructions of the Medical Officer of Health. The result was a breakdown, in the course of which Hill took his life. Such was the evidence which Mrs. Cox sought to tender, and the investigation of which was refused by the Coroner. Nobody in possession of the details can doubt that it is evidence directly relevant to the purpose of an inquest—the ascertaining of the cause of death.

"I understand that this nervous and sensitive boy of twenty was given work which involved his viewing the corpses of air-raid victims. A hardened and experienced man of twice his years would shrink from such a task, yet it was given to a boy already under medical treatment for his nerves. . . .

"The Health Committee owe it to their constituents that they undertake drastic enquiry."

Annesley Aldred writes from his new address, 10 Poplar Grove, London, W.6, as follows:

"The matter of David Hill is being taken up at the Borough Council Meeting, and a letter is being sent to the B.M.A., who state that, although there is nothing in the matter which brings it within their scope, there are sufficient grounds, if a formal protest is made to them, for them to write asking Howells (the Medical Officer of Health) for an explanation. The case was reported to the Secretary, without names, and he said that he certainly thought that it was disgraceful and liable to cast a slur on the medical profession."

IN THE UNITED STATES

Conscription—and Conscientious Objectors.

[Culled from "Unity," Chicago, Ill., Sept., 16, 1940.—Ed.]

In our August 19th issue, we commented upon the conscientious objector's problem in relation to the pending peacetime conscription bill. We reported that, in the original version of the bill, the provision for conscientious objectors was exceedingly inadequate, since it recognised only those who are members of "any well-recognised religious sect whose creeds or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form." It is gratifying now to report the improvement made in this regard in the later version of the measure. As the matter stands now, at this writing, conscientious objectors are exempted from military service on their own merit as individuals; see this clause:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to require any person to be subject to combatant training or service . . . who, by reason of religious training or belief, is conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form."

Those claiming exemption under this provision must prove their character and good faith before local boards set up by the Department of Justice, which is only right and proper, though the problem of passing on the sincerity of individual conscience still remains one of the unsolved problems of ethical jurisprudence. Another excellent provision of the bill is the offering to the sincere conscientious objector of "work of national importance under civilian control," if he objects to alternative non-combatant service. Summing up the whole law on this question of conscientious objectors, we find these advantages: objectors are recognised; they are classified on a separate list; they are rated on the basis of individual religious conviction, as contrasted with sectarian membership; they are heard and judged by a civilian board; they are offered not only non-combatant service, but, if they object to this, civilian service; and they are granted, equally with the government, the right of appeal on any disputed point. All this is to the good! Yet the bill still remains woefully unsatisfactory in the fact that it recognises only religious conscientious objectors. There are other objectors, quite as sincere, oftentimes more intelligent in their understanding of war, whose conviction is based on secular rather than spiritual grounds. These should not be ignored. Also, it must be said that, whatever the provisions of the law, much depends upon its administration, as was tragically proven in the last war. Legal martinets, patrioteers, and sadists may work havoc with any law.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Aldred,—Many thanks for the book on Josiah Warren. It is an interesting specimen of pioneer thought.

Warren had a sound appreciation of the need of relating the supply of claims on real wealth to the output of real wealth and of refusing to tolerate restrictions on production and consumption when the physical essentials for production and consumption are present.

It is interesting one hundred years ago to find a reformer writing of "the system of finance that creates an artificial scarcity of the medium of exchange"—interesting, yet depressing, seeing that nothing has been done in one hundred years to remove that artificial scarcity!

Seeing the time at which he lived, it is not to Warren's discredit that his theories are out of date, in so far as they fail to deal with the problems of a labour-destroying, power-using age which compels a modification of the work- for-all, no-work-no-play philosophy.

Yours sincerely,

BEDFORD.

Newton Stewart, Oct. 3, 1940.

Dear Guy Aldred,—I have only heard vaguely of George Martin apart from your pamphlet. Some years ago, about 1935, I knew a priest-vicar at Southwark Cathedral and he had heard of Martin and knew him a bit. He was alive of quite recent years and still working away. He must have been a very sincere character.

By the way, in Dogmas Discarded you are incorrect in thinking that the Theistic Church did not outlive Voysey. It is still going. Voysey was followed by Walter Walsh who split with the congregation in 1916 and founded the Free Religious Movement on the pacifist issue. There was a period of supply preachers and then a Unitarian Minister, Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, became preacher. I knew him a bit. His main interests were mysticism and occultism and he had no sort of political outlook. Davis left in 1932 and was followed by Magnus Ratter, an admirer of Ghandi, who wrote a good book on Schweitzer. He is now the Unitarian minister at Rawtenstall in Lancs. The present minister is Dr. Kaufmann, who comes from Australia. The church meets on Sunday mornings in the Aeolian Hall, Bond Street. It is an interesting body.

I have always found Voysey's books of interest though I think that he is hopelessly off the track over the Synoptic Gospels. He was really pre-critical and knew little of any modern criticism. I encountered E. A. Voysey a bit.

I see a good deal of your son, who is quite a near neighbour. We are having a row locally at the moment about a young C.O. who was driven to suicide by being put on to mortuary duty.

Yours fraternally,

F. H. AMPHLETT MICKLEWRIGHT.

CHRISTENDOM, 1940

We published the accompanying picture of God as a War Lord King, thus depicting the blasphemous war concept of Christendom, in The Spur, for December, 1915. We adapted a verse of the famous hymn. Christendom was then, as it is now, a wilderness of war, and ammunition was being turned out at the Bethlehem Steel works. We believe the Bethlehem Steel works are busy still.

Hark! the herald angels sing
Glory to the war-lord king,
Strife on earth, and orgie wild,
God and sin are reconciled.
Hateful, all ye nations, rise,
Join the triumph of the skies;
With the Angelic host proclaim,
"Guns are made in Bethlehem."
Hark! the herald angels sing
Glory to the war-lord king.

"WHY JESUS WEPT"

A REJOINDER BY

THE REV. HENRY J. ADLARD

(Minister of the Trim Street Chapel (Unitarian), Bath, England; formerly Pastor of the Adams Memorial Church, Dunkirk, New York, U.S.A.; Minister of the First Unitarian Church, Des Moines, Iowa, U.S.A.; Minister of the First Unitarian Church, Sioux City, Iowa, U.S.A.; Minister of the First Unitarian Church, Minn., U.S.A.).

I have read through carefully the pamphlet, Why Jesus Wept, which Mr. Aldred has been kind enough to send to me, and asked for my reactions. In some places I am in overwhelming agreement with his main contentions. In others I disagree vigorously. I cannot see what strict relation obtains between the first essay and many of the latter ones, hence I confine my friendly criticism to the first-named.

It is amazing to me that a man of Mr. Aldred's undoubted critical ability, research, information, and powers of expression, should be so un-critical of Jesus and the sources from whence we derive our knowledge of him. Like almost every other writer within my ken, who writes about Jesus, he actually writes his life of Jesus. As my friend, the Rev. John Deitrich says, "This is what has constantly been done through the centuries of Christian history" and further "It is the duty of everyone to resist the attempt to hold the world bound in the thought of one man."

Mr. Aldred crowds out, or ignores, what does not fit into his picture of Jesus. He builds a sort of stereotype of Jesus, and everything must fit in its place or be ignored. The Gospels are our only sources of information about Jesus. The Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel are poles apart, and the Synoptics are, at best, fragmentary matters, and reveal marked evidence of having been tampered with by interpolations, additions or deletions. Of all these things, Mr. Aldred should be well-informed, but if so, he disregards them. But Mr. Aldred here, as elsewhere, is out to make a case, a complete, unanswerable, absolute case. He is that sort of man, whether it be Bakunin or Jesus. He is an absolutist whatever he puts his hand to. That is his strength and his defect.

Why Jesus Wept is a stirring dramatic title. It has great homiletic values, and Mr. Aldred preaches a ripping sermon thereon. It is pathetically true that Jesus has been sold out by the majority of preachers and churches; and it is enough to make him weep. There are two occasions when Jesus is reported to have wept. Once over Jerusalem, the other at the grave of Lazarus. Setting aside the latter as wholly unhistorical, it might be added, that if Jesus wept on that occasion he well might, seeing that he had delayed coming to Lazarus whom, he had assured the sisters, was not sick unto death. With regard to the moving scene when Jesus wept over Jerusalem, to it I think may be added the portentous words of Jesus when he said on his way to the cross, "Weep not for me but for yourselves and your children," as though he realised what the neglect of his principles would mean, and actually does mean, in every bombed area in Great Britain to-day.

There is another thought that bothers me. It is strange that Mr. Aldred, who is, I gather, a militant atheist—which is his own affair—should ignore the undoubted theistic side of Jesus. Jesus was not a theologian, and he never argued about God—he had more sense. But, if we take the gospel at its face value, it was the same kind of heart which made him weep over the folly of man, and simply believe in, and call God father, and all men brethren. To Mr. Aldred the very idea of God is nugatory, yet he embraces one whose life in its crucial moments was controlled by it.

I am a great admirer of the heroic spirit of Jesus, as far as I know it, but I cannot agree that his "teachings make a consistent whole." It is just what they do not. At times they are most baffling, esoteric, eschatological, and contradictory. It is for this very reason that every society, order, cult, goes to Jesus and claims him as one of them. E.G., Jesus said "Love your enemies." The 23rd chapter of Matthew with its sizzling invective against the Pharisees does not reveal much love. The Pharisees may have deserved it. That is not the point. Other instances might be cited. Jesus prayed for Peter that his faith might not fail. He knew that Judas would betray him. Why did he not pray for, and advise, Judas?

Mr. Aldred says that Jesus "Did not need solitude." I should think he did if ever man did, and the records show that he sought it frequently. We are told he "allowed no limitation to Brotherhood." No doubt world brotherhood was implicit in, and can be deduced from his teachings, but he explicitly said he came to his own people, "the lost sheep of the house of Israel."

The matter of Dickens being a Unitarian has been much thrashed over. I think the claim is extremely slim, and the publication of his Childs Life of Christ a few years ago, reveals little of the Unitarian attitude to Jesus. In Why Jesus Wept there is no well built-up discriminating regard for the twenty three actual days we have of the Life of Jesus. Mr. Aldred has oversimplified his case in order that he may use Jesus as a leader for the proletarian revolt. Not that there is not much that cannot be so used, but I will refer to that in a concluding remark.

As a polemical writer Mr. Aldred is nothing if not vigorous. He says that much of this pamphlet was written in prison. As I told him, there are times when all good men should be in prison—This may account for touches of asperity here and there. They strike a weak and false note, and add nothing to the argument. He vilifies an opponent with unpleasant and questionable adjectives. The opening paragraph contains an onslaught on Robert Blatchford as "disgustingly hypocritical." I do not know whether this is true, I should much doubt; and I still honour him for his magnificent Socialist propaganda which brought me into the fold. Be that as it may, such things are no help: they alienate all men of reason, and damage a good cause.

But all this said, and in the most friendly spirit, is not to detract from the main purpose of this pamphlet, its splendid social passion, its cry for economic justice, for a new and clean world.

The biggest shock which could be given to the Christian churches on any Sunday morning would be for a man to arise in every pulpit, preach the essential message of this tract, show Why Jesus Wept and why he would weep, and why all good men should weep. The plain fact is that the vast majority of Christian churches are scared stiff at the teachings of Jesus, and even in the present catastrophe, they do not seem to realise that war is an utter negation of his temper, outlook, and teaching. If the churches were honest they should declare a moratorium on God, Jesus, and prayer for the War. In times of peace Jesus is kept on a shelf, all mummified and dusty. In times of war he is not only kept there, but to make doubly sure, he is covered up completely. If Jesus has nothing different to offer, better than the ordinary yardstick of human affairs, if he is to be dragged in as support and backer of every war, well, I for one, fail to see why we have any use for him at all.

If this is Jesus, he and I part company. If this is Jesus he is no leader, he is a distant follower of the pioneers of humanity. But this is NOT Jesus..

Jesus is all right in a stained-glass window. He is all right frozen in a statue. He is all right so long as he remains fixed. But, as G. B. Shaw once said, you drag Jesus off the pedestal, pull him out of the window, fling him into the market place of human affairs, on "Change" or where you will, there's going to be trouble.

It doesn't seem to enter into the reckoning of war-mongering parsons that Jesus said, "My kingdom is not of this world, else would my soldiers fight for it" . . . It seems clear to my mind, quite clear, and difficult.

Mr. Aldred runs a rum combination. He has two gods, small "g" please. Jesus and Bakunin. One who believed in God, the other ruled out God with scorn; but perhaps there is more between these two than meets the eye.

THE CHURCH AND CONSCIENCE

(concluded from page 44).

Western Morning News, Plymouth, for May 22, 1940, published a letter from the Rev. B. C. C. Pratt, Rector of Peter Tavy, protesting against a paragraph in the paper for May 17. It said that a letter was read from him supporting the application before the C.O. Tribunal, of Leslie Thomas Rice. The latter was exempted. Mr. Pratt wrote :—

"I wrote an ordinary character for Mr. Rice, a copy of which I enclose. It in no way supports his application for exemption. I entirely disagree with his views, as I told him when he asked me for the reference.

"Since this character was used to influence the opinion of the tribunal in favour of exemption, I shall in future refuse to give a character to anyone with pacifist tendencies."

If his reference was true, why should Mr. Pratt run away from its conclusions?

A heated protest by the Rev. Guy F. Waddington, Vicar of Christ Church, Bradford, was made at the Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal in Leeds on June 10.

Mr. Waddington stood close to Fred G. Mountain, of 104 Toftshaw Lane, Bradford, while the tribunal was deciding whether he had made satisfactory attempts to obtain non-combatant work ordered by the tribunal when his application was heard.

When Judge Stewart announced that Mountain had not satisfied them, Mr. Waddington exclaimed: I am asked to stand here all this time as if I am a criminal.

Judge Stewart: I am not aware you have anything to say.

Mr. Waddington: I strongly protest against the lack of courtesy of this Court.

Judge Stewart: You have no right to interfere with the course of justice in this Court.

Mr. Waddington: This is not a court of justice. I object to being treated like a criminal.

On July 8, Pastor Truswell, of the Wrenthorpe Mission, told the same Tribunal that all the young men of military age at his mission would eventually appear before the Tribunal.

Pastor Truswell appeared as a witness for Albery Holler, aged 27, a motor driver, of Shillito Road, Wrenthorpe, Wakefield.

Judge Stewart: How many more members of your mission are there of military age?—Upwards of a dozen.

How many have been dealt with?—This is the third.

Is it fair to say that they are, as it were, led in this direction by your ministrations?—I am the minister there and I teach them.

Are the other twelve likely to be coming here?—Yes.

There is no doubt about what the effect of your teaching is?—I cannot see any other effect as a result of Christian teaching.

In June, two church magazines, published in Highgate, on the northern outskirts of London, expressed opposing views of the character and attitude of the conscientious objector.

The Rev. F. M. Tapply, vicar of All Saints', Church Road, Highgate, in his Parish Magazine, stated that "there can be no peace until the brute force of Germany is utterly defeated." He added: "Civilization is at stake."

Referring to "conscientious objectors," he said that the phrase was "a long word for a simpler term" and declared that they left "to the manhood of the nation the task of protecting the lives which they have not the desire or the will to do themselves."

The vicar then asked :—

"What right have they to accept the protection of a country they refuse to defend? They are ready to be saved, but they dare not risk their lives as the thousands of real men are doing even for their own salvation."

The Rev. David Mace, minister of the Archway Central (Methodist) Hall, wrote in his War-time Letter of the "splendid idealism" that was kindling within the young folk, and making them pacifists. He insisted that they were quite willing to "take their place in the danger zone alongside the fighting men" to serve humanity but not to destroy it. He spoke of his conversations with young pacifist men and women, and added :—

"They are tortured by the misunderstanding and unjust persecution they suffer day by day; and they long for a chance to show that they are willing to brave any danger or make any sacrifice in the service of Christian compassion."

"Most Protestant ministers in New Zealand are pacifists" said the Rev. John Gibson Inkster, D.D., pastor of the Knox Church, Toronto, when he arrived in Sydney, Australia, in an overseas liner, on Saturday, June 1. He had been preaching at St. John's Church, Wellington, during the previous eight months. His visit to New Zealand was for the Centenary Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of New Zealand. Dr. Inkster added :—

"Most New Zealand ministers do not preach pacifism, but none are actively militant for the prosecution of the war. They do not seem to realise we are fighting for our existence. Canada has pacifists among her clergymen, but there are not as many there as in New Zealand. . . .

"Among the young people in New Zealand I found a widespread tendency to question our fundamental religious beliefs. I was told that half the students at Victoria University, Wellington, are inclined towards Communism."

In peace-time, Secularists attack the Church for supporting war. This is a perfectly fair attack. But the Freethinkers also believe in war. Here is an extract from the Freethinker, London, for June 23, 1940 :—

"A considerable number of 'Conchies' are, or profess to be theological 'students' who have recently acquired an ambition to become ministers-of-the-gospel. This new hypocrisy is distinctly due to the total exemption of the clergy from active service—but not from getting snug billets outside the danger-line at salaries far beyond that of soldiers who offer their lives in defence of civilisation. We no more condemn genuine C.O.'s than we condemn conscientious people in any other sphere, and in any case a man who 'hath no stomach to this fight had best' be allowed to 'depart'—an army is better without than with them."

JOHN MORRISON DAVIDSON

In chapter X, of Part II. of Dogmas Discarded, we mention our meetings with John Morrison Davidson, during 1904 to 1906, in the famous Farringdon Road office, under the Holborn Arches, of the Agnostic Journal. Davidson, who was a reformer, journalist, author, and pamphleteer of renown in his day and generation, deserved more notice than the fleeting reference accorded to him.

John M. Davidson was born at Fetterangus, in the parish of Red Deer, Buchan, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, on July 31, 1843. He died at Honor Oak, London, S.E., England, December 16, 1916.

Davidson was one of the most vigorous champions with his trenchant pen of the oppressed land peasants and labourers. For a number of years he was the foremost writer for "Reynolds's Newspaper." Radical thinking people all over the English-speaking world used eagerly to read his famous "Politics for the People," which were a feature of "Reynolds's," and gave it an international standing.

Davidson was both a Republican and Anti-Authoritatian in character. In his later writings and years he became strongly Anti-statist and Anarchist, wrapped up in the ideals of Tolstoi.

Davidson, as a boy, was not physically vigorous, but what nature lacked in that way was made up by mental activity. We find him at the age of 16 years obtaining a scholarship by public competition, which enabled him to enter Aberdeen University. He was not long there before he collided with authority in the shape of one of the leading professors, whom he publicly defied. His continuation at the University became impossible.

After leaving the University, he mixed in radical circles, and sympathised with the "Patriotic Poles" when they insurrected in the year 1863, in order to make Poland a nation. He endeavoured to join them. Davidson was only 20 years of age at this time. Those at the head of the Polish Insurrection refused to allow the young liberator to join them. The leaders of it were "National," not Cosmopolitan.

After being discarded by the Poles' leaders, the same year he returned to Scotia (1863) and married Rose Fowlie, a girl schoolmate, who afterwards became the devoted mother of 11 children (six girls and five boys). The young couple went to Glasgow, where Davidson became a teacher in several schools. After a time he was appointed headmaster of a school at Berwick. From thence he went to Edinburgh as one of the masters of the famous Circus Place School.

Davidson's heart was not in teaching, and he resolved to try and qualify for the Scottish Bar. He obtained a complete mastery of legal principles, and was a distinguished law student.

In 1869, Davidson began to write for the newspapers. His first contributions appeared in the Peterhead Sentinel as leaders. Later he was leading writer to the Daily Review of Edinburgh, and subsequently editor.

When Davidson came to London he entered at the middle temple, and was called to the English Bar in the year 1877.

In the year 1880 he visited the Western States of America, notably Montana and Nevada, investigating cattle-ranching and mining, for a syndicate of British journals. His "Letters from the Far West" attracted much attention from their vigorous setting and practical character. The then President, Rutherford B. Hayes, the leading statesmen and literary men of the United States, entertained and received him with utmost consideration.

On his return to Britain, Davidson became hon. secretary of the People's League for the Abolition of the House of Lords. In Reynolds's Newspaper he published his famous "The Book of Lords."

To the Weekly Times and Echo Davidson contributed his most successful work, "The Old Order and the New," introducing the five periods of human servitude.

For Reynolds's Newspaper, Davidson wrote

"The New Book of Kings," the "Annals of Toil," "Scotia Rediviva," and his great historical research work, "The Book of Erin."

For the Weekly Despatch he wrote "Eminent Radicals in Parliament," "Apostles of Democracy" and numerous other essays.

These serial works were reprinted and circulated widely in book-form.

It cannot be said that Davidson pursued a logical or a consistent course. He was Liberal and Radical. His outlook was anti-authorian and therefore, Anarchist. He was not opposed to revolutionary struggle, but he favoured all reformist courses. His view of Jesus as a man and a master agitator, a genius of Freedom, was much opposed to the approach of his agnostic friends. He tolerated what he felt was their ironies and frivolous cynicisms and blasphemies with a shrewd and humorous tolerance. We remember many discussions between him and Ernest Pack, whose forte was ridicule. Pack used to describe Davidson's The Gospel of the Poor as The Gospel on the Floor.

War—and the First Christians

By Rev. F. M. AMPHLETT MICKLEWRIGHT, M.A.

[The Early Christian Attitude To War, by the Rev. C. J. Cadoux, D.D. (Allen & Unwin, 1940, 5s. 0d.)

Who's Who records that Professor Cadoux was born at Smyrna, Turkey, on May 24, 1883. After mentioning his various posts, it includes in his publications the following works besides the one reviewed by Mr. Micklewright in these columns:—The Guidance of Jesus for To-day, 1920; The Christian Crusade, 1924; The Message about the Cross, 1924; The Early Church and the World, 1925; The Resurrection and Second Advent of Jesus, 1927; Catholicism and Christianity, 1928; Deuteronomy in Colloquial Speech, 1932; Roman Catholicism and Freedom, 1936; Ancient Smyrna, 1937.—Ed.]

This well-known book by Professor C. J. Cadoux was begotten out of the midst of the struggles of the last war. It bears a preface by Dr. W. E. Orchard, whose name will be familiar to those who recall the religious opposition voiced during the four years of conflict. It is essentially a work for the student and scholar but it is now republished at a popular price in order that its message may still be available to those engaged in resisting another universal holocaust. There can be no excuse now for the minister who does not seek to learn the facts which Dr. Cadoux presents in an orderly and scholarly form.

The thesis of the book is quite clear. The preaching of Jesus was a gospel of non-resistance. This teaching transmitted itself to the primitive church and, for many generations, the church was a body predominantly pacifist. The main strand of Christian teaching was represented by Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Hippolutos, who set forth Christianity in terms of extreme peacefulness. Arnobius, Lactantius, Eusebios, adopted the same standpoint. Certain facts underline this teaching. No Christian soldier is known to have existed between A.D. 50 and 170. Later on, a certain number filtered in but Tertullian advised baptized Christians to leave the army as the profession of soldier was difficult to reconcile with their religious creed. To Origen, all war was illegitimate for Christians. It may be claimed in all fairness that there was a long tradition of non-resistance which shaped a good deal of the moral teaching of the primitive church. It was not a mere passivity which condoned evil but a feeling that war was a greater evil than anything which it set out to suppress and that it must not be allowed to divide Christians from Christians.

There were other tendencies which, however, in time proved the stronger. The use of military metaphors by Christian writers from Paul onwards was really non-committal and implied nothing definite but it had dangers of its own. The wars of the Old Testament and the apocalyptic wars of the Maccabaean period led to a feeling that war might, under certain circumstances, be justified and used in the cause of God. The Christian philosophy of the state was uncertain and could be turned to lower ends. There was the practical experience of good in the character of some soldiers. Gradually there was an infiltration of the world into the church. A moral compromise was reached and, from about A.D. 170, the Christian soldier became more and more common. Finally, with the conversion of the Emperor Constantine, in A.D. 313, the pacifist cause was lost to the main body of the Christian Church. It is worth recalling however that it was never entirely forgotten. As the Quaker, Dr. Rufus Jones, has shown in a valuable book, "The Remnant," there were many small pacifist sects throughout the Middle Ages. Erasmus revived the primitive Christian attitude to war. It entered Protestantism through the Anabaptists of Munster. In spite of its apparent defeat, it was never wholly lost.

From one point of view, Dr. Cadoux's book is a learned historical study. It is an arsenal of fact which no student of Christian morals or of early Church history can afford to neglect. It has never been answered nor have its facts ever been disproved. But it is also a warning to the Christian of the present time and a challenge that he should clarify his views on the matter. The Archbishop of Canterbury has recently allowed that the pacifist has a place within the Christian Church and cannot be displaced as a heretic. The Pacifist reply is not to seek to coerce every Christian to take his point of view. It is to make clear that the church is a comprehensive body in the sense defined by the Archbishop. It is the duty of the Pacifist to illustrate his views as the more ancient in the church and to show that the non-Pacifist Christian is, in reality, the stranger within the gate. Likewise, he has a right to demand that the Church should safeguard itself against the dangers which, in the first Christian centuries, led to the lowering of the standard upon the whole question of force and war.

The first and obvious lesson is that the Christian must be firm in his highest loyalty. It is not without significance that the period which saw the lowering of standards over war and the Christian attitude to it likewise saw a departure when Christians started to appeal to the Roman law courts in disputes with fellow-Christians. This was the case at the end of the third century when the Church sought to expel an undesirable bishop, Paul of Samosata, and to regain possession of the Episcopal residence. A confusion had arisen with regard to the relative positions of Church and world. It is a confusion which still continues. The average Christian is not a conscious hypocrite who seeks lower standards than those which he professes with his lips. He is a man who has got himself into a moral muddle. He has not made up his mind upon a question of divided loyalties. The many moves made within recent years to secure a coherent Christian philosophy of the state are to be welcomed. They are the necessary preliminary steps in the solution of a difficult moral problem. But the Christian of to-day would do well to recall that the Church lost its original moral impetus by neglecting to retain a distinction between the implications of its membership and the claims of the secular state. By merging the one into the other, it caused an entanglement which has continued until this day..

Likewise, the use of military metaphors in the early Church was a source of weakness. This has continued until the present day. Helen Waddell's work, "Mediaeval Latin Lyrics" contains many examples of verse, beautiful and touching in itself, but of definite military methaphor. Popular hymns, such as "Onward, Christian Soldiers" or "Soldiers of Christ, arise." fall into the same error. The result is that they tend to become regarded as fact rather than analogy and allow the evolution of idea of the Christian soldier and the identification of Christianity and militarism. There are indications that a better day is dawning. Such a hymn-book as the late Dr. Dearmer's "Songs of Praise" not only reaches a high standard of verse. It eschews many of the trite and warlike metaphors of Mediaeval and mid-Victorian hymnology. But the point must be pressed. Because Paul talked of "the whole armour of God" and soldiers of Christ, it does not excuse the continued use of such metaphors. Pauline theology has certain obvious meanings. The meaning of the more trite hymnology is not always so clear.

The background of religion contains large areas which have been coloured by war. The wars of the Old Testament and those of the Maccabaean period were of religious purpose. At this distance of time, it is clearly impossible to discern how far they were analogous to the Crusades in whitewashing lower motives, such as the seizure of land or mere plundering. But, even if it be assumed that they were fought from the highest motives, it neither discredits religion nor does it justify war to-day. Every progressive religious thinker, from Principal Caird to Alfred Loisy, would agree that religion is a growth and an evolution. The grown man cannot be forced back into his cradle. Moral perception has likewise evolved and it would be a slur on Christian thought of the present time if it had not outgrown and developed beyond Old Testament conceptions of the purposes of God. If these old-time conflicts be used to justify war to-day, it merely implies that the exponent of such an argument has not grown up, whether in his religious insight or his moral perceptions.

In a useful work, "The Moral Damage of War," the late Dr. Walter Walsh quoted the eulogy of the Christian soldier of to-day by the former Chaplain-General to the Forces, Bishop Taylor Smith. He showed how it was just so much humbug and cant. The profession of soldier is all but impossible to reconcile with the earliest or purest forms of Christian discipleship. It is impossible to conceive of a sudden revolution which will eject all non-Pacifists from Christian bodies. Indeed, it would not be desirable. The Church is not a home of the elect. It is a school for those who are striving to be better. But there is a moral duty laid upon the Christian teacher to enforce the lesson that Christianity, both in its primitive state and at the moments of its highest moral perception, has always denied war as a rightful method of settling disputes and the profession of the soldier as suitable work which a Christian can adopt. The lesson needs to be enforced that the non-Pacifist Christian, who is sincerely seeking the light of truth, has put himself to school in a tolerant community whose highest forms teach the duty of non-resistance and the power of non-violence. He is the new-comer and this is a fact which makes non-Pacifist attacks on Pacifist ministers from within the Church particularly out of place.

A fact of vast importance emerges from the whole discussion. Modern war is totalitarism and the conscription of the nation by the state is a necessity in order that it may be waged successfully. At the same time, Christianity teaches the supremacy of the moral conscience as of the individual. It views the individual personality as of supreme worth and does not put the claims of the state above it. Its social teaching of "the Kingdom of God" and the righteous society does not overrule this view of conscience and of personality. It remained unaffected by the great Augustinean apostacy which identified the Kingdom of God with the Catholic Church as it exists here and now. The Christian Church must stand in opposition to anything which implies the conscription of the individual conscience, whether it be in the interests of "Right" or of "Left," whether it be a temporary expedient or a permanent demand. It is therefore committed in theory to an opposition to the conscription policy of the government. It is likewise opposed of necessity to modern warfare which must deny the Christian view of man not only from other causes but by the denial of freedom implied in its totalitarianism.

There are many approaches to this question, such as the moral and the doctrinal. But the historical is of equal importance and, for those who desire to assess the matter from this angle, we cannot do more than commend Dr. Cadoux's excellent book.

DID THE TORY PATRIOTS LISTEN?

Did the Tory patriots listen to the United Socialist Movement in 1936?
Did they listen when the Tory Prime Minister aided Fascism and Nazism to make war on democracy?
The Tory Premier then made the present world war inevitable—and the United Socialist Movement appealed in vain!

THE CONSPIRACY AGAINST SPAIN. RECALL PARLIAMENT! RESIGN!

Being an open letter to The Rt. Hon. Stanley Baldwin, M.P., H.M. Principal Secretary of State for Great Britain.

Sir,

This is the sixth week of the civil war in Spain. During the whole of this period Parliament has been on holiday. No attempt has been made to recall the House of Commons which should be in continuous session at this period of European crisis. This fact censures not only you as Prime Minister but also the leader of the Opposition and every M.P.

It is true that your government, like that of Belgium, France, and Switzerland, has agreed to neutrality and actually implemented an embargo. This action recognises both sides as belligerents and is therefore a blow to the authority of the recognised government of Spain. There is reason to suspect that this embargo does not operate against the Fascist rebels but only against the properly constituted government. Such conduct is entirely contrary to the law of nations and in direct conflict with the will of the British people. Arms should and must be supplied to the government of Spain and none to the insurgents. That is the will of the common people of Great Britain.

Your government agreed to neutrality after much delay. Meantime, the Fascist governments of Italy and Germany, to your knowledge, were arming and equipping Franco and his Moorish and alien armies with airplanes and all the requirements and machinery of war. For six weeks the government of Spain has been starved and its enemies equipped. I cannot congratulate you, sir, on our neutrality, which seems to my mind to be so much calculated diplomatic hyprocrisy, and destined to bring His Majesty's Government into deserved contempt.

The Italian and German governments have agreed (sic) to neutrality, but have made it clear that they will not permit a Socialist government in Spain. Soon after the outbreak of civil war, the Portuguese Foreign Minister visited London and was received at the Foreign Office. It was announced that he insisted that Portugal would not stand for a Red Spain. The present government of Portugal is a Fascist one. Under these circumstances what becomes of your pose of neutrality?

The German government states that she has not dropped the Kamerun incident, when a Spanish cruiser insisted on stopping the German boat; and maintains a hypocritical protest against the very proper seizure by the Spanish government of a German transport plane in Madrid. The Kamerun was engaged in supplying oil and munitions to the insurgents. In the issue for August 25, the News Chronicle special correspondent published an account of a visit he paid to Lisbon. He saw the Kamerun unloading her cargo of 1,800 tons of "agricultural machinery" and "sanitary supplies" alongside the Santa Polonia Quay. Another cargo was unloaded at Lisbon from the German steamer Wisbert, containing arms and oil. No customs officers were present and Portuguese artillerymen watched the unloading. The cargoes were placed on boxed cars on the quayside. Twenty three of these left for Badajos and Salamanca on August 22, and thirty were dispatched two days later. The News Chronicle correspondent discovered that the General Headquarters of the Spanish military rebellion operates in Lisbon. This headquarters is in active relations with the Portuguese government while the Embassy of the Spanish Government is in a state of siege and cut off from Madrid. Your government received the Portuguese Foreign Minister and gave him assurances. Is it going too far to conclude that the National Government, of which you are the head is engaged in an actual conspiracy to overthrow the government of Spain, and to replace it by a Fascist dictatorship? Your conduct is involving European violence and revolution.

Your government has permitted Campbell Black and Cathcart Jones to engage in commercial adventures for the rebels. The supine Popular Front Government of France and the futile counter-revolutionary government of Russia — more distinguished for murdering Socialists at home than aiding Socialism abroad —insist on their neutrality. Which again confers equal status on the rebels and the govern-

United Socialist Movement Leaflet Against Fascism.

Issued August 1936. Title and opening sentences. Reproduction is a little smaller than the original typed leaflet.

Concluding portion same leaflet.

With these precedents before you I request, as a citizen, that either you support the recognised and legally elected and properly constituted government of Spain or resign immediately.

In the cause of Democracy, I have the honour to be, Sir, your opponent,

We wish to circulate 250,000 copies of this open letter to Baldwin. A copy will be sent to every M.P. Quantities will be supplied to every section of the Labour and Socialist Movement at little more than cost of postage. Immediate financial help is required to do this. The 1847 discussion in parliament on the duty of the British government to uphold materially and with arms an established government against its rebels will be published later. From all over the country requests are pouring in for issues out of print. Our desire is to collect and print in pamphlet form for wide circulation all these leaflets. Send your donation to our 2,000 shillings fund now. Action in Britain aids the Spanish struggle. Send donations to G. Aldred, 145, Queen St., Glasgow. All donations will be acknowledged in the next issue.

ment. This neutrality is a crime against democracy, an offence against the law of nations, and an outrage to Spain. I therefore urge the recall of Parliament, its immediate dissolution and an appeal to the electorate. I ask the citizens to transform their political associations into public vigilant committees and to see that the Government of Spain is recognised and supported in its heroic democratic struggle against Fascist banditism. I ask the workers' industrial organisations to prepare for a general strike to enforce the will of the people.

The mind of a statesman revels in precedents. Let me call your attention to precedents for intervention on behalf of an established government against its rebels. These precedents relate to the affairs of Spain and Portugal and occurred under the ministries of Canning and Russell.

George Canning was Foreign Minister, 1822-1827, and Prime Minister, April to August, 1827. In 1822 he shilly-shallied in his attempt to defend the constitution of Spain, with the result that France was permitted to do police duty in her own interests and Fernando VII was enabled to overthrow the 1814 constitution of the Cortes and reassert his despotic power by the aid of French bayonets in 1823. A year later Canning recognised the independence of the revolted Spanish colonies and treated them as separate nations. Canning was definite in the matter of Portugal and supported the government against rebellion aided by foreign armies. In 1826, he sent a British force to Lisbon to uphold the constitutional power against the reactionary despotic movement supported by France and assisted by direct intervention by Russia, Prussia and Austria. Canning resolutely opposed a coup d'etat such as Franco is attempting to-day, although menaced by an European coalition of reaction.

Britain concerned herself again with the affairs of Portugal in 1833 when a British fleet maintained the infant queen Maria on her throne and crushed the rebel fleet. Maria remained ruler until 1853 and there were constant insurrections to demand the democratic constitution that the people had formulated in 1824. Maintaining that Britain must uphold an established and legally constituted government, the first government of Lord John Russell interfered to defend the Portugese crown, knowing it was a reactionary regime, against the constitutional rebels. The British Government avowed its sympathy with the rebels but defended the established regime. This led to much debate in Parliament and I refer you to Hansard, 3rd series, vol. XCIII, where, Macaulay participating, this point of supporting the established government of a country as opposed to its rebels is held to be the guiding policy of British politics.

With these precedents before you I request, as a citizen, that either you support the recognised and legally elected and properly constituted government of Spain or resign immediately.

In the cause of Democracy, I have the honour to be, Sir, your opponent.

STRICKLAND'S ADOPTED SONS

Tamil Students Educated in Europe

[Essays by and on the late Sir Walter W. Strickland, Bt., B.A., have appeared in various issues of The Word. Most of these issues are obtainable still. The following essay from our pen appeared in The Malton Messenger for August 5, 1939.—Ed.]

At different times during his travels, Sir Walter Strickland drew up Wills. He named various persons known to the Socialist and Freethought movements as his executors. In 1929 he drew up what was intended to be, and as regards its main bequests, proved to be his last Will. In this he named as his executor Dr. Chempakaraman Pillai.

Behind this appointment is the story of Sir Walter Strickland's travels in Ceylon and of his adoption as his sons, as far as that is possible, of two Tamil boys named Pillai. Sir Walter was given to spelling their names differently; in the one case Pillai and in the other case Pillay. His purpose was not only to distinguish between the two youths, but to indicate that they were in no way related. Both seemed to have proved excellent scholars and each met with an untimely end.

Dr. Chempakaraman Pillai, as he afterwards became, belonged to a respectable Tamil Hindu Vellala family in Trivandrum, Travancore State. He was born in 1889 and educated in the Maharaja's High School, Trivandrum. Sir Walter Strickland visited Trivandrum at the time that Chempakaraman was matriculating. He took an interest in the youth and was impressed with his capacity for scholarship. Sir Walter proposed to take him to Europe and educate him at his expense in the universities of Paris and Heidelberg. Sir Walter obtained the consent of Pillai's parents and also those of his maternal grandfather, E. Padmanabba Pillai, his guardian, a retired medical officer of the Travancore Service.

In 1908 Sir Walter left India for Europe and took young Chempakaraman to Naples and then had him admitted in a Civil Engineering College in Switzerland. Why Sir Walter changed his plans and fixed on an engineering career in Switzerland was explained by him fully in his letter dated December 16, 1908, to Pillai's parents and grandfather. When the war broke out in 1914, Chempakaraman was living in Switzerland, where he was closely identified with the Indian Nationalist movement and, apart from his engineering studies and work, was conducting the paper "Pro India," a weekly journal to which Indians and Swiss contributed. He was the President of the "International Committee Pro India" and at the same time a member of a number of political, literary and cultural societies. This activity met with Sir Walter Strickland's full endorsement because of Strickland's opposition to imperialism and his belief in the right of self-government in India.

Representative in Berlin.

In 1914-15, Pillai went to Berlin and settled down at Charlottenburg, first at Goethestrasse and later at Jaochimstrasse. In 1919, when the war came to an end, Pillai concentrated his attention on economic questions with particular reference to India. In 1931, Pillai was appointed by the Federation of the Indian Chamber of Commerce and Industries as their representative in Berlin. He was a master of many languages and he was held in great esteem in political and commercial circles in Germany. A number of Travancore students went to Germany and were organised by Pillai.

Sir Walter Strickland visited Germany after the Armistice. He was acquainted with many German Socialists but slowly parted company with Pillai because of the latter's association with what he termed the reactionary elements. Pillai became more and more identified with the Nazi movement and when he fell ill early in 1934 was closely identified with the propaganda of the Nazis to undermine British Rule in India in favour of the Nazi regime.

Sir Walter Strickland objected to this campaign on the ground that British Rule was objectionable but Nazi Rule was not preferable and Indians had no right to be made the tools of European imperial politics. Pillai died in Berlin during a trepanning operation for tumour on the brain. He actually died on May 26, 1934, which was Strickland's birthday. Lengthy obituary notices of Pillai were published in the German papers and reproduced in the India and Ceylon papers. Reuter broadcast the news of his death throughout the world, so great had become his influence among the Nazis.

Following upon his death, Strickland discovered that Pillai had been responsible for what Strickland deemed the illegal seizure by the Dresdener Bank of Commerce, Berlin, of seven valises belonging to Sir Walter Strickland. These valises contained accounts of Strickland's world travels, his correspondence in several languages with various political characters throughout the world, including the founders of the Czech Republic and Dr. Sun Yat Sen, etc. When Sir Walter wrote to the Bank to return his property, it refused to do so. Pillai, in an evil hour, wholly without Strickland's consent and without his even being informed of it, had placed these valises in the Dresdener Bank instead of forwarding them to the Swiss Bank where Strickland deposited his property. The Dresdener Bank stated that it was impossible to return the valises to Strickland since they had been deposited by Pallai and could only be returned to his heirs. As Strickland said, this meant the appropriation of his property sine die.

At the same time that Sir Walter adopted Chempakaraman Pillai he also adopted the other Pillay boy, who afterwards became Dr. T. P. Pillay and following upon a European education at Sir Walter's expense, obtained various governmental posts in India.

The fate of this youth was described in the London evening newspaper, "The Star," for December 17, 1923. We cannot do better than reproduce the report:—

"MISSING DOCTOR MYSTERY.

"SIR WALTER STRICKLAND'S ADOPTED SON "VANISHED FROM LINER.

"Sir Walter Strickland, Bart., who recently discarded his title, and who is well-known for his Socialistic views, is much worried about the disappearance of his adopted son, Dr. T. P. Pillay, formerly Government mycologist in India.

"Dr. Pillay, in May last, paid a visit to Sir Walter, who is staying in Lower California. He was returning home to Colombo via America and Japan, and cabled to his father-in-law the date on which he would reach Colombo.

"Dr. Pillay's father-in-law is Dr. Sankaramunti Pillay, deputy-surgeon at the Cantonment, Trivandrum, S. India, and Court Physician to the Maharajah of Travancore. When the ship arrived at Colombo, Dr. Pillay's things were on the boat, but he was not there.

"The captain reported that he had no knowledge of Dr. Pillay's whereabouts, and suggested that he may have left the ship at Penang.

Fruitless Enquiries.

"Since then his family have been unable to discover anything concerning his whereabouts, and his wife and two children are greatly upset at his disappearance.

"Sir Walter Strickland has had enquiries made in England and India, and is afraid that his adopted son may have committed suicide from fear of political arrest. In a letter written to Sir Walter from the ship, the Andre Lebon, between Penang and Singapore, Dr. Pillay complained that after leaving Hong Kong a person introduced himself as a Scotland Yard detective and told him it would take him (Pillay) 'a long time to reach Colombo even after leaving Singapore.'

"Dr. Pillay seemed to fear that this meant that some political charge was being framed against him, and spoke of committing suicide if menaced with arrest.

"Sir Walter Strickland describes his adopted son as being 'a charming and socialable companion, and a devoted husband and father,' who was also a most original and gifted naturalist and well-trained man of science. He held totally aloof from any form of politics."

Dr. T. P. Pillay's widow wrote me from India in June, 1939. Since his disappearance in 1923 she has neither heard from nor yet of the missing doctor.

With the death of Dr. Chempakaraman Pillai in 1934 Sir Walter Strickland reappointed me as executor, thus ending a political quarrel which had arisen between us over the question of Socialism in the Soviet Union. In this way I became Sir Walter's executor.

ARE SOCIALISTS RIGHT?

An Examination of Some Criticisms of the Capitalist System

By THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

[This article has been submitted by the author for publication, in a spirit of democracy. He has requested the editor to reply to its points; and he invites the widest and severest criticism, with a view to speeding the triumph of Truth, and the consequent well-being of humanity.—Ed.]

One of the main troubles afflicting this country at the present time (September 1940) is the fact that its people are suffering from an overdose of dope, mainly dope in connection with the war; but when hostilities cease and we address ourselves to the task of building a new and, we trust, a better world, it will be above all things necessary to rid our minds of all forms of dope and erroneous thinking. It is because I believe that much of the Left-wing criticism of the Capitalist system contains a considerable amount of faulty reasoning, that I am writing this article, hoping not only to rid the minds of others of certain illusions, but also to have my own mind similarly freed, if able critics can point out to me where I have gone wrong. I should like to add that I have absolutely no bias against people with Left-wing sympathies. Many of them, I know, are very intelligent and sincere and are actuated by the highest motives. It would be well, indeed, for the country if more people of other schools of thought were equally intelligent and had equally fine aims and ideals. Other adherents to a Left-wing philosophy are, again, living under conditions of great and undeserved hardship, the relief of which would be the first task undertaken by an intelligent Government.

What I wish to analyse clearly in my own mind and to assist my readers to analyse clearly in theirs, is the exact amount of harm which one of the most prominent and most criticized features of the Capitalist system, i.e., profit, inevitably does to the economic position of the weekly wage-earner. My own view is that profit, when paid to persons who have done little or nothing to deserve its financial blessings, is unfair to weekly wage-earners mainly in so far as it gives to its recipients a very definite advantage in the matter of acquiring, by purchase, certain articles of a "luxury" character, the natural supply of which is, and perhaps must always remain, restricted. If the object of desire be, for example, a bulldog capable of winning prizes at all the leading shows in the country, it is obvious that the man with a large income (who is likely to be the recipient of profits), will be at a great advantage, as far as securing possession of the animal is concerned, by comparison with the weekly wage-earner of more moderate means.

My Socialist friends will, however, agree with me when I say that inability to compete on equal terms in the matter of acquiring prize bulldogs and similar things, is not regarded by critics of the Capitalist system as one of the most important burdens which it imposes upon the poor!* These other burdens, as I hope to show, are, however, not imposed by the Capitalist system, per se, at all, if we define "Capitalism" as a system which permits the private ownership of land and industry and also production for profit.

Nearly four fifths of the evils popularly ascribed to Capitalism as above defined are in reality due to the defective monetary system; to out-of-date ideas on the subject of income in relation to employment; and to inability to see that the deserving unemployed can, and should, be supported, adequately, with money not derived from taxation. This is not the place to give a detailed description of the monetary system, although it is by far the most important factor in the economic field—more important, even, than the so-called greater realities of the physical production of goods and services, because it is allowed to control them and, for good or evil, in every civilized community will continue to control them whatever theoretical economists may say or think. Unfortunately, however, the ignorance which prevails in regard to the monetary system, even among Left-wing reformers, is not only collossal but also to a great extent wilful and obstinate. Apparently they do not want to study or understand it, fearing that if they do so they may be compelled to abandon, or modify, some of their most cherished Socialist or Communist theories. Mankind may to a great extent be divided into two classes: those who cling to error because the acceptance of new truth would interfere with their privileges; and those who cling to error because the acceptance of new truth would interfere with their prejudices. I am inclined to think that the latter class does even more harm than the former, not because its attitude of mind is more blameworthy—in many ways, indeed, it may be less blameworthy and more understandable—but because its members are far more numerous! Among those who would build a new world, however, there can be no place for men and women who hate and reject new truth, whatever may be their reasons for doing so.

The main defects in the monetary system, which are among the fundamental causes of evils popularly ascribed to Capitalism, are the non-regulation of the money supply by the maximum output and import or real wealth in the form of desired goods and services; the creation of money solely to enable banks to buy gold, purchase themselves Securities and make loans, and for no other purposes whatever; and the practice whereby the State obtains its revenue by taxation and by borrowing at interest, either new money created by the banks, or existing sums of money lent to it by the general public. Under a sensible system a large sum of new money would be created annually, not for lending at interest, but for spending. The total amount would be regulated by the country's production and import of real wealth and of this total the State would earmark for its own use whatever percentage was required to pay for its services, finance useful projects, or provide incomes for certain classes of deserving people including the unemployed. Taxation would be employed for one purpose only—the collection, for cancellation and destruction, of money which, if left permanently in circulation, would eventually pile up and cause inflation, inflation being a state of affairs where there is more money than can be backed by desired goods and services.

We now come to consider the harm done by out-of-date ideas on the subject of income in relation to employment and, by what is sometimes termed by progressive economists, the "work-complex." In the matter of the work-complex, the adherents both of Left and Right-wing policies are to a great extent, in a strange and hideous accord of error, the only difference being that, whereas the Right-wing supporters believe that everyone, in order to be entitled to receive an income, should be employed on paid work with the exception of a privileged few, the Left-wing supporters would permit no exceptions whatever, save of course in the case of persons who are physically unfit. What builders of the new world need to get into their heads, however, is the fact—a very startling and even unwelcome fact to many—that the "no work, no income" maxim began to get out of date when the first labour-saving machine was invented and has been getting steadily more and more out of date ever since. Far from it being the case that no one should receive an income for which he has not worked, we are gradually approaching a day when everyone should receive, anyhow as part of his income, money which he has not, in the strict sense, "earned." The reason is that to an increasing extent all members of a civilized community are recipients of "unearned" wealth or amenities, partly as a result of the work of scientists and inventors who are now dead, and partly as a result of the natural forces of heat, electricity, etc., which have been harnessed in man's service and which now perform, to a colossal and ever-increasing extent, the tasks formerly carried out by the strength of human muscles and the muscles of domestic animals.

For example, a new multiple automatic drilling machine with eight men has been estimated to do the work of two thousand men, each operating a single drilling machine.

The largest modern turbine in the United States had, some years ago, a capacity of 30,000 horse-power—that is to say, three million times the energy of a man on an eight-hour basis. Hence its total energy equalled that of nine million men, and four of such turbines would have a greater energy capacity than the entire working population of the U.S.A.

Facts like these cannot fail to produce an absolutely revolutionary effect, and it is one to the full significance of which very few people are yet awake.

Of course when asking Left-wing thinkers and others to accept what at first may appear to many of them to be the truly dreadful and immoral maxim that people are entitled to incomes which they have not earned, and when asking them to believe that the permanent provision of paid work for everyone is not a possible ultimate goal, I realise that there are a number of important qualifications and modifications which must be added. Even if paid work for all be not a permanent possibility, useful creative occupation for all is both possible and morally necessary. Some of the finest work, however, done even under the present system, is unpaid work, and to those whose leisure is adequately endowed from a financial standpoint, arts, crafts, hobbies, research, etc., will always provide useful fields of service of the community, especially when improved education (again calling for more money) provides the right mental and spiritual equipment.

Again, new inventions meeting new desires tend to create fresh employment and to slow down the effect of the general labour-destroying tendency of modern machinery. Reduction of hours can, and should, enable employment to be spread more widely, but there is little chance of Note.—*If a war were continued until the bulk of the working population had been killed; most of the industrial plant destroyed; or most of the raw materials used up; a true shortage even of the essential commodities might arise, a situation that would have to be dealt with by rationing combined with the provision of sufficient money to enable the poor to buy their full ration. By way of contrast to this "true" shortage we have the artificial shortage of normal peace time which is due solely to lack of money.

a widespread reduction of hours unless an increase in the money supply enables consumers to meet, in prices, the increased wage-costs due to the taking on of more employees at the same rate of pay for the same output.

After the war, not only will there be war damage to be made good, but also an enormous arrears of work held up on account of the war, and these two factors, together, may temporarily reduce unemployment to an extent which it is difficult to forsee exactly. But do not let us run away from the fact that this reduction, however great, can only be temporary. You cannot introduce labour-saving devices and not expect to save labour, and the process of labour-saving will continue until a point is reached when further reduction of hours to ensure work for all must involve inconvenience and absurdity. We are compelled, therefore, to reach this very important conclusion, that if half-a-dozen men operating a machine for short hours and under ideal conditions can produce enough goods for one hundred men, the ninety-four as well as the six must be given enough money to buy their share of the goods. This arrangement need not in any way preclude giving the six workers extra money as a reward for their services nor need it prevent persons known to be refusing work for which they are still needed from being disqualified from receipt of income, if such coercion be necessary in order to discourage idleness.

With these somewhat lengthy introductory remarks, we can now approach the main point of our enquiry, which I can sum up as being the claim often made by Left-wing speakers and writers that the sum of money retained by Capitalist employers and investors in the form of profits deprives weekly wage-earners of goods to the same value and is the main cause of the widespread poverty, distress and inequality of economic opportunity which we see around us.

When an employer or an investor receives money, there are four things he may do with it: he may hoard it; he may invest it in Government Securities; he may invest it in industry; or he may spend it.

If he hoards it, in spite of the eulogy of thrift which we so constantly hear, he is, for the time being at any rate, performing an anti-social act, for hoarded money gives no employment and assists in the satisfaction of no human need. The number of misers, however, who simply hoard their money, is too small to constitute an economic problem of any importance.

If the recipient of profits invests his money in Government Securities, he also performs an anti-social act, although the dope propaganda of Finance and of war governments may seek to deceive us into believing the contrary.

As indicated earlier in the present article, the State should not, and need not, borrow any money at all, nor encourage either private individuals or banks to lend it money. It should earmark for its own use whatever percentage of an annual debt-free creation of money it really requires, using taxation only as a means of collecting, for destruction, surplus money for the prevention of inflation. Although Government Securities are represented as being, not only a patriotic form of investment, but also an extremely safe one, they are, in point of fact, an arrangement which is both stupid and parasitic and one which can have no place in an enlightened order of things. Government Securities are a foolish and parasitic form of investment, because the interest on them is paid out of taxation. In so far, therefore, as a holder of Government Securities is also a taxpayer, the State is taking away from him with one hand the money which it is handing back to him with the other. He would, in fact, be just as well off if he had no taxation and received no interest on his Government Bonds! No wonder Government Securities are a "safe" investment—they are just as "safe," sure and regular as the taxation which provides them!

In so far as holders of Government Securities are not also taxpayers, one section of the community is being increasingly burdened with taxes to collect a tribute of interest to be paid to another section. This tribute is particularly unfair when it is paid to banks, which possess the right, within certain fairly wide limits, of creating, by a stroke of the pen, new money herewith to buy themselves Securities.

The best way, however, of dealing with the investment of profits, in Government Securities, is to do away with the National Debt and the Government Securities themselves, as being a most pernicious and socially useless form of investment, not only for profits, but for all other money as well. This is a reform which can be accomplished without any difficulty whatever and without robbing any investor of the money which he earned or acquired in a normal way and used to purchase his holdings of Government Stock.

If the recipient of profits invests his money in industry, he does, it is true, under the present system, create a shortage of purchasing-power for goods (usually consumable goods) to the sum so treated. This, however, as I shall proceed to show, is not his fault, nor is the investment necessarily an anti-social act. The trouble which arises is the fault of the monetary system. When a person invests money in industry, that money is paid out for various purposes, including wages, to finance an increase in the production of goods or services, and, seeing that the investor will hope to receive a return for his investment, goods or services which the public are likely to require. Now there is absolutely nothing harmful or anti-social about financing an additional output of goods or services if they are of a kind which the people of the country desire, but when new goods and services are put on the market, additional to the regular output, new money must be created and put straight into consumers' pockets to enable them to buy that additional output. If this is not done, money formerly used to buy the regular output will be diverted to buy the new goods or services, and the industries concerned with producing the regular output will suffer. The creation of new money solely for the purpose of financing the consumption of new goods, the present monetary system does not, however, permit.

Incidentally, seeing that this article aims at the de-bunking of some popular fallacies, it may be well to point out that the idea that the Capitalist recipients of profits invest their money because they "cannot" spend their incomes, has little foundation in fact. Human desires and interest and the capacity of modern civilization to meet them are alike so vast that no one, if he desires to do so, is likely to experience much difficulty in spending even the largest sums, either on his own interests, or on the promotion of human welfare.

Finally, the recipient of profits may spend the money he receives. Here we come up against the most devastating Left-wing fallacy. It seems to be almost always assumed that when the recipient of profits spends his money, in some way or other he personally consumes and devours either the whole of the money or the whole of its equivalent in goods and services, or both, without in any way assisting other and poorer people to relieve their needs. Nothing, however, is further from the truth. Let us take as an example the case of a recipient of profits who uses a large sum of money to buy an expensive car. When he pays for the car, automatically he starts a process whereby the money is broken up and widely redistributed, enabling innumerable persons, very many of them belonging to the poorer classes, to satisfy their needs. The money goes, in varying proportions, to all who are engaged in the car industry, and from the car industry to those ancillary industries which supply the materials from which cars are made. In process of time, also, the money travels further, reach-those engaged in the car industry and the ancillary industries and, via the retailers, the money passes to the middlemen and primary producers who supply them with goods. It may be objected that a considerable proportion of the money paid for the car goes as profits to the owners of the car industry, but this money, again, will be subdivided as soon as it is spent. The total charge which the recipient of profits has been enabled to levy on the community amounts therefore to one car which he has been in a position to induce it to provide for his benefit; but he has not been able to make this charge without handing back to a large number of other members of the community the means of satisfying their own needs.

Now when the object of purchase was a prize bulldog, we saw that the recipient of profits was able, by what he secured for his money, to prevent other people from gaining possession of a similar object, owing to the inevitable extreme scarcity of prize bulldogs. If, therefore, a critic of the Capitalist system were to maintain that this is unfair to the poorer man who may be an equally enthusiastic bulldog fancier, I would not venture to dispute the justice of his opinion and would study with interest any recommendations he might make for the fairer assignment of prize bulldogs. But if the critic went on to claim that the same argument holds good in regard to cars and thousands of other articles which form the necessaries or ordinary amenities of civilized existence, I should be compelled to tell him that he was talking through his hat. In peace time, at any rate, there is sufficient raw material, labour and industrial plant available to make a car for everybody who wants one, provided he has a sufficient amount of money to pay for it, nor is there any lack of desire on the part of those engaged in the car industry to meet an increased demand, so long as the price does not fall from lack of money in consumers' pockets.* And why should there be any lack of money? There is no physical limit to the amount of money which can easily be created and new money for the purchase of cars would not be inflationary, seeing that we are assuming that the real wealth, i.e., the cars, would be available to back the new money and give it value. It has been pointed out, also, that there is a fairly strict physical limit to the amount of things which any one human can consume personally. He cannot sleep in more than one bed at a time; nor wear more than one suit of clothes at a time; nor can he eat more than one dinner without risk of indigestion; and in the age of potential abundance in which we live, when industry can produce on so large a scale, while there may be a moral problem connected with the right of certain individuals who receive large profits to arrange what one may term "first direction" of these sums of money, there is no serious economic problem at all which is really due to this cause.

What has been said with regard to the employer or investor receiving profits, applies also to a very great extent to the landlord receiving rent. If the landlord spends his rent money, or if he invests it in industry, he must, willy nilly, to a great extent restore it to rent-payers. Keeping land required for a socially desirable purpose unutilized, in the hope of selling it at some future date at an increased price, is undoubtedly an evil comparable to the hoarding of money and legislation may be desirable to deal with it; but again it is not so common a practice as to create an economic problem of any importance and it would probably be even less common under a system where the supply of money was adequate. The main reason why people lack the goods which can be produced from land is not that selfish landlords keep it out of use. It is that so many persons lack the money to pay a fair price for the goods which could be obtained from land where no barrier to increased production even now exists. In spite of the growth of the world's population and of widespread damage done to land in certain foreign countries by improvident and foolish methods of agriculture, there is still a tendency (which may become more marked when certain very recent scientific discoveries, promising phenomenal results, have been given a fuller trial), for it to be possible for the world's total requirements in respect of food to be produced from a smaller area of ground rather than a larger one. Before the war, adverse criticism was often passed in regard to the large increase of British land which was being used for pasture and sometimes neglected pasture at that. While not denying that the criticism had a considerable amount of justification, I would remind readers that in a sane world-economy the different agricultural products required for the world's consumption would be produced in those parts of the world, and those parts only, where they could be brought into being with the minimum of labour and expense and possessing the highest standard of quality. It is, for example, foolish to struggle with an adverse soil and climate to produce, laboriously and expensively, indifferent crops or livestock on a Highland deer forest, if all that we need in the way of corn and meat can be imported from Australia or Canada or grown and raised in the more fertile portions of our own land.

*I am ignoring the traffic problem which a multiplicity of cars might create as this is irrelevant to the main argument.

In conclusion, we may examine certain economic and social evils or injustices which are popularly supposed to be inseperable from the Capitalist system, but which, in reality, are due to defects in the monetary system and to the work-complex. The complaint is often made that the power and advantage enjoyed by the Capitalist employer who receives profit enables him to compel the weekly wage-earner to choose between unemployment and semi-starvation and the acceptance of a hard, dangerous, unhealthy and probably ill-paid job. Furthermore, it is claimed that employers cut the wages of their work-people to the lowest minimum in order to increase their profits and that they even like to maintain a large body of unemployed as a kind of reservoir for cheap labour.

Under a reformed financial system, however, which created and issued to consumers an adequate supply of money, no employer would be able to compel his work-people to accept bad conditions or unreasonably low rates of pay. At the present time if it be suggested to an employer that he should reduce hours and take on more work-people, he may reply, and in some cases with considerable justice, that he cannot afford to do so, because, if he increased his prices by adding to his wage-costs he would no longer be able to sell his goods. He may raise a similar objection to the suggestion that he should increase his rates of pay, adding, perhaps, that he cannot do so at the expense of his profits as his rate of profit is already cut as low as he can afford. If it be suggested to an employer that he should carry out certain structual alterations in his works for the greater safety or better health of his employees, he may again reply that he cannot afford to do this since his credit for new capital expenditure is already strained to the uttermost. None of these objections, however, need be accepted by the State under a reformed financial system. The State would say to the employer "You can perfectly well afford to take on more workpeople, as, even if you do have to increase your prices, we are arranging that your customers shall have enough money to meet the increase. The same argument applies if we require you to pay better wages. With regard to structural alterations in the interests of the health and safety of your employees, if you can show us that you really cannot afford to execute these at your own expense, we will arrange to lend you the necessary money on extremely reasonable terms, possibly with no interest-charge at all."

The power of the weekly wage-earner to stand out indefinitely against a bad employer would also become immensely strong. It will be remembered that the deserving unemployed would be maintained in comfort with money not obtained from the taxpayer, and the definition of a "deserving" unemployed person would be one who was not known to be refusing work for which he was needed; of which he was physically and mentally capable; and the pay and general conditions of which were good. An employer, therefore, who tried to offer jobs in connection with which the pay and conditions were bad, would never get anyone to work for him and would be obliged either to mend his ways or to go out of business.

The above does not pretend to be a comprehensive survey of the entire Capitalist system in all its aspects, nor does it claim to provide adequate answers to every weighty and legitimate criticism. It covers no more ground than it attempts to cover, but such points as are raised are of immense importance and should not be set aside from mere emotional prejudice or a blind loyalty to the doctrines of old-time leaders, which need careful revision in the modern world.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Comrade,—If goodwill be the starting point for world peace, surely all men and women should set about now to make all children firm pacifists. Despite the times the chances are unique. The material is sensitive, reslilient and strong. On this foundation we can build if we will, firm fair structures for world stability. Foresight, faith, and courage would be our allies.

Teachers feel they cannot teach pacifism just now. Do they realise that their very presence in the schoolroom militates against militarism. The very way in which you take a child's hand can move him to rebel, or obey, and many chances occur to "set the points" in a child's mind.

Even if the teacher loses his or her post, the influence remains, and if already friendly with the parents, the pacifist teacher can continue his work for peace. If parents, teachers and writers would but unite, they could form youth movements which could not be adapted to the needs of War; and so great is the dynamic power of truth in the hands of those who are "wise as serpents and harmless as doves," that one can easily hope for the children's newspaper, text books and entertainments provided by the pacifist writer and organiser. For not till the music of pacifism is ringing in the ears of youth shall War's "Pied Piper" play for them in vain.

AGNES W. MACKAY.

Liverpool L., September 15, 1940.

Dear Guy Aldred,—To-night, reading The Word, the query has again crossed my mind, can a C.O. possibly remain a school teacher? How about teaching the children to sing "God save the king"—send him victorious, etc., etc.—and "Land of Hope and Glory" wider still and wider still our bounds be set?

Hearing of the death of Neville Chamberlain, I am wondering how many men have died since war was declared, either due to a broken heart that war should ever have come again upon us after our promises to those ten million men twenty-five years ago, or to mental strain causing physical illhealth, through supporting the war against the conscience for one reason or another, e.g., lack of courage or love of wife and children.

Yours in Fellowship,

FLORA COLLAR.

Ruskington, Lincs., 10th November, 1940.

Dear Aldred,—Your attitude towards the ethical side of Jesus' life and teaching I regard as extremely valuable. The deification of Jesus has put him on a pedestal where his moral influence has not been effectual.

The modern stress, even by orthodox theologians, of the catastrophic and apocalyptic elements in the Gospels detracts from the moral work of Jesus. Your analysis always seems to me to select these principles which have value in every age.

Conditions here, Sunday work, overtime, and the British totalitarian propaganda make one feel a voice crying in the wilderness. Yet every week that passes seems to make the foul business madder than ever.

Believe me,

Your friend and fellow-worker,

(Rev.) RICHARD LEE.

Coventry, September 27.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I want to thank you for your pamphlet, "Why Jesus Wept." It is an ingenious, dramatic title and can, I see, be used very effecitvely. I have read it all with interest, most of it, if not all, very familiar ground. That you "invite criticism" shows that you believe you may not be altogether right every time, although at times you verge on the dogmatic and final. I have abjured all finalities and absolutes. The human mind is not geared to deal with them. As Hamlet said they are "Words, words, words."

Trying to assess what you really are by the reading of your booklet, I'll be hanged if I know. It doesn't matter much. Whether you are Anarchist, Atheist, Materialist, Unitarian or heaven knows what, you are on the right road in general.

Atheism and Theism, to me, are futile battles. Someone said that Atheism is simply Fundamentalism turned round. You seem a bit severe on Immortality, and not always consistent. Your opening words are "No man or woman ever became immortal" (whatever immortal means). Then on page 5, "Jesus is immortal." Then you give reasons why. But the reasons don't matter in view of your earlier affirmation. I, too, am an admirer of Jesus, but I think you are too uncritical of the records which are our sources of Jesus. Mentioning Voysey, whom I used to read with interest, I recall how he said most people, Unitarians too, picked out the nice parts about Jesus and left the others.

Unmistakably, if we take the Gospel records, this Jesus was a revolutionary, taught principles which, if applied, would overthrow society. It is spiritual TNT. Tolstoi was quite right in this respect.

I agree too wth you, that the Hyde Park Secularist of the Old School, is simply ridiculous. Once allow the Bible as a human, very human record of the Jewish people, it is a delightful, as well as a most dramatic text book, or to use a phrase of my own, it is a great Human Picture Gallery of all types which are walking about our streets to-day. Whether the folks actually lived doesn't matter two pins, any more than Antigone or the great Greek heroes. Neither the orthodox nor the heretic has this view of the Bible. Once allow it is a human derived book which took fully a thousand years to accumulate, all the wordy stuff, pro and con, falls to the ground.

However, I must not go on, but you see how provocative your Jesus Wept is. I see you were in prison. There is a time when all good men ought to be in prison. I think of a lecture, "The men who have been in prison, and the men who ought to be."

Yours sincerely,

H. J. ADLARD.

Bath, October 24, 1940.

In a letter, dated November 8, Mr. Adlard writes:

"I admire Voysey for his courage; but I see that much of his liberalism was academic and abstract, and that though he was personally human and solicitous, he had no human, social gospel. Man and this world, whatever gods there be, is our First care. Your Life of Bakunin is a splendid affair, and to me, I admit, was most informing. Kropotkin I knew, and had read. He was a lovely soul.

"Atheism to me, as far as it interests me, is philosophically unsound. I wont waste time in its defence or attack. Philosophical anarcy has much appeal to me, but I also realise in a complicated machine society, there is need for organisation—Socialism."

HOW IT HAPPENED

Showing how the Anti-Comintern Pact became the Russo-German Pact.

November 25, 1936.

The Anti-Communist Agreement between Germany and Japan is signed in Berlin.

Von Ribbentrop, German Ambassador to Britain, and Count Mushakoji, Japanese Ambassador to Germany, sign a document whereby their two Governments agree to "inform one another of the activities of the Communist International, to consult with one another on the necessary preventive measures and to carry these through in collaboration."

Von Ribbentrop warned the Soviet Union in a public statement:

"Japan will not suffer the expansion of Bolshevism in Eastern Asia. Germany is bulwark against this pestilence in the heart of Europe. Finally Italy will carry the anti-Bolshevik banner in the South."

November 6, 1937.

The Anti-Comintern Pact is signed in Rome.

Count Ciano, Herr von Ribbentrop, and the Japanese Ambassador, Mr. Hotta, were the signatories to the new pact.

An official communique issued in Berlin declared:

"The world has shown unmistakably that three great powers, and with them 200,000,000 people, are not prepared to come to terms with Communism nor to relinquish for political or other considerations the vitally essential fight to combat Bolshevism."

March 17, 1938.

On behalf of the Soviet Union, M. Litvinov proposes a conference between France, Britain, U.S.A and U.S.S.R.

Iitvinov states why Germany, Italy, and Japan are not invited. Because:—"We do not wish to discuss aggression with aggressors."

April 7, 1939.

Franco Spain joins the Anti-Comintern Pact. The members now are Germany, Italy, Japan, Manchukuo, Hungary, Spain. The German and Italian Press acclaim this as "the final victory over 'Communism' in Spain."

He signs the pact the same night.

August 24, 1939.

The terms of the pact are announced.

These were the terms:

"(1) The two contracting powers undertake to refrain from any act of force, any aggressive act and any attacks against each other or in conjunction with any other powers.

"(2) If one of the contracting powers should become the object of warlike action on the part of a third power the other contracting power will in no way support the third power.

"(3) The two Governments will in future remain in consultation with one another in order to inform themselves about questions which touch their common interests.

"(4) Neither of the two contracting powers will join any other group of powers which directly or indirectly is directed against one of the two.

"(4) In case differences or conflict should arise between the two contracting powers on questions of any kind, the two partners will solve these disputes or conflcts exclusively by friendly exchange of views or, if necessary, by arbitration commissions.

"(6) The Agreement is concluded for the duration of ten years, with the stipulation that unless one of the contracting partners gives notice to terminate it one year before its expiration it will automatically be prolonged for five years.

"(7) The present agreement shall be ratified in the shortest possible time. The ratification documents are to be exchanged in Berlin. The Treaty comes into force immediately after it has been signed."

Von Ribbentrop stated:

"The Fuhrer and Stalin have decided for friendship. The non-aggression and consultation pact has established a firm and unshakeable foundation on which both States will build and develop."

Joachim Von Ribbentrop, who flew to Moscow to sign the pact, was born in 1892. He became Nazi Commissioner of Disarmament in 1934. He then became Ambassador at Large and built up an Anti-Communist Front with Japan and Italy. In 1936 he came to London as German Ambassador. He was welcomed by the Tory-Fascist as the champion of Anti-Communism. Until his flight to Moscow on August 23, Ribbentrop was working to change the anti-Comintern pact into a full military alliance.

STRICKLAND, JAPAN and BUDDHISM

By A. A. MORTON

[The following criticism of Sir Walter Strickland's essay on Buddhism has been addressed to us by Mr. Morton from The Hill House, Surrey. It is published because we believe in full and free discussion and democracy.—Ed.]

A copy of the September number of The Word has only just come to my hand. I am glad to see that its columns are open to discussion for I should much like to comment on the article "Imperialism in the Orient."

Though I sympathise with Sir Walter Strickland in his strictures on so-called Christianity and its stultifying effect on the moral advancement of its votaries, I claim that his exposition of Buddhism is untrue and unfair. It is true that there is a Buddhism that has wandered as far from the ideals of the Buddha as Christianity has from the teaching found in the Christian Gospels. The statesmen of Japan do not represent what real students, or ardent truth-seekers know as Buddhism. That is as rare in Japan as real mysticism, inner spiritual perception, it., in so-called Christian Europe. But it exists.

When Sir Walter says "the Orient is no more" he speaks in a loose manner. It is true that the pernicious materialism of the West has been eagerly assimilated by a parvenue Japan, with irreparable harm to her people. But equally, the coming to the West, since Britain went to India, of knowledge till that time witheld, has undermined the mighty power of that religious mould, the Christian Church the crumbling away of which will be a service to humanity. His picture of Buddhism is a travesty of the real thing, and the crimes and imbecilities laid to its score remain in the imagination of Sir Walter who seems almost wilfully to misrepresent the real teaching of Gautama the latest of the Buddhas, of which I claim he has only touched the fringe. For he is evidently unaware of what Buddhists gave to the world at the end of last century when he says "Buddhism has no idea of evolution," for the "new" teaching of a threefold evolutionary process helped to explode the mouldy. Darwinian ape-man theory now discarded by advanced anthropologists. Nor, in the face of the mass of information then broadcast can it be said that Buddhism is opposed to science, except in the sense of a passive resistance to that materialistic aspect which is insidiously disintegrating modern civilization. For, of real science, the knowledge of realities it holds the keys and can teach a pupil, willing to undergo the ardous preliminary training—and what advanced scientist has not come through such? —short cuts to ends, to reach which materialistic science exhausts its brain power.

One can almost smile at the virulence of the attack on Buddhism, as if the writer were fighting some inner self that once had vision, but had lost it.

"Buddhism in power" is non-existent and Buddhism cannot be compared with that Christianity which was in "power" initiating the crusades and other wars. No war has been made in the name of Buddha, but crusades, religious persecutions and wars have been waged in the name of Christ, by professing Christians with the sanction of the church. Here is a fundamental difference. Nations whose form of religion has been Buddhism have no doubt fought to defend themselves, may even have fought for supremacy, but not as Buddhists. Compare this with, for instance, the Spanish Conquerors who carried the cross as their standard and excuse for delivery unspeakable in the Americas.

While Sir Walter's indictment of so-called religion, whether it be Buddhism of Christianity is not only deserved, but necessary at the present time, this indictment deals only with the outward results coming from religionists who adhere to one form or another, knowing nothing of the inner fount which has become frozen by priest-craft and mere wordly ambition.

Has Sir Walter probed to the significance of the title of your paper? The Word proclaimed by all religions as that which touches the spirit of man to life, that real life-chain which links the invisible to all known and unknown-as-yet LIFE? Volumes could be written on it.

If any of your readers are interested to know what I mean when I say "what Buddhists gave to the world at the end of last century" I shall be very glad to explain the matter.

WELSH ABSOLUTIST

The Manchester Guardian, in its issue for August 10 last, published the following report:

"ACT OF COURTESY TO TRIBUNAL

"C.O.'s ATTITUDE.

"From our North Wales Reporter.

"At the North Wales C.O. Tribunal at Wrexham yesterday, Douglas Maurice Wolff, 29, who lives with his wife on a lonely mountain farm near Llangwen, Corwen, said that for four years he had been actively engaged in the propagation of peace ideals. Under the pen-name of Paul Sheridan, by which he was also known, he wrote, without payment, articles for Welsh and English papers on the subject of peace. He said he refused to accept food from a State with which he was in complete disagreement. In 1936 his conscience compelled him to leave the Roman Catholic Church because that church bound him to give aid to the State if and when engaged in war. In answer to questions he was growing his own food.

"Asked what work he was prepared to do for the the State in the present crisis, the applicant said that though his conscience did not stop him from performing humanitarian duties his conscience could not accept any conditions from the Tribunal.

"CHAIRMAN—Why come here then?

"APPLICANT—I have come here as an act of courtesy, and I think it is my duty to avail myself of every opportunity to propagate my views.

"CHAIRMAN—In effect, what you say is this: 'I am going to take advantage of the Court but. I am not going to do anything to carry out the decision of the Court!' You want to have your cake and eat it. To be perfectly consistent you should have ignored the Tribunal and let the law take its course.

"Applicant was registered as a C.O. on condition that he undertook work on the land."

Comrade Wolf has filled in Form C of The C.O., The Tribunal, and after, as follows:

"Result of Local Tribunal—

"NAME—Douglas Maurice Wolff, living as, and known as Paul Sheridan.

"The above name, Sheridan, is recognised on my Identity Card, thus: 'D. M. Wolff, commonly known as Paul Sheridan.'

"ADDRESS—'Fron Uchaf,' Ty-Nant, Corwen, N. Wales.

"RESULT OF CASE—Class B Land Work. (Unconditional Exemption demanded).

"YOUR REMARKS ON CONDUCT OF CASE—Fair hearing Judge.

Sir Thomas Artemus Jones (North Wales C.O. Tribunal) said that my case was so logical as to virtually demand that I ignore the Court and make no appearance or acknowledgment whatsoever. His Honour thought that I 'wanted to eat my cake and have it.'

"HAVE YOU APPEALED AND ON WHAT GROUNDS—Yes, most emphatically I have appealed, on the grounds that I hope to make the Judges of the Appellate Tribunal see what the ditto of the Local Tribunal could not, namely, that as a Pacifist it behoves me to take any and every opportunity of broadcasting pacifist views, and particularly take all opportunity of carrying my banner into the camps of those who are most against my ideals. I regarded the Local Tribunal as my platform. I shall regard the Appellate Tribunal in the same way for, though I hope to convince the latter where the former refused to be convinced, I am not affected by any possible ups or downs in their final judgment of my conscience. This, my conscience, is my own, intact, God-given, mine.

"Secondly, I have appealed on the grounds that there is no individual judgment of cases at the North Wales C.O. Tribunal. All the cases for the afternoon session on the day I attended were examined, six in all, and then the judges retired, returning with six verdicts. I consider this most undesirable, as important details must inevitably be forgotten as case follows case.

"ANY FURTHER PARTICULARS—No. I have not yet received word to attend my Appellate Tribunal.

"P.S.—It is important to note that though I am using the name Sheridan, I am still registered at the Labour Exchange as D. M. Wolff, and in the name I was examined as a 'conchie.'"

HITLER AND STALIN

Many foolish people objected to the fact that we reprinted in the October Word three of Hitler's English Leaflets attacking Bolshevism, without making comment on each leaflet. They overlooked the fact that we reproduced the Bolshevik 1936 denunciation of Hitler in the same issue, also without comment. In the same number, we published two essays under the title, "Good Neighbours," exposing the Soviet-Nazi Pact. It must be clear therefore that we did not endorse Hitler's criticisms, but were exposing the Hitler propaganda, and the Hitler-Stalin pact. If the Bolsheviks were serious in their attacks on Hitler, if Hitler was serious in his opposition to Stalin, then the pact ought never to have come into existence. As it is, the parties to the pact are self-exposed as hypocrites. The few remaining issues of the October Word ought to be bought up and circulated widely. The Hitler and Bolshevik reprinted essays make sound understanding propaganda.

From the front page of The Scottish Daily Worker, for November 11, 1940, we reproduce the following news-gem:

MOLOTOV TO VISIT BERLIN

The following announcement has been made in Moscow:—

On the invitation of the German Government and in answer to last year's trip of German Minister of Foreign Affairs, Von Ribbentrop, to Moscow, the Chairman of the Council of Peoples Commissars, U.S.S.R. and Peoples Commissar of Foreign Affairs, M. Molotov, will visit Berlin in the near future in order, by renewing personal contact, to continue and deepen current exchange and opinions within the framework of friendly relations existing between the two countries.

Study this item—then turn to the manifestos and denunciations reprinted in the October Word. Form your own conclusions—and recall the Reichstag fire trial!

'COMRADE' MAISKY

The Soviet Ambassador to Britain was present at the tribute paid in Westminster Abbey to the late Neville Chamberlain. His colleage, Molotov, wined and dined in Berlin with Hitler.

The Daily Worker, for Saturday, November 9, carried an advertisement of The Labour Monthly, headed, "Soviet Union, War and Peace," and including excerpts from R. P. D's "Notes of the Mouth" in the November issue. Here is one excerpt:

"The revolutionary struggle in this war against Hitler, against Churchill, against all the imperialists, is the struggle of the working people in all countries, the united international struggle, conducted by each people in the first place against their own imperialists

What hypocrisy!

And here is an extract from The New Leader, for Thursday, November 7, 1940:

"This story seems to have a moral both for Britain and for Russia.

"In 1912 Maisky, the present Soviet Ambassador, came to this country as a political exile. He travelled (naturally) third class. There was a regulation that third class immigrants could be admitted only if they had £5. Maisky had only £3. But he pleaded that he was a political refugee needing asylum. As proof he produced a letter from the Russian Social Democratic Party. He was admitted.

"The Britain of 1912 was more liberal than the Britain of 1940. And one of the least pleasant features of the Soviet Government, whose members (when they were alive) owed so much to the tradition of asylum, has always been its contempt for that tradition.

"But, of course, 1912 and the days when the exile Maisky had only £3 in his pocket are a long time ago.

"A far cry indeed to the Soviet Ambassador who can afford £1,600 for his private air raid shelter."

Dr. Howard K. Beale, Professor of American History at the University of North Carolina, dealing with conscription in the United States, and the conscientious objectors' clauses, states:

"You can not conquer Hitlerism if you let it conquer you in the process. If at the first step we destroy liberty of conscience, you have already lost the battle for freedom. In Germany such freedom is impossible. In England it has been meticulously preserved in a draft law. I don't want to see America adopt Hitler's method. I want it to adopt the British and true American method."

CYRIL McGOVERN

Cyril M'Govern, 416 Amulree Street, Glasgow, E., son of Mr. John M'Govern, M.P., appeared before the Conscientious Objectors' Appellate Tribunal in Edinburgh on Friday, November 15, and declared that "if a Government was in power with a real mandate from the people I would support them in a just war."

M'Govern appealed against a decision of the local Tribunal in Glasgow that he be removed from the register without qualification.

The appellant declared—"This is not a just war."

He believed that the Spanish Government had a just cause in the struggle against Franco.

Asked whether we in this country should lie down to the aggressor, M'Govern said that in this war both countries were aggressors. They were aggressors in their own interests.

John M'Govern, M.P., father of the appellant, said that if the case was decided against his son "he is bound to go to prison, and he will go."

The war would never have taken place, John M'Govern added, had the selfish interests pooled their resources and called a world conference to distribute these resources.

The Appellate Tribunal registered Cyril M'Govern conditionally, provided he left his employment in the Glasgow Corporation Public Assistance Department, and took up work in agriculture or forestry.

He claimed that the Government did not have a majority of the people of this country behind them in prosecuting the war.

John M'Govern admitted that the case of his son was really a political one, but, from his knowledge of debates in the House of Commons he insisted that provision had been made for a political objector.

SCOTS NATIONALIST C.O. JAILED

A Scottish Nationalist, Ernest Alfred Garden Pirie, c/o Galvin, 65 Garmouth Street, Glasgow, appeared before Sheriff Berry at Glasgow Sheriff Court on Monday, November 18, on a charge of having failed to register under the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939.

Pirie stated that he was a conscientious objector, but had no religious reasons for not registering. "My reasons are purely political," he added.

He submitted that the Act of 1939, under which the charge was brought, applied to Scotland only by implication and reference and that it was contrary to the Treaty of Union.

Officers of the Ministry of Labour and National Service gave evidence. One said that Pirie told him he did not recognise the Armed Forces Act nor did he recognise English law.

The gist of Pirie's statement was that he had no religious grounds against war or national service, but that he made up his mind that because of his political opinions he preferred to go to prison rather than to register.

Witness added that he had ascertained that by trade Pirie was a butcher, so that he did not come within the exempted classes.

A fine of £5, with the option of 30 days' imprisonment, was imposed on Pirie.

Sheriff Berry ordered Pirie to be detained for seven days for the purpose of having him brought to the employment exchange for registration.

Pirie said he was not going to pay the fine.

The point taken against the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939, Section 1 and 22 is a sound legal argument. Also, there is a section of the Act, under which Pirie could have been registered by the Ministry of Labour without being jailed. Surely this section ought to have been applied under the circumstances. The result would have been less wasteful in every way.

HENRY J. ADLARD

PULPIT LIBERTARIAN

UNITARIAN—ANTI-MILITARIST AND ANTI-FASCIST

In Letters to the Editor (Word Series, Vol. I, No. 4) we reproduce a letter written to the Evening Times, Glasgow, in 1935, urging the need for a common citizenship between the United States of the American and the countries representing the British Commonwealth of Nations. The same view was advanced by the late Sir Walter Strickland and is summarised in one of the essays we contributed to the Malton Messenger, in 1939. We may have pioneered the suggestion but the Rev. Henry J. Adlard, at present Minister of Trim Street Unitarian Chapel, Bath, has lived the idea. Mr. Adlard's challenging criticism of Why Jesus Wept is reproduced in another column. The purpose of this article is to tell the story, in part, of the man himself, and of his work.

Rev. H. J. ADLARD From a Portrait published in the Duluth News Tribune

Henry J. Adlard has been a member of the R.P.A. for 25 years. One of his dearest friends was the late F. J. Gould. He has been interested in Socialist thought from the palmy days of Robert Blatchford, and feels that, for all his recantations, Blatchford did magnificent work for "the bottom dog," in the Clarion. In the United States, Mr. Adlard came to know Upton Sinclair, and found him a charming personality. Whilst minister of the Duluth Unitarian Church, Mr. Adlard reviewed Sinclair's works, as published in the columns of a Duluth paper, and was impressed by Sinclair's They Call Me Carpenter.

Henry Adlard was born in England. He began his preaching career as a Wesleyan local preacher in Leeds. Although married and past the ordinary age when men are accepted for the ministry, he was urged to offer himself. Did so, and was rejected on the grounds of age and marriage. He was accepted by the Canadian Methodist Church . At that very time he was caught in the toils of the New Theology which was the beginning of his spiritual emancipation. R. J. Campbell was then Adlard's God, and he once gave Adlard a short interview after a Temple service. Campbell went back and Adlard went forward, but the latter, recalling the city Temple episode and period, feels that he owes Campbell a debt.

In Canada Adlard had a year at Battleford, Sask, 600 miles west of Winnipeg. He spent 6 weeks in Winnipeg on the way up—This was an old prairie town. His New Theology views began to leak through and he had read widely, Huxley, Arnold, Spencer and the great Unitarians. It was a lonely cold spot, terrific winters, once 57 below zero. Every Sunday afternoon he drove ten miles out over a trail to school houses to preach. He got so disgusted with the whole outfit, that in desperation he preached "Six Appeals to Men of Reason." He got small bills printed, delivered them himself in a place of 1,500 people. They aroused the whole place. "Men of Reason" forsooth! Years later Adlard laughed. There were none. But many came! In a Methodist Church, Adlard took for his subject (1) God—Is there one? (2) The Bible—Is it true? (3) Sin—What is it? (4) Salvation—Do we need it? These addresses set things in an uproar. One of the congregation, a damned old rogue, as crooked as a lasso, took issue with Adlard, and tried to get him fired for heresy. The unsettlement and intense loneliness, caused Adlard to return to England. Here he went back into business but kept on preaching in a Lincs. market town. On the eve of an election he created another uproar by a sermon—"We are members one of another." He became Chairman of the Labour Party branch. One night he took in an protected a Socialist speaker who was being harrassed by a number of yokels. They knocked him off his box. All this was noised abroad in a Tory soaked town. Victimisation followed. So Adlard went back to Western Canada.

More battles, this time on economic grounds. He encountered another Goliath who "ran" the small church and had a pitched verbal showdown with him. This man, the local banker, controlled Adlard's salary. All the church finances were under his thumb against loans. The last night Adlard preached the Church had 12 there. The number of the disciples. He told them he had emptied the church simply by preaching the gospel of Jesus. But he found a good pal, a lad from Lancs. who ran the weekly paper. He was a Socialist, and backed Adlard through thick and thin. Adlard left the Methodist Church at the end of that year.

Adlard made contact with Boston, Unitarian headquarters. With their backing he went to Moose Jaw, a town of about 18,000 where he began preaching in a picture theatre in the Main Street. Continued here for three summer months, while his wife and three small children lived in a large tent, a mile from town, by the river. In October he hailed off to Pennsylvania, 1,500 miles, where he went to Theological School (Unitarian). He remained here a year living on next to nothing and working at any old thing. He was satisfying his gluttony for learning.

Adlard got a call to Dunkirk, N.Y., on Lake Erie, near Buffalo. He was there six years, happy, wonderfully successful. He had found his stride. He was there most of the World War, and had some stirring times. Two sermons he delivered then he has preserved. "The Two Bethlehems" Christmas Bethlehem, Palestine. Bethlehem Pa.—steel mills. The other defended the C.Os. This was 1913-1918.

From there to Ottawa, Canada, 1918-1921. He received a call to Niagra Falls, N.Y., but did not go. 1921-1924—Duluth, Minn. Duluth church had been actually closed nine months. No Sunday School. He started at zero. Started Book Talks. Reviewed a lot of books for Duluth Herald. Spoke at all sorts of things. Slowly developed a thought centre.

Des Moines Ia., 1924—1928, the biggest church he had. At the end of that time Duluth invited him to preach for a Sunday, just for old times sake. He went and was begged to return. He did so, and had another seven years. One year in Duluth he spoke 60 times outside the church. Adlard wrote for The Labour World in Duluth.

Sioux City, Ia., 1935-1936.—After visiting England in 1935 and 1936, he preached at Bath, and was called to Trim Chapel, and here he is in an ancient Tory ridden, Church of England ridden city.

Mr. Adlard was minister of the Duluth First Unitarian Church for a number of years. In Duluth, he lived at 1921 Greysolon Road, and made his home a centre from which to develop widespread love of thought and culture. He lectured on Charles Dickens' Gospel of Laughter and Tears, on John Bunyan and his Pilgrims, the Friendship of Books, Wanderings on a Wheel Through Literary England, Walls of Prejudice and Bridges of Understanding, Modern Books and Plays, Modern American and British Poetry, etc. In Duluth he published a book of poems, Duluth Days and Dreams. Before the Twentieth Century Club of that city he gave a book review lecture that roused much interest, on Margaret Fuller—America's Most Remarkable Woman. At Coleraine, Minn., he held the complete attention of a critical audience to whom he read Green Pastures. He read Journey's End to the Hibling Fortune Club and the audience felt that it had seen the play.

To the Duluth News Tribune, Mr. Adlard contributed a history of Unitarianism and of the Duluth Church in particular. The bond of Union in that church, drawn up in 1895, read as follows:

> "An association where people without regard to theological differences may unite for mutual helpfulness, the uplifting of character and religious culture, by writings and such other educational, social, and charitable work as shall be agreed upon."

Mr. Adlard's description of Unitarianism read, in part, as follows:

> "The name Unitarian, in its theological sense, implies a belief in one God, the unity of God, in contrast to Trinitarian, commonly avowed by most Protestants and Roman Catholics, wherein the nature of God is conceived of as triune, a God who is three persons in one, and yet one person who is still three.
>
> "The most important conflicts over this matter of the Trinity have been around the person of Jesus and his relation to God. It is the verdict of many eminent scholars that the early Christians knew nothing of such a Trinity: that it was imported with many another idea from Greece and elsewhere about 200 A.D., and became very definitely accepted at the famous council of Nicea in 325 A.D. This discussion caused a split in the Church which has continued to this day.
> "Unitarians maintain that present conventional Christianity follows the teaching of the fourth Gospel, of Paul and Augustine, rather than the simple teaching of Jesus as found in the synoptic gospels. For so believing, Unitarians have suffered persecution, civil disabilities, martyrdom. Adam Duff was burned in 1326 and Servetus in 1553.
>
> "The name Unitarian, as such, was first used by a group in Transylvania in 1563 and shortly afterward in Poland and Hungary. . . . In England, Unitarianism by that definite name, made its first appearance in 1773; but in all these countries it must be understood that anti-Trinitarian views had appeared prior to the dates mentioned. The same applies to the United States, where isolated groups held essentially Unitarian principles from the middle of the 18th century; but the American Unitarian Association was not formed until 1825. It resulted from a division in the Congregational church over the question of the Trinity. A famous name in this connection is William Ellery Channing, who delivered an epoch-making sermon, Unitarian Christianity, in the Baltimore church at the ordination service of Jared Sparks in 1819.
>
> "The Unitarian church in America is purely democratic or congregational in government. Each church is a law unto itself. It adopts its own bond of union and rules for admission of members, calls and recalls its own ministers, and owns its own property. The union into state or national groups is purely voluntary, and the larger groups have no power to control the policies or beliefs of members or parishes. The church has no creed. The pulpit is absolutely free. The minister preaches what he honestly regards as true without fear or favour. . . .
> "Many of the Eastern churches make the term of their church covenant read as follows: 'In the love of truth and in the spirit of Jesus we unite for the worship of God and the service of man.' . . .
>
> "In general, Unitarians believe in the immortality of the soul; that the development of individual character is the surest guarantee of continued growth after death; but that emphasis should be placed on life here and now. 'Hath man no second life? Pitch this on high.' Each Unitarian may define for himself the terms of God, the soul, eternity, duty. No rigid standard is set. No test of belief is laid down at any point. The Unitarian church does not fear heretics, it welcomes them. . . . Unitarianism accepts implicity the evolutionary principle right along the line. It regards man's history as a gradual climb; his chief duty to better the race here and now, confident in the fact that the moral idea is imperative, that the universe is on his side; and that whatever be hereafter, in the word of Socrates, the good man has nothing to fear in death. Unitarians declare that their religion is the simplest to state, the hardest to live, and never genuine without character. With regard to Jesus, Unitarians believe that he was one of, if not the greatest of the sons of men, an inspired dreamer who taught love, fellowship, service, brotherhood, a noble way of living. . . .
> "Marching with the times belief amongst Unitarians ranges from a mystical theism to what is now called humanism. The Unitarian glories in the fundamental plank of freedom. He is able to realise a spirit of unity and purpose midst such diversity. Such diversity has never led to serious schism or disruption. He believes in the everlasting search for truth from all quarters, and believes that this alone can 'make men free.' There are those who regard the Unitarians as having no religion, no church and not to be accounted Christians. These things form matters of opinion which have no place in this article, but it may be added in conclusion, that the Unitarians do not regard themselves primarily as a sect or a church.

They claim to represent a Spirit, an Attitude; to be an Influence and a Movement tending in the direction of Freedom, Beauty, Truth and Goodness."

The titles of Mr. Adlard's addresses, as minister of the First Unitarian Church, Duluth, merit preserving. Here are sets of his addresses, for the years 1929, 1933, and 1934 respectively, at Duluth.

VITAL QUESTIONS

If you will draw the outline of a man's head and neck, omitting the face, you will find it takes the shape of an interrogation mark ?—That is indicative of a man and his progress in the scale of evolution. He is the question asker. Therein lies further promise of his development. On the following Sundays at 11 A.M. Mr. Adlard will discuss the following grave and important questions of the day.

Sept. 29 Is Progress an Illusion?
Oct. 13 Is Man a Machine?
Oct. 27 What is Civilization, and where is it going?
Nov. 10 Is the Younger Generation better than its Fathers?
Nov. 24 Is Democracy a Failure?
Dec. 8 Shall we have Sanity on the Sex Problem?
Dec. 15 Is a Supernatural Religion doomed for Men?

The Unitarian Church is a place where Reason and Religion meet, and where a Rational Worship provides an inspiring atmosphere.

27—Can We Grow Old and Keep Young?

"Let Truth and Falsehood grapple; whoever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter?" —John Milton.

From the titles of these addresses, it can be seen that Henry J. Adlard should be ranked with the humanists. He knew, intimately, Dietrich of Minnieapolis, but felt that his humanism was rather bold. It was without colour, beauty, emotion, poetry, all of which are part of the human make-up, and must find both place and expression.

An expression of Adlard's humanism is to be found in the following announcement of a meeting held in Duluth:

We have before five pamphlet reports of addresses delivered by Mr. Adlard in the United States. Each of these addresses is worthy of being reprinted and circulated widely. One was delivered by him as pastor of the Adams Memorial Church, Dunkirk, New York. The subject was "Where Was God When The War Broke Out." The First Unitarian Church, Des Moines, Iowa, published his: "The Old Bible and The New." The Unitarian Laymen's League, Des Moines, published his address: "Is a Universal Religion Possible or Desirable?" The Unitarian Laymen's League, Duluth, published: "What Unitarianism Means To-day." The First Unitarian Church, Duluth, published his address: "Christianity, The Religion of Redemption." We hope to reissue these American addresses later.

OUR APPEAL

Last month, under the heading, "Cold Facts," we made an appeal for funds to meet the losses on this journal. As stated, The Word is the best-produced paper in the Labour Movement. It carries no advertisements, retains its size, is illustrated, and it is produced on the best paper. It is fearless and thought-provoking. Because of its quality, it is disliked and boycotted. Our readers must increase its circulation. They can become subscribers. They can sell quantities. They can persuade their comrades to subscribe. One Glasgow Comrade brought in eight subscribers in a week by lending the last issue to his friends.

The response to last month's appeal does not merit record this month. We expect to publish a decent response next month. Four-page contemporaries, printed on news-print, have acknowledged good donations from persons who have asked for free copies of The Word. Is that fair?

On the special appeal, connected with Hyde Park Free Speech struggles, we are short: £81 1s. 3d. On the press—the paper and pamphlet production—we are short £1890 10s. Our total appeal is for £1971 11s. 3d. This does not take into account our postal mission work.

Every comrade who reads this journal should subscribe to this fund. Send your donation at once. Every comrade in difficultiesa who visits our office for advice should donate to the fund. It should be possible for our readers to donate this sum in one month. The work must go on. It is up to you, comrades.

Send donations; subscriptions, bundle orders to:

Strickland Press,
104 George Street, Glasgow, C.1.

Complete acknowledgments next month. Comrade, let us put your name or nom-de-plume on the list.

The need for immediate response is urgent.

A CHRISTMAS HYMN OF PEACE

Tune .... Antioch

Joy to the world! for hopes of peace
Which daily grow more strong.
For streaming tides of righteousness
To end the night of wrong.

Joy to the world! for brotherhood
With friendly, outstretched hand,
For bugle calls of fellowship
Which sound from land to land.

No more shall war its furies fling
Across the human mart;
Supreme good will shall hold its sway
And reign in every heart.

All hail! all hail! thou glorious day
When dreams of fairest hue,
Long cherished in the human breast
Shall build the world anew.

BAPTISTS & CONSCIENCE

The Rev. M. E. Aubrey publishes an interesting and most self-revealing signed "leader" in the Baptist Times, London, in its issue for November 21.

Referring and replying to some of his pacifist correspondents, he writes:—

"Some of my correspondents are obviously pacifists of an extreme type and write to me in a somewhat hectoring and irritating manner. They know all about what the Baptist Union and its Secretary ought to do. I am tempted to reply to some of them to ask whether they are willing to do as much to stop the Germans killing and maiming thousands of women and children in London—to say nothing of our airmen and seamen who are protecting us all—as they wish the Secretary of the Baptist Union to do to prevent a small body of men from suffering injuries, which by comparison are trivial, at the hands of a little gang of military hooligans."

Mr Aubrey admits that to put this question would be evading the issue, but he thinks that it might be a real test of the sincerity of his correspondents. But have not Germans been killed in Berlin and Hamburg? Facts seem to cancel facts, and bombings to answer bombings. The truth that emerges is that war is wrong, and that the skies are being employed, not to proclaim the glory of God, but the supremacy of hell.

Mr Aubrey continues:—

"... the Baptist denomination as such is committed to freedom of conscience. We have stood for it in the past; we demanded it before this war broke out. We believe in it even if it be abused. Some pacifist memories appear to be short, or they would recall my speech at the Birmingham Assembly in 1939 and the fact that Free Church leaders met and discussed with Mr. Neville Chamberlain the question of conscientious objectors and secured definite guarantees from him long before this war began. We must defend conscience as one of God's most precious gifts to men, and must stand by those of whose sincerity we have no doubt.

"I may say that recently I myself attended, for the first time, a tribunal, so as to stand by a young man who wished to be exempted from combatant service. I was greatly struck by the fairness of the tribunal. . . . The applicant in whom I had a special interest had his letter read, with two supporting letters which he presented. The tribunal were so satisfied that they did not ask him a single question nor was I called upon to give evidence.

We say nothing against the fairness of this particular Tribunal. We know nothing about its decisions. We have known Tribunals to reach fair and just decisions. The Manchester and Bristol Tribunals have repeatedly gone out of their way to reach just decisions in difficult cases. But they have failed often to be just also. We have appeared before the Glasgow Tribunal and also before the Edinburgh Appellate Tribunal. We have no ground for complaint in these cases. But the same Tribunals have recorded other decisions that we consider wrong. In the mass of cases, granting all the difficulties, we believe that they must tend to uphold militarism rather than advance anti-militarism. For they feel that anti-militarism is an amazing and wondrous large-scale heresy, something most dangerous to society, and thoroughly reprehensible. To reach as many favourable conclusions as they do, the Tribunals must make terrible internal war against the barricade of their own prejudices.

Mr Aubrey, in the name of the Baptist denomination, and from zeal of conscience, appears as a witness for someone who asks for non-combatant military service! That is, for someone who does not seek to be placed on the C.O. register. And the Tribunal asks Mr Aubrey no questions! So, being a Christian, and a student of conscience, he comes away pleased! Does the man not know that, to the mass of conscientious objectors, non-combatant service is trifling with conscience?

Mr Aubrey concludes his article as follows:—

"I believe that most of these tribunals are honestly trying to do their best at a very difficult task. It is impossible for them to be right every time, of course, but the number of errors is, I think, small and, in comparison with the treatment meted out to conscientious objectors in Continental countries, their friends have a great deal for which to be thankful."

Mr Aubrey should know that Christian teaching is harsh and uncompromising in its assertion of the right of conscience. It is the function of conscription to commit error, to sin against conscience. It is clear, therefore, that militarism and conscription are anti-christian. On this matter there is no room for doubt.

Mr Aubrey appearing before the Tribunal, to support a plea for non-combatant service, in all the glory of his ministerial garb, is a quaint figure of sombre pretence to impose upon the angels. There must have been some sad smiles in the neighbourhood of the celestial throne when he sat down before the tribunal.

SOLDIERS & CONCHIES

The Church of England Newspaper, London, for September 20, 1940, published the following interesting letter:—

"Sir,—I cannot speak with the authority of a governorship of four Public Schools, but only with that of a field officer, bred to fair play at one, who was invalided at the end of the last war after a short career of twenty years. The combined services of my father and two grandfathers, however, was close on a century and a quarter, so I can speak with the voice of one with a soldier's pedigree.

"'Patriot' condemns conscientious objectors. Does he also condemn draughtsmen or any of the many others who have been exempted from military service? If not, why does he condemn another class which the Government sees fit to exempt? Conscientious objectors, whose bona fides have been proved by the tribunals, possess an attribute most essential to right government as well, the waging of war, and that is moral courage. Compared to the rest of the population, their number is so infinitesimal that the Government is undoubtedly right in carefully preserving them against the days when peace-making will be necessary. —Yours, etc.,

"A. H. STUART-MENTETH,
Major (Ret.).

"19, Palace-gate, W.8."

On October 3, the Scottish Appellate Tribunal granted conditional exemption to George Drummond, c/o Miller, 286 Carlisle Road, Kirkmuirhill, Lanark. He served four years in the Royal Artillery (T.A.), but was converted to Christian Pacifism while in the Royal Artillery. He was a skilled engineer, but refused to work at this trade during war-time, because it assisted killing.

Six days later, wearing Air Force uniform, the father of John D. Walker, Manthorpe Road, Grantham, accompanied his son when he appeared before the North Midlands Conscientious Objectors Tribunal at Derby.

The applicant declared that he would rather go to prison than take up military service, and the father, saying they had had long arguments on the subject, added: "If there is any killing to be done, I am quite prepared to do his share as well as my own."

The Tribunal registered Walker for non-combatant duty. His father said his son would appeal, and that he upheld his son's stand for conscience.

Two V.C.'s of the great war defended a conscientious objector at a general field court martial at Liverpool on Tuesday, November 19.

The objector, Private R. C. Johnson, of the Non-combatant Corps of the Auxiliary Military Pioneer Corps, was charged with disobeying an order on October 25 to put on uniform.

Replying to Lieutenant J. J. S. Hobson, his advocate, Johnson admitted disobeying the order because he objected on religious and conscience grounds as a follower of the teachings of the Society of Friends and the spirit of Christ.

Colonel H. Greenwood, V.C., D.S.O., M.C., said he had dealt with conscientious objectors in the last and the present wars, and had taken a personal interest in the men. In his opinion Johnson was a genuine conscientious objector. He was not afraid of undertaking dangerous work, so long as he was not asked to do so as a member of the forces. Johnson had been engaged in the extremely hazardous work of the rescue of bombed civilians from one of the most heavily bombed areas in this country since the war began, namely, the East End of London.

Rev. G. H. Woolley, V.C., late Chaplain of Harrow School, stated in a letter that Johnson was the type of conscientious objector the Act was intended to protect.

Lieut. Hobson asked the Court to pass a sentence of three months' imprisonment in order that he might apply for the case to be reheard by the Tribunal.

Col. Greenwood won his V.C. for attacking machine-gun posts single-handed near Ovillers in October, 1918; Rev. G. H. Woolley for defending a heavily attacked trench on Hill 60 in in April, 1915.

This Court Martial, and the manner of its conduct, does great credit to the two V.C. officers who gave evidence; to the Lieutenant who defended; and to the military authorities concerned. The proceedings express fairness, justice, and understanding.

The same comment must be applied to a Court Martial held in North Wales on December 6. Here, also, an army officer defended a conchie-conscript with great understanding and eloquence, and asked for a sentence of not less than three months' imprisonment so that the accused could qualify to appear before an appellate tribunal for conscientious objectors. The case was that of John Herbert Sinclair, of the Royal Corps of Signals.

Sinclair, who is aged 22, was a commercial artist in civil life, and his home is in Manchester. He was charged with absenting himself from camp without leave, and with disobeying the command of a superior officer to put on his military uniform when ordered to do so. Sinclair, who pleaded not guilty, had appeared before the court-martial on a previous occasion on two similar charges, and he was then sentenced to 56 days' detention in a military barracks. His application to be registered as a conscientious objector was dismissed by the North Wales tribunal.

Major W. L. Roseveare, defending officer, said that Sinclair's case was an unusual one. When he appeared before the tribunal he had no opportunity of proving that his objection to military service was genuinely and honestly held. His behaviour since, however misconceived it might have been, had proved beyond question that his convictions were genuine and honest. He had stuck to his point throughout and had endured military detention without flinching and without in the least becoming embittered. Major Roseveare added:

"In the last war it was proved that a long term of imprisonment had no effect in shaking a man's convictions that he was doing right, and does not deter others from adopting a similar course. Whilst I plead for mitigation of sentence, that sentence should be one of imprisonment, not of detention, and should be for a period of not less than three months. If it is for less Sinclair will not have the right to appear before the tribunal to try again to satisfy it of the honesty of his views. Detention would mean his appearance before a court-martial again. Such procedure is known as 'cat and mouse' treatment, and is rightly discouraged in this country."

We extend our thanks and admiration to both Major W. L. Roseveare and Lieutenant J. J. S. Hobson for what might be termed their attitude of gallant and sympathetic understanding.

CONCHIES: VARIOUS VIEWS.

The question of consciientious objectors was ventilated during 194' in papers published in almost every part of the English-speaking world. Surveys of some of the letters published by editors were made in the August and Navember Word. We extend the summary in the present issue.

Councillor W. W. Crabtree, of Salford, writing from the Town Hall, Salford, Manchester, to the Manchester Guardian, for April 24, criticised the Tribunals in the following trenchant letter:—

Sir,—Hansard records the long debates in Parliament on the clauses of the Military Service Act dealing with the functions of the tribunals for conscientious objectors. This led one to hope that the mistakes of the last war would be avoided, and that the persons appointed to the tribunals would endeavour to administer the Act in its truest implication. It is a fact that in the last war more than 5,000 appellants who were refused exemption and were given various forms of punishment were later adjudged by a special court set up at Wormwood Scrubs to be genuine objectors.

One is astonished at the attitude of many members of the present tribunals, for they take advantage of their position by making personal attacks, and in several instances the chairman has become a prosecuting counsel. Apart from personal observation, the press reports prove that members of these tribunals are out of sympathy with that part of the Act which gives them their position. Such persons are bringing our laws into contempt, and it would be well if many of the present tribunals were reconstructed, as there cannot be any confidence in people who "bang on tables" during a case or lose their tempers. Were some of the appellants to answer as I should be inclined to do they would be guilty of contempt of court.

To-day many persons are losing faith in the tribunals, and in the older groups liable for service one finds a tendency to decline to appear before them. This will result in many arrests later on.—Yours, &c.,

W. W. CRABTREE.

The following pertinent letter appeared in the Western Morning News, Plymouth, on May 10:

"Sir,—Councillor R. E. Narracott, who proposed the extraordinary resolution adopted by Torquay Town Council that no conscientious objectors be employed by the Council, is reported as stating that:

"'The sort of conscientious objectors we cannot respect are those, who, under the cloak of religion, are willing to take some cushy job and then benefit by other brave men fighting their battles.'

"If the councillor carries his objection to an honest and logical conclusion, he must include all divinity students, all priests, and all other ministers of religion who are automatically exempt from military service. Many priests have obtained first-class and remunerative 'cushy' jobs as military chaplains.

"CHARLES SPELLER.

The Rev. Richard Lee, M.A., was attacked bitterly during June and July in the columns of the Midland Daily Telegraph, for his defence of conscientious objectors, and his own firm opposition to war. He wrote firmly, defending his position, in the columns of our contemporary, for June 7, as follows:—

"I have suggested in your columns methods of getting the world out of the horrible mess into which the various Fuehrers have brought us. The way out is not easy, and the longer the war the more difficult, but the work of peace can go on without withdrawing a single soldier until security is guaranteed by deeds.

"The alternative policy of sheeplike surrender to circumstances is not mine, but of those who go blindly on: 'Theirs not to reason why; Theirs but to do and die.'"

The Rev. Fred H. Wiseman, pastor of Sherwood Congregational Church, Edward Lane, Nottingham, wrote in the columns of the Nottingham Journal, for June 14, protesting against the proposal of the City Council to dismiss conscientious objectors. He concluded:—

"The Government announced long ago that there would be no attempt on its part to persecute C.O.'s and I hope the people of Nottingham will not let their local government take a less tolerant attitude."

The Christchurch Star-Sun, New Zealand, attacked several ministers in that city who organised a committee to aid and to advise conscientious objectors. One of the attacked ministers, the Rev. N. R. Wood, replied in the Sun-Star's columns for June 29 in a long letter, from which we cull the following excerpt:—

"We have committees to aid soldiers, and this new committee will aid those who avail themselves of their legal right to appeal when conscripted. This is in line with what has been done in England. There the churches issued leaflets for the guidance of conscientious objectors, but so far no committee is in existence in Christchurch. . . . The English regulations are so fair that even some who here are summarily dismissed for subversive activity would be granted exemption. A London tribunal recently totally exempted a young anarchist."

The Bournemouth Times for July 5 published the following amazing declaration:

"In your issue of June 28 there is a statement that John Rigler was registered for agricultural work on condition he sent the Tribunal further evidence to support what he said about Christian Science. . . .

"A Christian Scientist would not claim exemption if called upon to register his name for military service, because Christian Scientists believe in obeying the law of the land.

"Mary Baker Eddy, the discoverer and founder of Christian Science has written in 'First Church of Christ, Scientist, and Miscellany, p.220: I believe in obeying the laws of the land. I practise and teach this obedience, since justice is the moral signification of law. Injustice denotes the absence of law.'

The question, "Are all C.O.s enemies of the State?" was answered in a following letter from Fred French, of Duston, published in the Northampton Echo, on July 9. The writer objects to those C.O.s who refuse to render ambulance, hospital, or A.R.P. work. He concludes:—

"The Society of Friends, although opposed to war, give voluntary aid in many ways. But I have nothing but contempt for those of military age themselves who sneer and persecute C.O.s whilst themselves sheltering in reserved trades, as munition makers, etc. . . .

"I was an objector during the last war, but I did massage and orthopaedic work in three hospitals for the wounded, and although offered remuneration, refused it."

The Baltimore Sun, U.S.A., for September 3, published a vigorous letter, attacking conscientious objectors, from the pen of Thomas E. Street, Enfield, N.C. We make the following excerpts from Mr Street's letter:—

"The conscientious objectors, who would have us do nothing for defense, have much in Christian teaching to support them, but they don't have it all. About the best answer to them was given Dr. Fosdick by the Congressman who said the one with no sword is apt to perish with the other fellow's. . . .

"War is certainly contrary to the Christian spirit; but since we can prove almost anything by the Bible, we might recall that the Israelities were continually at war to save their country, and God frequently commanded them to kill their enemies."

The Philadelphia Public Ledger, U.S.A., for September 25, published a vigorous letter from Florence R. Myers, Prospect Park, Pa., denouncing "this funny conscientious objecting." Urging that conscientious objectors ought to "be deported to a desert island somewhere," she concludes:—

"I believe all school children should be taught to salute the American flag at every opening day of school, or else they, too, with their so-called religious parents, should be sent somewhere else. Everybody in this country should be American and stand for American traditions or else get out!"

The Toronto Globe, Canada, for September 25, published an interesting, though somewhat reactionary editorial, headed "PACIFICISM AS VOCATION." It refers to a phrase used in July, when the Archbishop of Canterbury and York received a deputation of clergy belonging to the Anglican Pacifist Fellowship. The Archbishop of Canterbury said: "Pacificism is a genuine vocation for some."

This utterance was challenged by the Dean of St Paul's, Dr R. W. Matthews, who declared that the two Archbishops supported the appeal to arms.

Dean Matthews defined a pacifist as follows :—

"A pacificist is one who holds that it is wrong in any circumstances to fight, and consequently that it is his duty to dissuade others from fighting."

The Globe makes an interesting comment :—

"'Pacificist,' which is very often in this country wrongly called 'pacifist,' is obviously derived from two Latin words which mean 'to make peace.' The word is comparatively new. In the great Century Dictionary and in the old Standard Dictionary neither of these forms is to be found, and yet most of us have a very good idea in general terms what is meant by this word which has become universal in the last twenty years."

The editorial concludes :—

"Probably the great majority of our sailors, soldiers and airmen, whose courage and humanity have won the admiration of the world, desire the abolition of war as much as any pacificist. War cannot possibly be the permanent heritage of man. Speaking for ourselves, if we believed that, we could say with Philip Gibbs : 'It would be better for the Almighty to touch our planet with a star and end the horror of it all.'"

We quite believe that sailors, and soldiers, and airmen desire the abolition of war. But what are the upholders of recourse to war doing to make it certain that war will not be the permanent heritage of man? If statesmen, politicians, divines, and journalists have their way, and the voice of conscience is never heard in practical protest, war must go on, generation after generation, without any promise of conclusion.

The Rev. Ian A. Auld writes powerfully from the Manse of Neuton, by Dalkeith, in The Scotsman, Edinburgh, for September 30. We quote the concluding part of his letter :—

"As a minister of the Church of Scotland I wish to protest most emphatically against those who have been declared by a properly constituted tribunal to be genuine conscientious objectors and who have been granted exemption on the understanding that they continue in their present employment being either deemed or treated as disloyal, or penalised. . . .

"Let us be in no doubt about those who are declared to be genuine conscientious objectors by the tribunals. I have attended the Edinburgh Tribunal, and have come away convinced that in no other country in the world could there be found such fairmindedness combined with plain-speaking, such justice combined with humanity. We may be very sure that those the tribunals declare to be conscientious objectors are in very truth conscientious objectors, and as such are upheld by Government and by Act of Parliament, and no Corporation or any other body has the slightest right or title to dismiss, deprive of privileges, or victimise them in any way on such a score."

The United States objectors are referred to in the New Republic, New York, U.S.A., for October 28, under the heading, "The First Objectors." Our contemporary says :—

"So far as we are told by the newspapers, only a few theological students and socialists in New York refused to register, for conscientious reasons. They have accordingly been arrested and will be tried for disobedience of the law. The New Republic favours the widest possible latitude for conscientious objectors; we hope conscription will be administered much more intelligently in this respect than in 1917. But we do not see how any court can fail to convict a person who violates the law by deliberately failing to register. We hope that the courts will make clear the law, and that the students will change their minds and be given another chance. For conscientious objectors, whatever the errors in their reasoning may be, should not be treated as criminals."

HYSTERIOTS

Our Chicago contemporary, Unity, carries as its slogan the phrase : He hath made of one all nations of men." An important gem of wisdom to preserve during these trying days of fear, clamour, and tension.

In its issue for Monday, August 19, last, it coined a new word, "hysteriots," to describe the people who lose their heads and so go plumb crazy for war : the victims and fomenters of hysteria, politicians, intellectuals, and college professors. Academic minds that see "Fifth Columnists" everywhere. Mob-orators who mistake political climbing and ranting for statesmanship. Popular writers and novelists who spread a plague of disease and misery and count the havoc their contribution to patriotic effort. Men and women of conventional mind and of as little worth, totally devoid of an original idea, and as equally devoid of capacity for any real social service.

In a word, the miserable products of a world dwelling in darkness : hysteriots.

HITLER'S ADMIRERS

In the September Word, we reproduced the 1932 and 1934 prophecies of the late Lord Rothermere. As the Tory press pays so much tribute to him for his patriotism, it is interesting to recall Rothermere's own tribute to Hitler published in the Daily Mail in May, 1938 :—

"Great numbers of people in England regard Herr Hitler as an ogre, but I would like to tell them how I found him. He exudes good fellowship. He is simple, unaffected, and obviously sincere. He is extremely intelligent. . . . There is no man living whose promise given in regard to something of real moment I would sooner take. . . . Herr Hitler has a great liking for the English people. He regards the English and the Germans as being of one race."

Beaverbrook, who controlled Government propaganda in the last war, and is a leading member of the present War Cabinet, wrote in the Daily Express in October, 1938 :—

"We certainly credit Hitler with honesty and sincerity. We believe in his purpose stated over and over again, to seek an accommodation with us and we accept to the full the implication of the Munich document."

No attention was paid to the Socialist Anti-Fascists who maintained that every word of the Rothermere eulogy was false. Beaverbrook knew of Spain and still applauded Hitler. To-day's war and misery are the result of this false applause.

Churchill, who has no time for Hitler, and is the leader of the Tory-Socialist, Imperialist, Anti-Nazi combine, in his book, Great Contemporaries, declared that Hitler was not such a bad fellow. Here is the present Prime Minister's eulogy :—

"The story of his (Hitler's) struggle cannot be read without admiration for the courage, the perseverance, and the vital force which enabled him to challenge, defy, conciliate, or overcome all the authorities or resistances which barred his path."

We say that Churchill's estimate was wrong in every particular. We declare the publication of this erroneous view to be a dangerous mistake. It aided the growth of Nazism and favoured Anti-Socialist conspiracy throughout Europe.

Speaking on November 11, 1938, Churchill declared :—

"I have always said that if Great Britain were defeated in a war, I hoped that we should find a Hitler to lead us back to our rightful position among the nations."

When these words were uttered, Hitler's Spanish exploits were known to the world, and his concentration camps were notorious! How came such a speech to be made by a man who was aspiring to become the leading statesman in Britain?

Because of the Tory conspiracy with Hitlerism we are facing war and misery to-day. Anti-Fascists are imprisoned and persecuted by the very folk who applauded the concentration-camp bandits whom we are asked to destroy, together with their innocent victims. Only the innocent victims and we are being destroyed first.

CANADIAN CONCHIES

The Toronto Star, for September, 19, 1940, reports the appearance of the first conchies before the Toronto Tribunal :—

"The first conscientious objectors have been heard from by the Toronto Tribunal of the National War Services department, now sending out notices to men of the 21-year-old class to report for medical examination, preparatory to serving a 30-day period of military training. A dozen or more have been from Mennonites and a few from Christadelphians, according to Mr. Justice J. G. Gillanders, tribunal chairman.

"The Mennonites have already printed forms which they are furnishing members, it was stated to-day by the National War Services Branch here.

"The procedure, Mr. Justice Gillanders explained, is first to ask for a certificate proving membership in a religious sect. If this can be established the individual must then prove he individually objects to bearing arms and to combatant service. If the conscientious objector can prove he belongs to a faith whose tenets oppose bearing arms and combatant service, then he is absolved.

"The conscientious objector will be only a drop in the bucket,' the board intimated to-day.

"Already most of the notices in military district No. 2 to the 21-year-old class have gone out and all of the 6,000 will be in the mails to-day, Mr. Justice Gollanders said."

DOLLAN'S PORTRAIT

Alexander Ratcliffe's Vanguard is not only a very vigorous Protestant organ. It is also a very active journal of anti-militarism and strenuously opposed to war. In the December issue, the editor vigorously attacks Dollan, and reprints the main part of the article we published in The Word for October. Writes Mr Ratcliffe :—

"Our well-known Irish-Papist Lord Provost, Mr. P. J. Dollan, a violent Conscientious Objector when of military age at the last war, will soon be due to get his 'Portrait in Oils' as he retires from the Chief Magistracy of the City of Glasgow, misscalled by some Glasgow enthusiastics the 'Second City of the Empire.' In the meantime we learn of Mr. Dollan 'sitting' for a Polish artist, and the Poles also have been 'honouring' him by other means.

"And a much-photographed person 'Pat' has been during his term of Office! One Glasgow paper stated that he was the most publicised Lord Provost whom Glasgow has known, and none, not even 'Pat' himself, could seek to deny it.

"But we present to our readers a somewhat true portrait of Mr Dollan: Mr. Dollan who, as Councillor Dollan in the days before Labour procured civic power in Glasgow, attacked the "ruling classes" to the right and to the left, and aptly revealed what a bad lot the Tories and all other not Socialists were in those days. But now Lord Provost Dollan has become a Militarist: a Tory of Tories; and he would no doubt become an 'aristocrat' if that were possible.

"The following, reprinted from our contemporary The Word for October, 1940, refers to Mr. Dollan as an ex-Socialist. We disagree there. To our mind Mr. Dollan never was a Socialist. No person could be a Socialist and stand with the record of Mr. Dollan. Moreover, Mr. Dollan, being a Roman Catholic, is not, and never was, a Socialist. For has not the Pope declared infallibly that no Roman Catholic can be a Socialist?

"And who is Mr. Dollan to stand up to the Pope?"

The only item we object to in the above attack is the reference to Mr Dollan as "Irish-Papist." That savours of sectarianism and abuse and weakens the attack. We quite agree that Dollan was never a Socialist and have said so often. When we refer to him as an ex-Socialist, our use of the word "Socialist" is nominal and conventional, and not accurate. When we write exactly, we agree in the statement that Dollan was never a Socialist. We agree further that, according to the Papal declaration, no Roman Catholic can be a Socialist. Were we a Catholic, we would challenge the Papal declaration on this point. We believe that Socialism is inconsistent with churchianity, priestcraft, and ceremonial religion.

On another page, Ratcliffe returns to the attack on Dollan :—

FRONT LINE DOLLAN!

"The Evening Citizen, Glasgow (24-10-40) states 'Mr. Dollan going to Front Line.' Mr. Dollan is getting a trip to London for 'a close-up of problems arising out of air-raids.'

"At the last war, Mr. Dollan preferred going to prison rather than go anywhere near the Front Line!

"At the last War, our Papist Lord Provost was just plain Councillor Dollan, a conscientious objector, who did not believe in Front Lines!

"But Ah, how time, and creatures, change!

"To-day, for Mr. Dollan, War is a Righteous Thing!

"How the Devil must laugh!"

WAR!

I don't believe in war. I am ashamed of war, and I say so. I not only don't believe in this war; I don't believe in any war.

In Europe these days I'm looking for popular as distinguished from geographical or dynastic results. I care nothing for great empires. I care only for the crowd out of which great empires have been welded. The grandiose empires may dissolve to-day, and I'd not shed a tear over their remains.

I don't care how soon kings are gone; how soon all armies and navies are abolished. I want everything that comes between people got out of the way. I want to get the earth together.

FASCISM AND SPAIN: STALIN'S PART

—We have reproduced in The Word, Regeneracion leaflets, Nos. 4, 6, 10, and 11, issued in 1936, in support of the Spanish people's struggle for democracy against the Nazi-Fascist conspiracy that embraced and supported the Franco rebellion. In this number we reproduce leaflet No. 12, which denounced the part played by Stalin. This leaflet makes better reading to-day than when it was issued first. The Russo-German pact lends point to its conclusion.—Ed.

REGENERACION !!

No. 12 September 2, 1936. Sub Voluntary.

STALIN AND SPAIN

In 1931, Trotsky declared that the Spanish Revolution was in danger and demanded that it be defended by the armed proletariat. Five years later the Fascist uprising, financed and armed by Italy and Germany, and operating from the capital of Fascist Portugal, compelled the constitutional government of Spain to arm the workers, including the Anarchists, in order to defend democracy. The Stalin Government of the Soviet Union considered that this was the proper time to shoot, after a mock trial, Zinoviev and Kamenev and to arrest Zendl Muehsam, widow of the famous German martyred Communist and poet. Invited to Russia to enjoy pjolitical asylum, Zendl Muehsam is in prison, waiting possible execution for the alleged crime of Trotskyism. It is not an accident that these crimes against Socialism and Socialists are being practised in the Soviet Union at this time of world crisis, when the Communist International, if it were a communist international, should be in open session supporting the cause of the Spanish workers and peasants. Whilst murdering Socialists, Stalin adopts the attitude of the British National Government, of the leaders of the Parliamentary Labour Party, of the hopeless Popular Front Government of France: an attitude of treachery and betrayal, miscalled neutrality. Meanwhile, Lisbon remains the headquarters of the Fascist invaders with their Moorish troops and the Catholic Church enters into a peace pact with Hitlerism. The Trade Unionists endorse neutrality, forgetting that an injury to the workers of Spain is an injury to the world proletariat. The fatuous parliamentarians, headed by the communist, declare that the U.A.B. scales are of more importance than the struggle in Spain. It is known that the Fascist states are creating a complete bloc in Europe and should a workers' republic emerge from the Spanish struggle they will make immediate war upon it. Why, then, is the Soviet Union part of this socialist and fascist combination against the workers of Spain? The answer is very simple.

Zinoviev and Kamenev were executed because there came a time when they could no longer support the parrot cry of "Socialism in One Country." They were executed to realise the vanity of Stalin, who was not only jealous of the reputation of Trotsky, but also of the reputation of Hitler, Mussolini and Pilsudski. Stalin shot his old comrades by means of a firing squad in order to demonstrate that he believes not only in "Socialism in One Country" but also in "Anti-Socialism in One Country." He desires the Soviet Union to tower above Italy and Germany as the anti-socialist fatherland. This fact explains the shooting. It explains the betrayal of the Spanish workers. And it explains those activities of the Russian Government to adopt exactly the same callous attitude towards the workers of Spain as that adopted by other capitalist countries. This fact will be made clear to the student of the agreements made in May, 1933, between Russia on the one hand, and the avowed dictatorships of Italy, Poland, and Germany on the other. The Monthly Review of the Moscow Narodny Bank issued an official description eulogising these agreements at the time.

The Polish agreement was signed on May 2, when a delegation of six representatives of the Commissariat for Foreign Trade of the U.S.S.R. visited Warsaw at the special invitation of the Polish Government and received a very warm welcome. The Soviet Minister in Warsaw also visited Marshal Pilsudski who, up to that time, had made a point of not receiving foreign diplomats. The Review comments: "The Government seemed determined to utilise the existing friendly relations to the best advantage of both countries."

The German agreement was ratified three days later between Litvinov and the German Ambassador in Moscow, von Dirksen, by the exchange of notes. The agreement had been concluded actually on June 24, 1931. Litvinov and von Dirksen exchanged Protocols for the continuation of the Berlin treaty of neutrality and non-aggression between the U.S.S.R. and Germany of April 24, 1926, and the Convention of Conciliation of January 25, 1929.

The Protocols state that the two governments by prolonging the treaty intend to continue the existing friendly relations between the Soviet Union and Germany and to further collaboration which is in the interests of both countries.

The 1926 Treaty pledged the contracting parties not to participate in any economic or financial boycott against each other. Because of this agreement, the Communist International opposed an international working-class boycott of Germany, as a protest against the brutal suppression of Communists and Socialists in Hitler's concentration camps. Because of this agreement the Communist International dare not go into continuous session to protest against the German Fascist conspiracy against working class Spain.

For similar reasons, the Soviet Union must stand for the hypocrisy of neutrality and tolerate Italy's arming of Franco and the intended cession of Spanish Morocco. The day following the Moscow ratifications of the German agreement and treaties, the Soviet-Italian agreement was signed by Mussolini and Levenson, the commercial representatives of the U.S.S.R. and Italy. The Review states that this agreement was welcomed in both countries as demonstrating "the continued economic collaboration between the U.S.S.R. and Italy. . . . The Soviet-Italian agreement is a new proof of the desire of the U.S.S.R. to maintain normal relations with the rest of the world."

The official statements of the Moscow Narodny Bank draw a delightful picture of the Stalin Government making agreements with the Fascist Governments of Mussolini, Pilsudski and Hitler, and cultivating "normal" and "friendly relationships" with these jailers and persecutors of socialists. The Communists in the prisons and concentration camps of Italy, Poland, and Germany were expected to rejoice when they read of the Russian envoys receiving a very warm welcome; that Pilsudski graciously had condescended to receivce the Soviet Ambassador; and that Russia undertook "not to participate in any economic or financial boycott" of Hitlerised Germany.

When one considers that Pilsudski established Fascism by leading the so-called Socialist party of Poland into the bog of Polish nationalism; that Mussolini did the same thing in Italy; and that Stalin has ridden to eminence by the imprisonments and the murder of the Anarchists, Communists, and Socialists of Russia, and cultivates friendly relations with his Fascist fellow-dictators; it becomes very easy to understand why the Soviet Union stands for neutrality in Spain and refuses to champion the cause of the workers in that country who are fighting for freedom. Bureaucratic love of power, and compromise with the interests of world capitalism, explains Stalin's policy of non-intervention. When the Old Guard of the Bolshevik Revolution—a social democratic opportunism founded on Anarchism and betraying the Anarchist pioneers—were murdered by Stalin's firing party, Bolshevism was killed. The death of Bolshevism is the rebirth of Anarchism. And Anarchism means the world for the workers. The C.N.T. and the F.A.I.—the Spanish National Confederation of Labour and the Anarchist Federation of Iberia—are the advance guard of working class emancipation. The world workers look to Barcelona and not to Moscow for inspiration.

Stalin's attempted compromise with Fascism has made the crimson hand and not the crimson flag, the symbol of Moscow. Let us replace the pink flag of corrupted parliamentarianism and state-craft socialism with the incorruptible Red-and-Black flag of Anarchy. The workers of Britain, through their trade unions, industrial councils, and political groups and branches, must scorn the official gesture of worthless pauper charity and develop a determined forward movement of magnificent audacity and solidarity. If the parliamentarians will not unite at the ballot box on the issue of supporting Spain,

STALIN AND SPAIN.

In 1931,Trotsky declared that the Spanish Revolution was in danger and demanded that it be defended by the armed proletariat. Five years later the Fascist uprising,financed and armed by Italy and Germany,and operating from the capital of Fascist Portugal, compelled the constitutional government of Spain to arm the workers,including the Anarchists,in order to defend democracy. HERE AND THERE

Seeing that our Rationalist and Freethought Press has turned completely militarist in its old age and unhappy decline, the case of Albert Christian Brazier, of Villiers Avenue, Bilston, makes good reading.

Brazier appeared before the Midland Conscientious Objectors Tribunal in Birmingham on Tuesday, October 1. He said that he was a freethinker, that he did not trust organisations, and that he worked at window cleaning and limewashing. He had refused to camouflage or black-out works because that was war work, but he had blacked-out his home because he would be punished if he did not.

Judge Finnemore: Why shouldn't factories be blacked-out?—Brazier: Because they are centres of war activity.

The Tribunal decided to leave Brazier's name on the register of conscientious objectors.

Councillor Robert Mack, of 124 Gladys Avenue, North End, Portsmouth, and Labour Parliamentary candidate for that town, has engaged in controversy in the Portsmouth Evening News, with T. Barry Davies, the c.o. schoolteacher who was sacked by the Portsmouth Education Committee, by a majority vote of 13 to 4. Councillor Mack did not vote. Explaining why he abstained in the Portsmouth Evening News for December 3, Councillor Mack said:—

"For a man to be so unreasoningly absolute, I felt that one of us must be hopelessly wrong, and I was not prepared to be judge and jury on this man. . . .

"I have long suspected that many conscientious objectors are not conscientious objectors at all, but are political objectors, and this unjustifiable attack on me as a Labour Parliamentary candidate has done nothing to dispel that belief."

The very fact that he refused to protest against the injustice means that Mr Mack was party to the victimisation of Mr Davies. The man who objected to Mr Davies not fighting against Hitlerism remained neutral whilst Davies was being deprived of his living.

Writing from 84 Wadham Road, North End, Portsmouth, M. T. Barry Davies defended his position in the Evening News the following night.

Mr Davies stated:—

"Sir,—Two hundred and ninety years ago George Fox, the founder of the Society of Friends, declined a commission in Cromwell's army, the alternative being imprisonment, using these words: 'I live in the virtue of that life and power that takes away the occasion for all wars.'

"In the three centuries since then, members of the Society have borne this testimony against war in whatever cause it was being fought. Though to some extent instrumental in bringing about the abolition of slavery, they did not support the wars waged on behalf of Abolition."

Explaining that each person must take his stand where his conscience allows him to compromise no further, Mr Davies added that, like George Fox, he must say then: "Here I stand. I can do no other." Davies continued:—

"We all compromise; the 'absolute' is an attribute of God, not of man; but where we draw the line depends on the individual conscience."

He reproduced this extract from his Tribunal statement:—

"I can take no part in the activities of the fighting forces, nor can I lend any support to those Forces, for they are designed to carry out objects which I believe are evil."

Davies certainly scored against Mack with his last word:—

"Lest it be thought that politics have any bearing on my conscientious objection, I may state that I have always supported the party of which Councillor Mack is a representative.

"I do not wish to comment on the resolution under which I am dismissed—my appeal was not against the resolution, but on the ground that the Education Committee were dismissing me for holding beliefs of which they were aware when they appointed me, a fact I can readily prove."

An interesting comment was contributed to the same issue of our contemporary by Mr H. R. Lee, of 13 Lawrence Road, Southsea. Describing the call to arms, and its need, Mr Lee says:—

"One lad has conscientious objections to this call. The City Fathers then consider that they can do without this lad's services altogether. There does not appear to be anything wrong here. The lad has still the right to the liberty and freedom of his conscience, and the Fathers have exercised the rights they possess in the liberty and freedom of their consciences."

Mr Lee adds that what is wrong is the failure of teachers to realise that:

"For the last 20 years there has been an army of between one and two million suffering the pangs and privations of unemployment."

He complained about people who become indignant "because one of the teaching profession is likely to join this army," but also who never before uttered a protest "at any time against these unnatural conditions."

Mr Lee concludes:—

"Had the problem of unemployment been solved, it would have been no punishment to ask a conscientious objector to go, and there would probably have been no war."

Writing to the Newcastle Daily Journal on December 4, Judge Richardson said:—

"Sir,—As chairman of the local Tribunal I can state from my experience there that very few members of the Church come before that Tribunal as conscientious objectors, and that the few who do come, come for reasons quite unconnected with their Church membership.

"The majority of conscientious objectors belong to no recognised church or chapel. Many of our finest serving soldiers are devout and conscientious members of their respective churches or chapels.

"T. RICHARDSON.

"Cliffe, Corbridge."

The tone of which letter makes it clear that impartial judgment in the matter of conscience is beyond Richardson's capacity.

ARMS FOR JAPAN!

The Sunday Express, for December 22, last, published a special article from the pen of its city editor, Bernard Harris. This article was headed: "ARMS WORKERS 'NO' TO JAPAN ORDERS." The text told the following story:

"The night shift of the grinding department of the of Britain's largest engineering firms has refused to handle an order for Japan.

A foreman walked into the department recently, threw some blue prints on a table and shouted: "Look at these. They are marked subject to Japanese Army inspection."

"Immediately a deputation protested to the management. Because they believed their work was of national importance they said they had willingly given up their holidays and were working a 10½-hour shift in a blacked-out factory. But they were not going to work for any member of the Axis.

"The secretary of the company replied that this work was of national importance. The country badly needed the foreign exchange which Japan would pay for military equipment, and the Government had granted an export licence. The men would not accept this explanation.

"Not only did they refuse to have anything to do with the job, but they also sent a letter of protest to Mr. Bevin, Minister of Labour.

"No armaments of any kind can be exported unless a licence has been granted by the export licence department of the Board of Trade which usually consults the Ministry of Economic Warfare before reaching a decision.

"Apparently the Japanese contract was placed early in 1939 before the war and before the licensing system came in. Any work that had not been shipped when war broke out would need a licence from the Board of Trade approved by the Ministry of Economic Warfare.

Do the people who sneer at the axis, denounce Japan's activity in China, believe in workers working overtime—to supply arms for Japan: Is this not Fifth-Columnism?

SOCIALISM

What the United Socialist Movement Seeks to Establish

The following statement of aims and purposes will be accepted by all who call themselves Socialists. It is a declaration of what the members of the United Socialist Movement stand for.

Knowing that social, political, and economic equality is necessary to the development of human personality, the Socialist wants to remove class distinctions of all kinds.

There can be no 'upper and lower classes' no rich and poor, under Socialism. Socialism implies a classless Society where none have privileges and where ALL have equal status, equal rights, and equal opportunities.

The Socialist maintains that Labour is honourable service to the community and must cease from being bought or sold or exploited.

In the common interest the Socialist seeks to establish the social ownership and control of natural resources, substituting for their exploitation for private gain the organisation of their use as a public service to satisfy human needs.

By the social control and the workshop planning and administration, the practical democratic industrial organisation of wealth production and distribution, the Socialist seeks to make an end of present-day suffering from poverty. He would remove insecurity in all its forms from every home. He seeks to increase the actual personal, or consumptive property of every human being.

The Socialist aims to enlarge human freedom. He repudiates every form of coercion and dictated rule. Socialism is democracy and has freedom for its aim and liberty its working political method. The Socialist desires to effect a revolutionary change in society by the authority of a consenting and informed public opinion. Socialism objects to hereditary and to self-selected rulers alike.

Socialism is Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity in actual practice as the established order of life in a civilized community.

The United Socialist Movement is opposed to all capitalist war and militarism. It is opposed to those who would turn the class struggle within society, and within every nation, into a national struggle between nations. The United Socialist Movement is at once a revolutionary and an anti-militarist organisation.

PEEL INSTITUTE, CLERKENWELL.

Readers of Dogmas Discarded will be interested in an announcement made by the Peel Institute, Clerkenwell. It is proposed to establish a Gillett Memorial Room, at a cost of £300, to the memory of the Institute's Founder and President, Sir George M. Gillett, who was M.P. for Finsbury from 1923-31, and Commissioner for the Special Areas, 1936-39. The official opening of this room had to be postponed owing to the London bombings. The Quakers suffered equally with the militarists.

Henceforth, the first Saturday in October is to be known as the Gillett Commemoration Day.

Whatever Clerkenwell readers may think of the strictures published in Dogmas Discarded, these announcements will recall many memories of debates and associations in connection with Peel Institute over a period of forty years.

JOHN MACLEAN

BY HUGH MACDIARMID

[The following article by our friend and comrade, Hugh MacDiarmid (C. M. Grieve), is reprinted from The Scottish Socialist, Glasgow, for Nov.-Dec., 1940. It is the first of three articles. We shall reprint the other two. The full title of Grieve's article is: "John MacLean, Scotland, and The Communist Party." The editor of our contemporary, in a footnote to the article, comments that the Communist Party has altered its Scottish policy since MacLean's time. Maybe.—Ed.]

"Evidently my father is a very difficult man to biographise," his daughter, Mrs Nan Mercer, shyly observed to me in one of her letters. It is indeed a scandal that a biography of this magnificent working class leader—indubitably the greatest of modern Scotsmen—who had a far greater popular following than any other Scotsman in the course of our history, should not have been written yet, seventeen years after his tragic death at the early age of 44. The consolidation of his great work called for the speedy and effective execution of this pious duty, so that although dead he might yet speak, and continue to be a great incitement and inspiration to the workers of Scotland, and to the workers of the world at large. Yet it is easily understandable. As Guy Aldred has said—it was the policy of the authorities during the War to denounce Ramsay MacDonald (destined for the highest political honours) as a dangerous man in order to hide the fact that John Maclean was really the dangerous man. He is still incomparably dangerous. William Gallacher, M.P., in his Autobiography, "Revolt on the Clyde," tells how, in the autumn of 1922, "while we were in London, Kirkwood and I visited the Labour Party headquarters and tried our utmost to get the official endorsement of Maclean as the Labour candidate for Gorbals. Barnes had refused to accept the decision of the Conference and was still in the Government, and was, therefore, finished so far as the Labour Party was concerned. But the leadership of the Labour Party would not yield. 'Anyone but Maclean,' they said. We told them there would be no other. It was Maclean or nobody. The Local Labour Party was solidly behind him; why should they withhold their endorsement? Maclean wasn't suitable. Why wasn't he suitable? Oh, he just wasn't suitable, and beyond this we could not get."
